Under the married woman's acts, the wife has a right to the rents, issues, and profits of land conveyed to her by the direction of her husband. Woodward v. Woodward, 145 Mo. 241, 49 S. W. 1001.

Under the Oregon statutes, a man may convey property to his wife as freely as to a stranger, and exclude himself from all interest therein. Jenkins v. Hall, 26 Or. 79, 37 Pac. 62.

Since 1840 a man may, under the Texas laws, make donations of property directly to his wife without the intervention of a trustee. Fitts v. Fitts, 14 Tex. 443; Reynolds v. Lansford, 16 Tex. 286.

Under a statute permitting a married woman to hold property and sue in the same manner as if unmarried, she may maintain suit upon a note given to her by her husband for a valuable consideration during coverture. May v. May, 9 Neb. 16, 31 Am. Rep. 399, 2 N. W. 221.

At least she may after the parties have been divorced. Webster v. Webster, 58 Me. 139, 4 Am. Rep. 253.

Or against his estate. Logan v. Hall, 19 Iowa, 491.

Under the statutes giving power to a married woman to enjoy, contract, sell, transfer, convey, devise, and bequeath her property in the same manner and with like effect as if she were unmarried, her husband may convey real estate to her by deed directly, without the necessity of a trustee. Burdeno v. Amperse, 14 Mich. 91, 90 Am. Dec. 225.

Under statutes permitting a married woman to hold property separate from her husband, 60 L. R. A.

the wife may take a conveyance of personal property directly from the husband. Going v. Orns, 8 Kan. 85; Faddis v. Woollomes, 10 Kan. 56.

A conveyance of real estate by a man to his wife becomes her separate estate, although in form a quitclaim, if it is upon consideration of love and affection so as to be in effect a gift, under a statute providing that property received by a married woman through gift shall be her separate estate. Thrope v. Sampson, 84 Fed. 63.

The rule that a woman cannot take a gift of personal property from her husband is repealed by the amendment of a statute which provided that she might sue in all matters relating to her property which might come to her by gift of any person except her husband, by omitting the words "except her husband." Rawson v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 2 Abb. Tr. N. S. 220. The court says: "As a married woman can maintain an action in relation to property obtained from her husband, as well as from all other persons, the denial of her sole and separate right to that property as donee would be inconsistent with her right to sue for it."

Under the New York act of 1860, gifts of paraphernalia from a man to his wife became her separate estate at law. Rawson v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 48 N. Y. 212, 8 Am. Rep. 543.

By N. Y. act 1887, chap. 537, a man is permitted to convey lands directly to his wife. Diefendorf v. Diefendorf, 29 N. Y. S. R. 122, 8 N. Y. Supp. 617.

A statute providing that property acquired by a married woman by descent, devise, bequest, gift, or grant shall be her sole and separate estate includes property acquired by gift from her husband. Barnum v. Farthing, 40 How. Pr. 25.

A conveyance which was valid by the existing statute is not rendered invalid by the repeal of the statute and restoration of the rules of the common law. Baygents v. Beard, 41 Miss. 531.

b. Exception of conveyances from husband.

Some of the statutes which created separate estates of married women contained a clause excepting property acquired from the husband, and the courts have not been able to agree as to the effect of this exception. Separate estate for her benefit, is construed as operating to her separate use; and the reason assigned is that the conveyance otherwise would be wholly inoperative."

A case in point is Leake v. Benson, 29 Gratt. 156, in which it is held: "Where the conveyance is by the husband to the wife, . . . as a general rule it will be construed as operating to her separate use, although no such words are used as would be necessary to [create] a separate estate in a conveyance by a stranger. . . . The reason is said to be that otherwise the conveyance would be wholly inoperative."

In Deming v. Williams, 26 Conn. 231, 68 Am. Dec. 386, the court discusses this question, and, citing a large number of authorities, thus lays down the rule: "Undoubtedly the cases all of them import that the wife is to take to the exclusion of the husband. But this is to be inferred from the fact that it is a bona fide gift of the husband to his wife. If this is not irrevocably to her separate use the transaction has no meaning, for no one pretends that a legal title passes to her. We cannot believe that the husband, in order to be irrevocably bound, must use language to that effect, or covenant that he will not resume or sell the thing he has given to his wife. When a stranger gives to the wife, it is true that words of exclusiveness are necessary, for otherwise the unity of husband and wife would carry to the husband alone a gift of personal property made to the wife; but when the husband himself gives to his is usually regarded as being held by a married woman free from the control of her husband. A clause in a statute creating separate estate in her, which excepts property acquired from him, can have full effect by being limited to the question of her separate estate without having any bearing upon the question of his right to convey property to her either at law or in equity. Some of the courts have held that this is the full effect of the statute, so that the question of the validity of the statute was left as before the statute was passed.

A provision excepting property acquired from the husband, in a statute creating a wife's separate estate, does not destroy her right to acquire property from him which will be free from his debts. Property acquired under such statutes is statutory separate estate, and the incidents of it are entirely different from those which attach to property so settled as to be her separate estate in equity. O'Doherty v. Ontario Bank, 32 U. C. C. P. 299.

In Moore v. Somerindyke, 1 Hilt. 199, it is said that the New York acts creating the separate estate of married women expressly except property coming to her from the husband, and that therefore gifts from him to her were not her separate property.

Under the Massachusetts statutes, a woman cannot acquire property to be held as her sole and separate property by gift from her husband. Though such a gift may be so far valid as to give the wife a right to the property at the death of the husband, as against his heirs or executors, it is invalid as to his creditors. Property thus given remains the property of the husband during his life, and may be demanded by him. Spelman v. Aldrich, 126 Mass. 113.

In case a man makes a gift of personal property to his wife the title and possession remain in him during his life, the possession of the wife being, in legal contemplation, his possession, and he may revoke the gift at any time; but, in case he does not revoke it prior to his death, she may enforce her rights against his representatives. Marshall v. Jaquith, 134 Mass. 138.

The mere fact that the statutes permit the woman to acquire property from anyone except her husband does not invalidate gifts causa mortis which he makes to her. Whitney v. Wheeler, 116 Mass. 490.

Under the Massachusetts statute permitting a married woman to hold as her separate estate property which comes to her from any person except her husband, personal property transferred to her by a third person at the instance of her husband does not become hers free from his control. Towle v. Towle, 114 Mass. 167. The court says, however, it is true that, if she had survived him, and he had done nothing to reduce it to possession, and it was not needed for his creditors, she could hold it against his legal representatives. But during his life the rules of the common law apply to it, and he has the right to reduce it to possession.

In Stockwell v. Baird, 1 Marv. (Del.) 420, 31 Atl. 811, where the question was as to the rights of creditors of the husband, the court held that, under a statute providing that the real and personal property acquired by a married woman from any person other than her husband should be her sole and separate property, she could not acquire from him property to her sole and separate use.

In Mississippi it is held that, under a statute providing that any married woman may become seised or possessed of any property in her own name and her own property, provided the same does not come from her husband after coverture, a gift of chattels by a man to his wife is void at law. Ratliff v. Dougherty, 24 Miss. 181.

But the mere fact that the statute providing for the separate property of married women contains a clause to the effect that she may acquire property except from her husband does not change the equity rule that real estate conveyed to her may be preserved for her benefit by that court. Warren v. Brown, 25 Miss. 66, 57 Am. Dec. 191.

So, a lower New York court has held that a statute giving a married woman the power of a feme sole with reference to all property derived from anyone but her husband does not destroy her equitable right to receive gifts directly from him for her support. Peck v. Brown, 26 How. Pr. 350.

But there is an intimation to the contrary in Little v. Willets, 37 How. Pr. 493.

The Supreme Court of the United States has held that an exception in the statute of the District of Columbia, providing that property coming to her, except by gift or conveyance from her husband, shall be her separate estate, refers to voluntary gifts and conveyances, and does not operate upon property conveyed for a wife this cannot be necessary, and we are confident no case can be found which upholds such a doctrine."

The cases of Steel v. Steel, 36 N. C. (1 Ired. Eq.) 452; Sims v. Rickets, 35 Ind. 181, 9 Am. Rep. 679; Haines v. Haines, 54 Ill. 77; Smith v. Seiberling, 35 Fed. 677; Maraman v. Maraman, 4 Met. (Ky.) 84; Callahan v. Houston, 78 Tex. 494, 14 S. W. 1027; Story v. Marshall, 24 Tex. 305. 76 Am. Dec. 106; Putnam v. Bicknell, 18 Wis. 333,—are in line with those from which we have quoted, and fully sustain the view we have taken of the question.

These are all cases decided by courts of the highest authority, and would seem to be conclusive of the matter. Counsel for the complainant rely upon the fact that we have no case in which this doctrine has been applied to conveyances of lands in Tennessee. But they have been unable to produce a case either in this or any other jurisdiction where a court has refused to apply it to such conveyances. In every case called to our attention, where it has been invoked, the rule has been applied and enforced. The question was not made or considered in the cases of Murdock v. Memphis & O. R. Co. 7 Baxt. 572, and Vick v. Gover, 92 Tenn. 391, 21 S. W. 677, and they do not support the contention of the complainant.

The reasons, we have said, given in the opinions of this court for holding that transfers of personal property by husbands to their wives create separate estate in the valuable consideration. Sykes v. Chadwick, 18 Wall. 141, 21 L. ed. 824.

In Williams v. Reid, 8 Mackey, 46, it was held that, under the District of Columbia statutes, property conveyed by a man to his wife directly or indirectly is not her separate property.

In accordance with that ruling, it was held that a grant by husband to wife through the medium of a third person, of real estate, without words making it her sole and exclusive property, does not make it her sole statutory estate, under a statute providing that property acquired by her in any other way than by gift or conveyance from her husband shall be hers as absolutely as if she was unmarried, and she cannot, therefore, devise it free from his claims. And the power of disposition is not conferred upon her by a clause of the statute that any married woman may convey, devise, and bequeath her property, or any interest therein, in the same manner and with like effect as if she were unmarried, since such provision refers to her statutory or equitable separate estate. Rathbone v. Hamilton, 4 App. D. C. 475.

Following the same line, the court, in Zeust v. Staffan, 14 App. D. C. 200, held that, under a statute providing that property acquired by a married woman other than by gift or conveyance from her husband shall be her separate estate, property paid for by him, and conveyed to her, does not become her separate estate, which she can devise to the exclusion of his marital rights.

But that a conveyance to a married woman at the instance of her husband and upon consideration furnished by him, which is expressly stated to be for her sole use and benefit, free from the control and ownership of the husband, confers upon her an equitable separate estate, which she may devise free from his control, notwithstanding the provision for statutory separate estate is that all property acquired by the wife other than that by gift or conveyance from her husband shall be her separate estate.

But in the meantime the Hamilton Case had gone to the Supreme Court of the United States, and that court held that the fact that property was acquired from her husband does not prevent a woman from devising it under statutes which provide that all property acquired by her, except by gift or conveyance from her husband, shall be hers as absolutely as if unmarried, and that any married woman may con vey, devise, and bequeath her property, or any interest therein, in the same manner and with like effect as if she were unmarried. 175 U. S. 414, 44 L. ed. 219, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 155.

The court then granted a rehearing in Zeust v. Staffan, 16 App. D. C. 141, and, upon the authority of Hamilton v. Rathbone, held that, under the statute, a married woman had power to devise all her property, however acquired; and this included power to devise real estate acquired by gift or conveyance from her husband, as fully as if unmarried.

In Shea v. McMahon, 16 App. D. C. 65, the court, without considering the effect of the statute, held that a conveyance of real estate by a man to his wife through a third person is good as against those claiming under him. The court says that it is not pretended that the rights of creditors were involved, and that, therefore, whatever was the consideration for the conveyance, even if it was a voluntary settlement, the conveyance to the wife was perfectly good and valid as against the husband, his heirs at law, and against his devisees and trustees claiming under his will.

But under the statutes of the District of Columbia, property conveyed by a man to his wife through a third person does not become her sole and separate property, which she can convey in the same manner as if she was unmarried. Kaiser v. Stickney, 131 U. S. CLXXXVII. Appx. and 26 L. ed. 176.

So, a conveyance of property by a husband to wife through the medium of a third person does not vest in her a statutory separate estate under the statutes governing the District of Columbia, so as to enable her to transfer it without joining her husband in the deed. Cammack v. Carpenter, 3 App. D. C. 219.

c. Exemption from husband's debts.

Where, by statute, real estate coming to a wife by gift or grant during coverture is exempt from the debts of her husband, a grant to her by the husband will, in equity, be regarded as for her sole and separate use, although not so expressed in the deed. Smith v. Seiberling, 35 Fed. 677. The court says an ordinary deed of conveyance to a married woman without appropriate words creating what is known as a separate estate invests her with the legal title to the land, which is as property without language expressing that intention, apply with the same force to the conveyances of real property, and there is no sound basis upon which a distinction can be made. It is a question of intention and effect. The law conclusively presumes that the husband intends that this act shall have the effect that it purports to have upon its face, that he part with all his interest in the property conveyed. If a transfer of personal property to the wife by her husband did not, of its own force, vest in her a separate estate, the transfer would be a farce, and perhaps a fraud upon her, because the husband would immediately become again the owner of it by virtue of his marital rights, and the wife would take nothing. If the same result did not follow a conveyance of land by a husband to his wife, he would, by the same marital rights, become seised of an estate therein during their joint lives, and, if they have a child born alive, for his life if he survives her, as tenant by the curtesy, and entitled to receive and enjoy the rents and profits. The wife would not only be deprived of all the fruits of ownership during all this time, but she could not sell or convey it without his consent and joinder in the conveyance,—a power in the husband over the disposition of the property that often enables him to control and reacquire title by reducing to possession the proceeds of the sale of it. The wife would acquire a bare right to sell with the concurrence of her husband while he lived, and only come into full own-effectually protected against the husband's sole creditors as if made to a trustee to her separate use. While such a deed as this is void at law it is good in equity, and a court of equity will effectuate the manifest purpose of the parties, since the law presumes it was the intention to convey an estate to the separate use of the wife.

d. Permitting revocation.

By the express terms of the Louisiana Code a gift of real estate by a man to his wife is subject to revocation. Lavedan v. Jenkins, 47 La. Ann. 725, 17 So. 256.

IV. Conveyance by third person at instance of husband.

To avoid the rule that a man could not convey property directly to his wife, the device was adopted at an early date of conveying through the medium of a stranger. Such conveyances were uniformly upheld, and are not within the scope of the present investigation. But a modification of that principle has arisen which deserves some notice. That is where the husband purchases property and directs the title to be conveyed to his wife. Such a devise can be regarded in no other way than as a gift or conveyance of the property from him to her; and yet such conveyances are uniformly held to vest the legal title in her.

If the transfer is through the medium of a third person the title vests in the wife. Barnum v. Farthing, 40 How. Pr. 25.

A conveyance to wife at the instance of the husband vests title in her. Frank v. Frank (Tex. Civ. App.) 25 S. W. 819.

If property purchased by a man is, by his direction, conveyed to his wife, it becomes her separate estate. Haines v. Haines, 54 Ill. 74; Wing v. Goodman, 75 Ill. 159; Indianapolis, B. & W. R. Co. v. McLaughlin, 77 Ill. 275; Elder v. Jones, 85 Ill. 384; Price v. Osborn, 34 Wis. 34.

Payment for property by husband, and conveyance of the title to his wife by his direction, vest the absolute title in her. To entitle him to a conveyance of the property to himself he must show that it was mutually understood between himself and wife at the time the property was purchased that she should hold it for him. Bent v. Bent, 44 Vt. 555.

Under the act of 1800, land conveyed to the wife through the medium of a third person vests in her to her sole and separate use. Barnum v. Farthing, Sheldon, 217.

A conveyance of land to the wife at the instance of the husband, upon consideration furnished by him which is expressed to be "to her use," is sufficient to create in her a separate estate which is free from any claim on the part of his heirs, and there is no resulting trust in his favor. Whitten v. Whitten, 3 Cush. 199. The courts say, where the husband himself makes a gift to the wife, the intention to relinquish his own rights in favor of the wife, and thus to give her a separate property or interest, is necessarily and most clearly and unequivocally manifested and declared. The cases therefore which hold that general expressions do not create a separate property in the wife cannot apply to a case where the grant is by the husband.

When a man effects a purchase of stock in the joint names of himself and his wife the transaction cannot of itself be considered as converting the wife into a trustee quoad her interest for the purchaser whose money paid the price of the stock. Drummer v. Pitcher, 2 Myl. & K. 262; citing the ruling of Lord Eldon in the unreported case of Wilde v. Wilde, where his lordship said that, if a husband purchases stock in the names of himself and wife, it is prima facie a gift to her in the event of her survivorship.

A conveyance to a wife at the instance of her husband need not expressly state that it is for her sole and separate use to have that effect. O'Doherty v. Ontario Bank, 32 U. C. C. P. 299.

A man who pays the purchase money for property conveyed to his wife has neither a resulting trust in the property nor a claim for the purchase money as against her heirs. Swafford v. Ferguson, 3 Lea, 292, 31 Am. Rep. 639.

But the New Hampshire court has taken a somewhat different view of the question. The New Hampshire statutes of 1800 provided that every married woman should hold to her separate use all property conveyed to her, provided such conveyance is not occasioned by payment or pledge of the property of her husband. Under this statute, the court held that the object of the legislature was to prevent the husband from conveying his own property to the separate use of his wife, and that there-ership and enjoyment in the event she should survive him,—an estate more in the nature of a remainder than the absolute one taking effect immediately which the deed purports to pass, and wholly inconsistent with the terms of the instrument. Beneficial results would be practically wanting in transfers of both species of property, and there would be a like conflict in both cases in the effect and the apparent object of the transaction and expressed purpose of the parties. It cannot be supposed that parties intend that contracts deliberately entered into, often supported by valuable consideration, should be so abortive and barren of results. It is more reasonable to treat the contract as having its plain and natural meaning, and effective to vest in the wife the absolute estate (a separate estate) which the language of the instrument indicates it was the intention of the conveyor to convey. This view is in harmony with our statute providing that a grant or conveyance of land is effective to pass all the title and interest of the grantee therein, unless the intent to convey a less estate appears by express words or necessary implication from the terms of the instrument. It is immaterial that the marital right of the husband attached to property conveyed to the wife by operation of the law, and without any affirmative action on his part. This is presumed to be known to and in contemplation of the par-fore a conveyance by a third person to her at his instance upon consideration furnished by him vested no separate estate in her. Vogt v. Ticknor, 48 N. H. 242.

In Newbert v. Zeddles (Ky.) 11 S. W. 777, the title of the heirs of the wife was upheld against the claims of the husband, where he had procured the title to the land to be placed in her name.

An assignment of a bill of sale of personal property belonging to a married man, by a third person to the wife of such man by his direction, will, as against his subsequent assignees with notice, vest the title in her. Paul v. Jennings (N. J. Eq.) 23 Atl. 483.

When a husband has the title to real estate placed in the name of his wife the presumption is that a gift was intended, which he must rebut by clear, unequivocal, and explicit evidence in order to establish a resulting trust in his favor. Rafferty v. Rafferty, 5 Pa. Dist. R. 453; Bradshaw v. Bradshaw, 9 Pa. Dist. R. 1; Earnest's Appeal, 106 Pa. 310; Kobarg v. Greeder, 51 Neb. 365, 70 N. W. 921; Klump v. Klump, 51 Neb. 22, 70 N. W. 525; Propst v. Cass County, 51 Neb. 736, 71 N. W. 748; Tucker v. Carr, 39 Tex. 98; O'Hair v. O'Hair (Ark.) 88 S. W. 945.

Real estate purchased by a man and conveyed at his instance to his wife will be presumed to have been intended to be an advancement. Gray v. Gray, 13 Neb. 453, 14 N. W. 390; Bartlett v. Bartlett, 13 Neb. 456, 14 N. W. 385.

But this presumption may be rebutted by evidence showing that the purchase was intended for the benefit of the husband. Smith v. Strahan, 16 Tex. 314, 67 Am. Dec. 622.

Where land is purchased by a man, and the conveyance is, by his direction, made to his wife, the presumption is that it is intended as a settlement upon her for her benefit. Ilgenfritz v. Ilgenfritz, 116 Mo. 429, 22 S. W. 786; Selbold v. Christman, 75 Mo. 308, Affirming 7 Mo. App. 254; Price v. Kane, 112 Mo. 412, 20 S. W. 609; Woodward v. Woodward, 148 Mo. 241, 49 S. W. 1001; Pitkin v. Mott, 56 Mo. App. 401.

A man who procures property to be conveyed to his wife will be presumed to have intended to make it her separate estate. Childress v. Grim, 57 Tex. 58.

When property is purchased by a man in the name of his wife the relation of the parties rebutts the presumption of a resulting trust. Underwood v. Warner, 4 Phila. 6.

The mere fact that the consideration is paid by the husband for land conveyed to his wife will not control the presumption that the deed was intended as a provision for her, nor establish a resulting trust in his favor, without further proof that such was the intention at the time of the conveyance. Edgerly v. Edgerly, 112 Mass. 175.

The presumption that a conveyance by a third person to the wife at the instance of the husband is an advancement may be rebutted. Wormley v. Wormley, 98 Ill. 553.

But although the presumption that a man, in purchasing property and having it conveyed to his wife, intended to make a settlement upon her, may be rebutted, the burden is upon him to do so. Lister v. Lister, 35 N. J. Eq. 49.

The presumption that conveyance to a wife by a third person was for her separate use may be rebutted by parol evidence. Wallace v. Bowen, 28 Vt. 638.

V. Consideration.

As has been noticed supra II., b, some cases have held a consideration to be necessary to uphold a conveyance from husband to wife. While the necessity of a consideration may be questioned, there is no doubt that, if a consideration exists, there is ample ground for the interposition of the court to uphold the conveyance.

In Hervey v. Hervey, 1 Atk. 561, the court says, by way of argument, that, if the wife had claimed the fund which she sought in the case without setting forth any consideration, but merely as a voluntary gift from her husband, there is no doubt that the court would have given it to her, and it would be very absurd to say that because she sets forth in her bill a valuable consideration for a part thereof she shall lose the whole.

In Arundell v. Phipps, 10 Ves. Jr. 139, where plaintiff laid claim to certain property which she was alleged to have purchased from her husband, the chancellor says it appears to have been asserted in the court of King's bench that a husband and wife could not after marriage contract, for a bona fide and valuable consideration, for a transfer of property from him to her. The doctrine is not so either here or at law.

A postnuptial agreement on sufficient con-ties when a contract of the character under consideration is made, and to be provided against so far as the creation of a separate estate can have that effect. When there is no reservation in a deed, it will be taken as passing to the vendee the highest estate that the vendor can convey, which in the case at bar is a separate estate in the land conveyed. It is clear upon principle and authority that a conveyance of lands by husband to the wife in the usual form must be held by necessary implication and as a matter of law to vest in the wife a technical separate estate in the premises conveyed. No words expressive of such intention are necessary. It will be conclusively presumed from the relation of the parties and the nature of the transaction.

We are therefore of the opinion and hold that the chancellor was in error in decreeing that the conveyance made by Mr. Barnum to Mrs. Barnum did not pass to and vest in the latter a separate estate in the lands conveyed, and that she did not have the right to sell and convey the same, upon proper privy examination, without his consent and joinder in the deed. The deed made by Mrs. Barnum is valid and effective to vest in the purchaser a good title to the property free from all marital or other rights of her husband, and the decree adjudging to the contrary will be reversed, and one here entered in accordance with this opinion.

sideration will be enforced in equity. Liles v. Fleming, 16 N. C. (1 Dev. Eq.) 185.

A deed directly from husband to wife, founded on good consideration, will be upheld. Brooklyn Bank v. Lamon, 31 N. Y. S. R. 191, 9 N. Y. Supp. 849.

In McCampbell v. McCampbell, 2 Lea, 664, 31 Am. Rep. 623, the court states, by way of argument, that a consideration passing from the wife will sustain a direct conveyance of property by her husband to her, and the very nature of the transaction will fix the property, even if personalty, with a trust for the separate use of the wife, without any words to that effect.

A sufficient consideration may be found in a conveyance by the wife to her husband of her separate estate.

A married woman may purchase property from her husband with her separate estate. Steadman v. Wilbur, 7 R. I. 481.

A deed executed by a man to his wife in good faith and in consideration of the separate estate of the wife is valid. Thompson v. Mills, 39 Ind. 528. The court says: "In this state the distinction between actions at law and suits in equity, and the forms of all such actions which existed in this state prior to 1852, are abolished: there is but one form of action for the enforcement or protection of private rights and the redress of private wrongs, and every right, and every transaction, must be at once regarded by the court in its equitable, as well as in its legal, character and operation. Why, then, shall we longer speak of the same instrument as being void at law, but valid in equity? As the fact is recognized that the husband may, by deed made directly to his wife, convey real estate to her, and the conveyance will be upheld, why not apply to such conveyances the same rules which are applied to conveyances between other parties; that is, hold them valid until some legal reason has been shown for setting them aside?"

And that rule was followed in Brookbank v. Kennard, 41 Ind. 339.

A conveyance of land by a man to his wife in consideration of moneys which he had used and appropriated creates in her an equitable, separate estate, which she may sell or charge as if she were a feme sole. Goodlett v. Hansell, 66 Ala. 151.

Jewelry given to the wife in consideration of money from her separate estate, used by the husband, will vest in her,—at least as to the equitable title,—so as not to pass to his assignees for creditors. Barrows v. Keene, 16 R. I. 484, 8 Atl. 713.

A man may convey land to his wife in satisfaction of indebtedness due from him to her at the time of the marriage. Barclay v. Plant, 50 Ala. 509.

Use of separate property of the wife will sustain a subsequent conveyance to her. Perkins v. Perkins, 1 Tenn. Ch. 541.

But the property must have been taken by the husband under the express agreement to make a settlement upon the wife in lieu of it. Cheatham v. Hess, 2 Tenn. Ch. 766.

If separate property may form a consideration, a conveyance by the man to the wife of her own property, which he acquired by the marriage, must of necessity be upheld.

So, a man may during marriage make a parol gift to his wife of money which came to him from her, and such money will become her separate estate. Engleman v. Deal, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 4, 37 S. W. 652.

And if a man transfers to his wife her personal property, or relinquishes his rights in regard to it, it becomes her separate property and subject to her contracts, even if no words of exclusiveness are used. Williams v. King, 43 Conn. 574.

In Harvey v. Harvey, 1 P. Wms. 125, the court enforced an agreement by the husband not to intermeddle with estate which had been devised to the separate use of his wife.

A deed by a man to his wife of her share in her father's estate will be supported in equity. Bradford v. Goldsborough, 15 Ala. 311.

So, an agreement to transfer property to the wife in consideration of her release of dower rights is binding and enforceable in equity. Ward v. Crotty, 4 Met. (Ky.) 59.

Therefore where a man, in consideration of his wife's signing deeds of his property to bar her dower right, procures real estate to be conveyed to her, it becomes her separate property regardless of the proportion which the value of her dower interest bore to its value. McKinney v. McKinney (Tex. Civ. App.) 87 S. W. 217.

So, a conveyance of chattels to a married woman in consideration of her releasing her rights in the homestead makes them her separate estate. Blum v. Light, 81 Tex. 414, 18 S. W. 1090; Burnham v. McMichael, 6 Tex.

1. A fee-simple estate is vested in a woman by a deed to her and her body heirs, in which her husband is entitled to curtesy, although the grant is expressly made free from his debts and liabilities.
2. A man is deprived of his curtesy interest in land by conveying it to his wife to her sole, separate, and exclusive use, free and discharged from all his control and liabilities.

So the right to alimony may form a consideration.

Thus, the compromise of an alimony suit is a sufficient consideration to support a deed from husband to wife. Adams v. Loomis, 22 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 99, Affirmed in 24 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 242.

A transfer by a husband to his wife of a slave, together with other property in discharge of alimony which has been decreed against him, will empower her to manumit the slave, and he cannot, after the death of his former wife, assert any claim to the slave or her offspring. Wallingsford v. Allen, 10 Pet. 583, 9 L. ed. 542. The court says that equity sustains transfers of property from husband to wife during coverture when a clear and satisfactory case is made out that the property is to be applied to the separate use of the wife; where the consideration of the transfer is a separate interest of the wife, yielded up by her for the husband's benefit, or of their family, or which has been appropriated by him to his uses; or where the husband is in a situation to make a gift of property to his wife, and distinctly separates it from the mass of his property for her use. The court further says, with reference to the property in controversy before it, that the wife was to be considered as a feme sole, and her right to dispose of it followed as a matter of course.

The duty of the husband to provide for the support of his wife will furnish a sufficient consideration to support the conveyance. Under this rule he may make a settlement of property upon, or an advancement of property to, her to provide for her wants in case of his death.

As between the parties themselves a voluntary settlement upon the wife may be upheld in equity. Pawley v. Vogel, 42 Mo. 291.

A settlement not fraudulent, by a person not indebted, is valid though voluntary. Battersbee v. Farrington, 1 Swanst. 106.

In Curtis v. Price, 12 Ves. Jr. 89, the court says with respect to a settlement made after the settler's marriage that a settlement of this kind is void only as against creditors. To every other person it is good.

In Moore v. Page, 111 U. S. 117, 28 L. ed. 373, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 388, which was a case involving the rights of creditors of the husband, 69 L. R. A.

A PPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Chancery Court for Shelby County in a proceeding to settle the rights and interests in certain real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Henry Craft for appellants.

Messrs. Turley & Turley, for appellees:

By the act of 1784 all estates tail were converted into fee-simple estates; so that in 1851, when this deed was drawn, it conveyed a fee-simple title to Mrs. Caroline I. Weller.

Middleton v. Smith, 1 Coldw. 144; Kirk v. Furgerson, 6 Coldw. 483; Wynne v. Wynne, 9 Heisk. 309; Beecher v. Hicks, 7 Lea, 207.

the court assumes that property conveyed by husband to wife as a settlement may be held as her separate estate beyond the control of her husband.

A conveyance of property from a man to his wife, when made as a provision for her, will be sustained and upheld in equity when the rights of creditors are not affected. Kellogg v. Hale, 108 Ill. 164.

And where the conveyance is made to the wife by the husband directly the presumption is that an advancement was intended. Andrews v. Oxley, 38 Iowa, 580; Arp v. Jacobs, 8 Wyo. 489, 27 Pac. 800; Spring v. Hight, 22 Me. 408, 39 Am. Dec. 587.

But the presumption that the conveyance to the wife was intended as an advancement for her benefit may be rebutted. Livingston v. Livingston, 2 Johns. Ch. 539.

Under this rule, there is no reason why a conveyance should ever fail for lack of consideration.

A gift causa mortis may therefore be valid. Miller v. Miller, 3 P. Wms. 356; Lawson v. Lawson, 1 P. Wms. 441.

But in Weathersby v. Weathersby, 39 Miss. 652, where the question was as to the right of the wife to slaves which had been hers before marriage, the court says it is well settled that where a settlement is made by the husband upon the wife for a permanent separation, if she return to her husband's house and protection such conduct on her part amounts to a total extinguishment of any future claim under the settlement.

A transfer by a man to his wife of all his property upon condition that she will assume his debts and pay the same out of property received from him and property held in her own right is valid as against him. Brown v. Brown, 22 Neb. 703, 36 N. W. 275.

VI. Does conveyance create separate estate.

The only way in which the conveyance would be of any value to the wife would be to hold that it was her separate estate free from the control of the husband, for it would be of little avail to recognize the validity of the gift or conveyance and at the same time hold that the property immediately reverted in the husband by reason of his marital rights. To create separate estate in equity in cases of gifts from strangers, the court required the

The husband has curtesy interest in his wife's separate estate, unless the intent to exclude him is clear and explicit, and generally by express words.

8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 521, 522.

A tenant by the curtesy consummate is a husband whose wife is dead, and to whom a child or children have been born alive by his said wife.

statement explicitly to appear that the gift was for the sole and separate use of the wife. The question then arises, Is such a declaration necessary in a conveyance to a married woman by her husband? There seems to have been no question that he could create in her a separate estate.

In Huber v. Huber, 10 Ohio, 371, it is said it is admitted by counsel that a husband may settle a separate estate upon his wife; that is, he may transfer property to her which will inure to her as her separate estate. This may be done even without the appointment of a trustee.

And, if it is stated in the deed that the conveyance is for the separate use of the wife, the same rule would apply as though the conveyance was by a stranger.

So, a conveyance of real estate by a man to his wife for her separate use will be upheld in equity against subsequent grantees from his heirs. Dale v. Lincoln, 62 Ill. 22.

A conveyance by a man to his wife of real estate by a deed in which the habendum clause recites that it is to her sole and separate use will create in her a separate estate which will be upheld in equity. Turner v. Shaw, 96 Mo. 22, 9 Am. St. Rep. 319, 8 S. W. 897.

A separate estate is vested in the wife by a conveyance by the husband of a life estate in lands by deed containing a clause that she is authorized and empowered to collect the rents and use the same in any manner she may elect, to her separate use, and free from his debts, contracts, and control. Vick v. Gower, 92 Tenn. 391, 21 S. W. 677.

A deed by a man of leasehold property to his wife "to her own proper use and benefit" makes the property her separate estate. Surman v. Wharton [1891] 1 Q. B. 491.

An assignment by a man to his wife, by deed, of a leasehold to hold the same "as her separate estate" operates as a valid declaration of trust in favor of the wife. The court says the husband may become a trustee for his wife, but cannot retain any beneficial interest in the thing which is the subject of the deed. Fox v. Hawks, L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 822.

A clause in a conveyance by a man to his wife that she is to have and to hold the property to her, and her heirs forever, and so that the grantor, his heirs, or any other person, shall have no interest in it, creates in her 60 L. R. A.

Alexander v. Miller, 7 Heisk. 81; Beecher v. Hicks, 7 Lea, 213.

A husband may be tenant by the curtesy where the estate of the wife was a conditional or determinable fee, although the condition has happened upon which the limitation over in favor of other parties takes effect.

Crumley v. Deake, 8 Baxt. 362.

Wilkes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Mrs. S. W. Bingham filed the bill in this cause against her father, Jacob Weller, to have her rights and interests in two pieces of property in the city of Memphis declared, to recover this interest, and also her share of the rents and income which have been a separate estate. Davissan v. Sage, 20 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 115.

So, by antenuptial agreement the wife may be given power of disposition over her separate estate the same as though she remained sole, and such power will extend to property obtained from her husband. Strong v. Skinner, 4 Barb. 552.

Since the estate is an equitable one, so that it is necessary to resort to a court of equity to establish and protect it, that court has adopted the rule of giving effect to the evident intention of the parties and holding that the estate is separate,—at least so far as to protect it from the control of the husband during the lifetime of the wife.

In all instances of direct gifts to the use of the wife, if allowed at all, they must be supported as gifts to the sole use of the wife, and the husband is her trustee. This is necessarily so, for in that way only can the gift be effectual. It must be inferred, therefore, that the parties intended to create a separate property for the wife. Steel v. Steel, 36 N. C. (1 Ired. Eq.) 452.

A conveyance by a man to the separate use of his wife will constitute him a trustee of the legal title of the property for her use, where the effect of the legal unity is such that the legal title is retained by him. And a conveyance in the statutory form to convey real estate will be held to be to her separate use, although that fact is not expressly stated in the conveyance. This trust will be enforced in equity, and, if she devises the property to her children, and he retains possession after her death, he will be regarded as trustee for them so as to prevent his acquiring a title by adverse possession until he expressly repudiates the trust. Kent v. Kent, 19 Ont. App. Rep. 352.

MacLennan, J., says separate estate is an interest in property which is sui generis, and its distinguishing quality is that in relation to it the marriage bond is to be disregarded. The husband cannot vest the legal title in the wife, but he can give her what is known as a separate estate. And if that is the effect of his conveyance he has made himself a trustee, and his act may with perfect propriety be called a declaration of trust.

A conveyance by the husband need not state that it is for the sole and separate use of the collected from said property by her said father. Her father, Jacob Weller, claims that he is entitled to the possession of the property as tenant by the curtesy of his wife, Caroline Weller, who died in July, 1809.

There are two pieces of this property, one known as the "Main-street" and the other as the "Beale-street" property.

On the 20th of February, 1851, H. B. Joiner conveyed to Mrs. Caroline Isabella Weller and her bodily heirs, forever, a certain piece or parcel of land on Market street, in Memphis, Tennessee, to be held by her to to her own bodily heirs, free from the debts and liabilities of her husband, Jacob Weller.

At that date Mr. and Mrs. Weller had two children living, to wit, Sarah W. and ———.

On the 10th of October, 1857, they had four children living, to wit, Sarah W., John J., Henry Clay, and Robert F., and all of them at that time were minors. At that date Jacob Weller and his wife, Caroline I., and the four minor children above named, by their next friend, John S. Erwin, filed their ex parte petition or bill in the chancery court at Memphis, setting up the purchase by Jacob Weller of this lot, and stating that it was conveyed to Caroline Weller, and her bodily heirs. The deed from Joiner is made an exhibit to the petition, and shows that the land was conveyed to Caroline I., and her bodily heirs, as before stated. The petition prayed that the Market-street property might be sold, and the proceeds reinvested in other property, or loaned out under the wife to make it her separate property. Maraman v. Maraman, 4 Met. (Ky.) 84.

A conveyance of land by husband to wife for natural love and affection will permit her to hold the property against him and his heirs. Stafford v. Stafford, 41 Tex. 112.

A conveyance by a man directly to his wife in consideration of natural love and affection creates in her an equitable estate which she may encumber and alien as though a feme sole. McMillan v. Peacock, 57 Ala. 127; Helmetag v. Frank, 61 Ala. 67.

If the deed contains words of warranty, and recites a consideration, the land will vest in the wife as separate property, it being unnecessary that the deed should contain a recital to that effect. Swearingen v. Reed, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 386, 21 S. W. 383; Watts v. Bruce, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 347, 72 S. W. 258.

In Leake v. Benson, 29 Gratt. 156, it is stated by way of argument that a conveyance by a husband to his wife will as a general rule be construed as operating to her separate use, although no such words are used as would be necessary to a separate estate in a conveyance by a stranger. The court says the reason is said to be that otherwise the conveyance would be wholly inoperative.

And the same is true in Garland v. Pampalin, 32 Gratt. 314, and Irvine v. Greever, 32 Gratt. 419.

Words indicating that a conveyance of land is for the sole and separate use of the wife are not necessary in a conveyance by the husband, since the law will presume that such is the fact. Sims v. Rickets, 35 Ind. 181, 9 Am. Rep. 679.

In Kelly v. Grundy, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1081, 45 S. W. 100, the rule is recognized that, if a gift of personal property be made by a man to his wife, although not expressed to be for her separate use, it will be so treated.

In a case involving the rights of the husband's creditors the court said, since gift or conveyance by the husband to the wife is invalid at law, and is valid only in a court of equity, it is regarded as creating in the wife a separate estate, although it may not contain words denoting that it is for her sole and separate use, or words in exclusion of the marital rights of the husband, and is therefore not within the statutes creating her separate estate. In that case, however, the deed recited that the property was conveyed "as her separate property under the statutes of the state governing the estates of married women." Of the latter clause, the court said the effect which will be given to it, or whether it is capable of being construed as limiting or qualifying the estate, narrowing its incidents, lessening the dominion of the donee, as the estate is created by the general words which precede it, is not now of importance. Whether it is or is not valid and qualifying as a limitation, subjecting the estate and wife's dominion to the properties of a statutory estate, which is in but a limited sense a separate estate, it is indicative of the intention of the donor. Subjecting the estate to the statute would vest it in the donor as husband and trustee for the donee, entitling him to its rents and profits exempt from liability for his debts. This was held to be a badge of fraud. Seals v. Robinson, 75 Ala. 363.

A deed by a man directly to his wife creates in her a separate estate in equity; and in such case the technical words necessary to create a separate estate from persons other than the husband are not necessary. Pitts v. Sheriff, 108 Mo. 110, 18 S. W. 1071.

A gift of personal property by a man to his wife will in equity divest him of title, and vest it in her as her sole and separate estate, although words indicating that intention are not used, as would be necessary in case of a conveyance by a third person. Deming v. Williams, 26 Conn. 231, 68 Am. Dec. 386; Jennings v. Davis, 31 Conn. 138.

A gift of land by a man to his wife constitutes it her separate estate. Kimbrough v. Kimbrough, 99 Ga. 134, 25 S. E. 176.

A conveyance by husband to wife creates an equitable separate estate. Loeb v. Manasses, 78 Ala. 557.

Such conveyance creates an equitable estate unless it is in exchange for statutory separate estate. Hamaker v. Hamaker, 85 Ala. 232, 3 So. 611.

In case a man, for a valuable consideration, makes a gift to his wife, the transaction from its very nature confers a separate estate without express words. Sherron v. Hall, 4 Lea, 500.

A gift of personal property by husband to wife creates a separate estate by necessary implication. Templeton v. Brown, 86 Tenn. 53, 5 S. W. 441; Carpenter v. Franklin, 89 Tenn.

direction of the court. It also asked the court to construe said Joiner deed, and determine the amount of interest or title in said Market-street lot acquired by the said Caroline I. and her four children, who were parties thereto.

In these ex parte proceedings, on the 12th of January, 1858, a decree was entered adjudging that under the Joiner deed the children of Caroline I. Weller took an estate and interest in common with her in the Market-street property, and the cause was referred to the clerk to report whether it was manifestly to the interest of the said Caroline I. and her minor children that the Market street lot should be sold, and proceeds invested in other property, or loaned out under the direction of the court. The clerk and master reported that it would be manifestly to the interests of the parties, and especially of the children, to sell the property, and invest the proceeds in other property, or loan it out at interest, as the court might order. This was confirmed by the chancellor, and it was again adjudged that Caroline I. and her children, named in the petition, held the Market-street property in common, and directing it to be sold. This decree was renewed on June 18, 1858, and again on January 22, 1859.

On November 28, 1859, an order was entered showing that petitioners had dismissed their petition.

Nothing further appears to have been done until the November term, 1865, when a decree of sale was renewed.

142. 14 S. W. 484; Snodgrass v. Hyder, 95 Tenn. 575, 32 S. W. 764.

The mere fact of the gift is as strong evidence that it is to be the sole and separate property of the wife as any declaration in writing would be. Lockwood v. Cullin, 4 Robt. 129.

A deed of gift by a man to his wife is valid as between the parties, and vests the title in her as completely as though she had acquired it by inheritance. Scrutchfield v. Sauter, 119 Mo. 615, 24 S. W. 137.

A conveyance of lands by a man directly to his wife is equivalent to a conveyance to her sole and separate use, and creates an equitable separate estate. But the effect of the insertion of a provision that the land was to be held in all respects as separate estate under the law was left undetermined. Loeb v. McCullough, 78 Ala. 533.

In Wedel v. Herman, 59 Cal. 516, the court held that a conveyance by husband to wife, intended as a gift, vested the property in her as her separate property.

In opposition to that mass of authority, in Plumb v. Ives, 39 Conn. 120, it was held that, in the absence of language in a deed from husband to wife of a life estate through a third person that the conveyance is to her sole and separate use, the law will not supply such intention, and he will have a right to the income as before. The court, after finding a reason for the conveyance which might support it without holding that there was an intention to deprive him of the rents and profits, held that the court ought not to impute an intention to the parties which may not have been in their minds. And the condition of the parties gave aid to the holding that there was no such intention.

So a Federal court has held that property conveyed by a man to his wife and her heirs by a deed which contains no terms from which it appears that it was the intention of the grantor to exclude himself from the benefit and control of it is not, by the operation of such deed, her separate estate. He will retain a freehold estate in such property, which is subject to execution in favor of his creditors. But, so far as conveyances after its adoption are concerned, such property is converted into separate estate by a constitutional provision that the property of every married woman shall not be subject to the debts and contracts

And in Craine v. Edwards, 92 Ky. 109, 17 S. W. 211, the court held that a statute empowering a married woman to devise her separate estate does not apply to land obtained by gift from her husband, where the deed did not expressly state that it was for her sole and separate use. The court said, it is contended that, if the conveyance is from a stranger, it must contain words expressly stating that it is for her sole and separate use to have that effect, but not if it is from her husband. But the court says that this has been held with respect to personal estate, but that it is not true with respect to conveyances of real estate. "There is a manifest difference between the two cases. In the one he certainly has no longer any interest whatever in the property,—the transfer vests it absolutely in her; while in the other, by so making the deed, he may intend that his marital rights shall attach to the property just the same as if the conveyance were from some other party to her. In this instance, why was not the husband entitled to the use of the land during the life of the wife, and to be tenant by the curtesy after her death? . . . Where he merely conveys land to her by a deed general in its terms, an intention upon his part to create a separate estate in her cannot be presumed from the mere fact that the conveyance is from the husband. It, like a deed from any other person, must show in some way an intention to create a separate estate, or else, in the absence of a power to do so, she cannot, under the statute, devise it."

A distinction, however, is to be kept in mind between these equitable separate estates and statutory separate estates. The estates which are created and protected by courts of equity have only the incidents which belonged to such estates before the enactment of the statutes, and the rights pertaining to statutory estates do not belong to them.

Thus, a statute providing that all property which shall accrue to any married woman shall be owned and enjoyed by her as her own separate estate does not affect equitable separate estate; but the further provision that any deed from husband to wife shall be void against his existing creditors will abrogate the rule that the ordinary conveyance by husband to wife is void, and cause such convey-

On February 2, 1866, the clerk and master reported that Gen. W. Y. C. Humes had offered to give $11,000 for the Market-street property, and on the 3d of February, 1866, the clerk reported that the offer was a good one and ought to be accepted.

No further step appears to have been taken in the case.

On the 20th of February, 1868, Jacob Weller, the husband, filed his original bill against his wife, Caroline I. Weller, and their minor children, J. J. Weller, Sarah W., Henry Clay, Robert F., Caroline I., and Forrest L. Weller. The bill alleged that this Market-street property was conveyed by Joiner to Caroline I. Weller to her sole and separate use and to the heirs of her body. It made the ex parte proceedings a part of the bill, ance to vest in her a legal estate. Gluck v. Cox, 90 Ala. 331, 8 So. 161.

A married woman has complete control over her equitable separate estate, and may charge it as though she were sole; but her separate statutory estate can be charged only in the manner designated by the statute. And a statutory estate cannot be transformed into an equitable estate by transfer between the parties, as by a conveyance of the statutory estate, and the husband's conveyance of property to the wife in lieu of it. Loeb v. McCullough, 78 Ala. 533, Overruling expressions to the contrary in Turner v. Kelly, 70 Ala. 85.

Statutory separate estate cannot be converted into equitable estate. Farrior v. New England Mortg. Secur. Co. 92 Ala. 179, 12 L. E. A. 856, 9 So. 532; Jordan v. Smith, 83 Ala. 299, 3 So. 703.

The mere fact that the husband joins with a cotenant of his wife in the deed by which the property is partitioned does not alter the character of the title by which her share of the estate is held, and convert it from a fee simple into a separate estate, which, under the statutes, cannot be alienated, where there is nothing in the language of the deed to indicate that such is the intention. And the marital rights of the husband in the estate cannot be changed. Murdock v. Memphis & O. R. Co. 7 Baxt. 558.

To create statutory separate estate in the wife by a conveyance from her husband the consideration must have been statutory estate. Hamaker v. Hamaker, 88 Ala. 431, 6 So. 754.

But the Alabama act of 1887 converted the wife's equitable title into a legal one. Maxwell v. Grace, 85 Ala. 579, 5 So. 319; Manning v. Pippen, 86 Ala. 357, 11 Am. St. Rep. 46, 5 So. 572; Allen v. Hamilton, 109 Ala. 634, 19 So. 903.

In the absence of creditors whose rights are put in jeopardy, a man may create a separate estate for his wife out of his own property. Yazel v. Palmer, 81 Ill. 82; Hockett v. Bailey, 86 Ill. 76.

But such estate is a legal one, and must be conveyed or charged in the manner provided by statute. Elder v. Jones, 85 Ill. 384.

VII. Remaining interest of husband.

and referred to the deed as being on file in that case. It set out that the Market-street property could be sold for $11,000; and prayed that it might be sold, and the proceeds reinvested by Jacob Weller in other city property, upon the same trust as was set out in the deed from Joiner, heretofore referred to. A decree was entered directing a sale of the property for $11,000, upon proof and report of the clerk and master that it was to the interest of the parties that the sale should be made. The sale was ordered to be made by Jacob Weller as special commissioner, the minimum price to be $11,000.

On the 21st of July, 1868, Jacob Weller reported to the court that he had sold the Market-street lot to Alston, and this sale was confirmed, and title to the Market-street is vested in the wife, there must of necessity be some custodian of the legal title, and this is held to remain in the husband.

In case of a gift of personal property by a man to his wife the legal title will remain in him, and the beneficial use will vest in her as her separate estate. Campbell v. Galbreath, 12 Bush, 464.

And the fact that she has the beneficial interest will preclude him from asserting it.

Therefore, after conveying property to the wife the husband is precluded from claiming without alleging fraud or mistake that there was no consideration for the conveyance. Miller v. Miller, 17 Or. 423, 21 Pac. 938. The court says to allow the grantor in such a case, in order to render the deed ineffectual, to come in and swear that he did not mean what he had said under his hand and seal, or to claim that the deed intended something different from what its terms implied, is a violation of the established rules of evidence.

If a man settles a house and business to the separate use of his wife he may be restrained from in any manner interfering with the business, and even from entering the house. Wood v. Wood, 19 Week. Rep. 1049. The court says the husband entered into a contract with his wife by which she was to conduct a hotel for the benefit of herself and the children, and to occupy it as a feme sole. How can she do so if he is allowed to walk in when he likes, occupy any room he pleases, and conduct himself as proprietor.

So, if an absolute gift is made by a man to his wife of his personal property it is to her exclusive use, and he cannot resume the use and control of it under the statute giving him certain rights in his wife's property, even although no words of exclusiveness are used. Williams v. King, 43 Conn. 574.

So, no trust results in favor of the grantor in case of a conveyance by a man to his wife unless he shows that such was the intention by a preponderance of the evidence. McCaw v. Burk, 31 Ind. 56.

And parol evidence is not admissible to contradict the recitals of a deed from husband to wife for the purpose of raising an implied trust in him. Kahn v. Kahn, 94 Tex. 114, 58 S. W. 825.

No conditional trust will be presumed in favor of the husband when he conveys real lot was vested in him, and the commissioner was ordered to report to the next term of the court what disposition he had made of the money.

On the 19th of January, 1869, he reported that he had used $8,109 in the purchase of a lot on the north side of Beale street, and that by mistake he had taken the title to himself, instead of to his wife and children, and he preferred to convey the Beale-street lot to his wife and children, to hold just as they held the Market-street lot, or, in lieu thereof, to convey to them the Main-street lot, which at that time belonged to him, to be held in the same way by his wife and children. This report sets out that the Main-street lot was more valuable than either the Market-street lot or the Bealestreet lot. This report was confirmed on January 16, 1869, and the cause was referred to the clerk to report whether it would be best to invest the proceeds in the Main-street lot or in the Beale-street lot. The clerk and master reported that the Main-street lot was the better investment, and should be made. This report was confirmed on the 10th of February, 1869, and it was ordered that the Main-street lot should be taken and accepted as an investment of the Market-street property. And it was further ordered that all right, title, and interest of the said Jacob Weller in said Main-street lot should be divested out of him, and vested in said Caroline I. Weller and her children by the said Jacob estate to his wife without qualification or reservation. Groff v. Rohrer, 35 Md. 327.

But he may still retain the power of preventing a disposition of the property.

A conveyance of the homestead by the husband to the wife will not empower her to convey it by an instrument in which the husband does not join, where the statute provides that a conveyance or encumbrance by the owner is of no validity unless the husband, or wife, if the owner is married, concurs in and signs the same joint instrument. Spoon v. Van Fossen, 53 Iowa, 494, 5 N. W. 624.

Under the Indiana statutes, the husband was required to join in the conveyance to alienate the separate estate of a married woman. Sims v. Ricketts, 35 Ind. 181, 9 Am. Rep. 679.

And under a statute which permits a married woman to become seised of land by direct gift or purchase in her own name, and as of her own property, she becomes vested by a gift to her from her husband of the fee in which he retains his marital rights. Mutual F. Ins. Co. v. Deale, 18 Md. 26, 79 Am. Dec. 673.

b. Curtsey.

BINGHAM V. WELLER raises a very interesting question. Does a man, by conveying property to his wife, deprive himself of all rights of curtesy therein? In that case the conveyance was to the sole and separate use of the wife, and the court followed the line of decisions which hold that there are no rights of curtesy in separate estate. But would the same rule apply where the conveyance is not expressly made to the separate use of the wife, but is held to be so by construction? After distinguishing the cases as much as possible, there seems to be some conflict on this question. The terms of the conveyance in some instances have determined the question in favor of or against the right.

Thus, a grant by a man to his wife, which expressly states that it is for the purpose of providing sustenance for him, his wife, and two children now living, and any children which may hereafter be born, does not exclude the grantor from the right to take the personal property at the death of his wife by his right of marriage, or to inherit the real estate under the statutes of descent. Allen v. Westbrook, 16 Lea, 251.

from her husband, which does not become statutory separate estate or equitable separate estate by reason of being conveyed to her sole and separate use, is held subject to her common-law disabilities, so that her husband is entitled to curtesy in it. Zeust v. Staffan, 16 App. D. C. 141.

On the other hand, a man will deprive himself of his rights of curtesy by conveying land to his wife for life with remainder to her heirs, since there can be no curtesy in a life estate. Phillips v. LaForge, 89 Mo. 72, 1 S. W. 220.

So, if property is conveyed to a married woman in such a manner as to give her a power of alienation over it free from the control of her husband, his rights of curtesy do not attach to it if she effects an alienation before her death. Chapman v. Price, 83 Va. 392, 11 S. E. 879.

In Rautenbusch v. Donaldson, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 752, 18 S. W. 536, where the rights of a second husband to land conveyed to the wife by the first one were involved, the court says that where the language used in the conveyance expresses a plain intent to deprive the husband of the right of curtesy his claim to a life estate is barred.

And the question may be solved by the provisions of the statute.

Thus, real estate conveyed to a woman by her husband cannot be held to her sole and separate use under the New Hampshire statutes, and therefore his right of curtesy in it remains unimpaired. Robie v. Chapman, 59 N. H. 41.

But by the Ohio statutes a surviving husband without issue born during coverture is not entitled to curtesy in the lands of his deceased wife as against her issue by a former husband, unless the lands were obtained by gift from himself. Denny v. McCabe, 35 Ohio St. 576.

In New York the woman has the right to dispose of her separate estate during life, but in case she does not do so her husband may have his curtesy.

Therefore, a man is entitled to curtesy in a lot conveyed to his wife through the medium of a third person by deed which makes no mention of his marital rights, where she dies seised of it and leaves no will. Vanderveer v. Vanderveer, 17 N. Y. S. R. 648, 1 N. Y. Supp. 897.

Weller in like manner as they owned the Market-street property under the deed from Henry B. Joiner, and that the title be vested in them and their assigns, forever.

During the pendency of this case Henry Clay and Robert F. died intestate, and without children. Caroline I. Weller has died, leaving her husband, Jacob Weller, and the four children, Mrs. Bingham, John J., Caroline I., and Forrest L.

It is insisted on behalf of Mrs. Bingham that the last proceeding in the court to which we have referred vested the title to the property in Caroline I. Weller and her two children, Mrs. Bingham and John J. Weller, who were alive at the time the deed was made by Joiner in 1851; and hence Mrs. Weller, the mother, and Mrs. Bingham and John J. Weller, were entitled to a one-third interest in common in the Market-street property, and upon the death of her mother she inherited one fourth of her one-third interest; so that her interest in the property is five twelfths of the same.

The argument is that the decree of the court construing the deed of Joiner to Mrs. Weller adjudged that the title to the lot was vested in Mrs. Weller and her children, and all the parties in interest being before the court in that case are bound by its decrees construing the deed and fixing the right of the parties.

The chancellor, in his decree in the present case, however, adjudged that the title to Market-street property was vested in Caroline I. Weller in fee simple.

So, in Clark v. Clark, 24 Barb. 582, it is said with respect to estates acquired during coverture, the rights of curtesy of the husband were not defeated by the statutes establishing separate estates of married women, unless the property was conveyed or devised before the owner's death.

And in Fettiplace v. Gorges, 1 Ves. Jr. 46, it was held that a married woman may dispose of her personal separate estate by law free from any claim of her husband. If no disposition is made the husband succeeds as next of kin, not in consequence of marital rights.

One of the most valuable incidents of separate estate is destroyed if the husband is held to have a right of curtesy therein. He is thereby given practically an absolute veto upon her power of alienation, and the trend of the law would seem to be against the recognition of such right. This is well illustrated by BINGHAM v. WELLER, notwithstanding the fact that in Frazier v. Hightower, 12 Helsk. 94, it is said that it is settled law in Tennessee that a man is entitled to curtesy in the property held by a trustee for the separate use of his wife.

And in Wood v. Polk, 12 Helsk. 222, it is held that to exclude the marital rights of the husband that intention must have been expressly declared. Yet the court in the BINGHAM CASE holds that a man cannot convey property to the separate use of his wife, and still retain a veto power over it.

That decision finds support in decisions from some of the other states.

Thus, a conveyance in trust for the use and benefit of grantor's wife, so that the same shall not be subject in any case to the future control, debts, or liabilities of her present or any future husband, deprives her husband of any right of curtesy in the property. Rigler v. Cloud, 14 Pa. 361.

So, property conveyed by a man to his wife is within the operation of a constitutional provision abolishing his rights of curtesy in her separate estate. Walker v. Long, 109 N. C. 510, 14 S. E. 299.

A husband is not entitled to curtesy in the statutory separate estate of his wife which he has created for her benefit. Ratliff v. Ratliff, 102 Va. 880, 47 S. E. 1007.

A separate estate created in the wife by a conveyance from her husband excludes his rights of curtesy. Dugger v. Dugger, 84 Va. 130, 4 S. E. 171.

Where the husband is not entitled to curtesy in the separate estate of his wife an absolute deed of property from him to her, which vests the title in her as her separate estate, deprives him of his right to curtesy in the property. Sayers v. Wall, 6 Gratt. 373, 21 Am. Rep. 303.

A husband is not entitled to curtesy in an equitable estate of the wife created by himself. Jones v. Jones, 96 Va. 749, 32 S. E. 403. And the court says a husband, if he survives his wife and the common-law requisites exist, is entitled to any curtesy in any real estate held by her as her equitable separate estate which may remain at her death undisposed of by her during the coverture, or by will, under a power to that effect vested in her by the instrument creating the separate estate, just as in any other real estate of inheritance owned by her, unless his marital rights are excluded by such instrument. Where the equitable separate estate is created by the husband, the intention to exclude is presumed, or results from the transaction itself, except so far as he may have reserved his marital rights in the instrument creating the separate estate. The law attaches to every absolute conveyance complete alienation of the entire interest of the grantor so far as the alienation is permitted by the rules of law and equity. Upon this point the law presumes that a husband, by an absolute conveyance creating an equitable separate estate in the wife, intended to vest in her his entire interest in the subject conveyed, including all his marital rights, present and future; and the conveyance is so construed.

But other courts have taken the opposite view.

Thus, where a deed from a man to his wife creates in her an equitable estate he has an estate for life in it as tenant by the curtesy. Such a deed does not convey the estate by the curtesy unless it is so expressed. Ball v. Ball, 20 R. I. 520, 40 Atl. 234.

In Reagle v. Reagle, 179 Pa. 89, 36 Atl. 191, it is assumed that the husband has curtesy in land which he has conveyed to his wife.

In Tremmel v. Kleiboldt, 75 Mo. 255, affirming 6 Mo. App. 549, it was held that the husband had the right of curtesy in real estate

The construction contended for by Mrs. Bingham cuts out the after-born children from any interest in the property, and also cuts out the husband from any interest as tenant by curtesy.

We are of opinion that the language used by the chancellor in fixing the rights of the wife and children of Jacob Weller in the Main-street property intended to place the title and interest in the property exactly as it existed under the deed from Joiner to Caroline I. Weller to the Market-street property. The decree is confusing and contradictory in its terms, in that it vests the title in the Main-street property in the wife and children of Jacob Weller, to be held by them, their heirs and assigns; but it further provides that they should hold it and own it in like manner as they owned and held the Market-street property under the deed from Joiner to them. Now, the deed from Joiner to Caroline I. Weller recites that the property is conveyed to Caroline I. Weller and her "body" heirs; and under the uniform course of our decisions this vested a fee-simple estate in Caroline I. Weller, and vested no estate in her children. Middleton v. Smith, 1 Coldw. 144; Kirk v. Furgerson, 6 Coldw. 483; Wynne v. Wynne, 9 Heisk. 309; Owen v. Hancock, 1 Head, 563.

Under these contradictory terms of the decree, we are of the opinion that the court intended to vest the title to the Main-street lot in Caroline I. Weller in fee-simple, just as she took title to the Market-street lot under the Joiner deed.

conveyed by him to trustees for the sole and separate use of his wife.

A conveyance by a man of real estate to the sole and separate use of his wife does not deprive him of his rights of curtesy, and she has no power to will the property in such a way as to do so. Soltan v. Soltan, 93 Mo. 307, 6 S. W. 95.

A man is entitled to curtesy in the equitable separate estate of his wife. Cornwell v. Orton, 126 Mo. 355, 27 S. W. 536.

A wife cannot deprive the husband of curtesy in her lands by will. Casler v. Gray, 159 Mo. 588, 60 S. W. 1032.

The husband was entitled to curtesy in the equitable estate vested in the wife by a conveyance from him prior to the passage of the married woman's acts. Miller v. Quick, 158 Mo. 495, 59 S. W. 955.

A man is not barred of his rights of curtesy in property which he conveys to his wife by deed of general warranty. Deming v. Miles, 35 Neb. 739, 37 Am. St. Rep. 464, 53 N. W. 665.

In Indianapolis, B & W. R. Co. v. McLaughlin, 77 Ill. 275, it is held that in property conveyed by a man to his wife he has no estate during coverture; but it is intimated that on the birth of a child he may have a tenancy by the curtesy initiate.

A conveyance of real estate by a man to his wife vests in her the equitable title leaving the legal title in him; and upon her death he is entitled to curtesy. Ogden v. Ogden, 60 Ark. 70, 46 Am. St. Rep. 151, 28 S. W. 796.

VIII. Rights against husband's heirs.

If the husband does not attempt to revoke the conveyance during his lifetime the attempt by the heirs to set it aside will meet with little favor.

A conveyance of all his property by a man to his wife upon a strong, meritorious consideration will be upheld in equity against the heirs of the husband. Jones v. Obenchaln, 10 Gratt. 259.

A gift by a man to his wife of all his property will be upheld against his heirs if it is no more than a reasonable provision for the wife. Wood v. Broadley, 76 Mo. 23, 43 Am. Rep. 754.

The heirs of a man cannot assert title in a slave which he procured to be conveyed to his wife in consideration of one which, being her property, came to him by the marriage. Avery v. Avery, 12 Tex. 56, 62 Am. Dec. 513.

Where the intention of a man is clear and manifest to make a gift to his wife equity will uphold it against his personal representatives. Ratliffe v. Dougherty, 24 Miss. 181; Wells v. Treadwell, 28 Miss. 717; Fatheree v. Fletcher, 31 Miss. 265.

In Horder v. Horder, 23 Kan. 391, 83 Am. Rep. 167, the court, in upholding a conveyance of property by a man to his wife as against his heir, says: "Men of sound minds and not under guardianship should have the privilege of disposing of their property as they please, so long as they do not interfere with the rights of creditors, or of persons dependent upon them for support."

In Hartwell v. Jackson, 7 Tex. 576, although there were elements of estoppel in the case, the court seems to have proceeded upon the theory that a man may make a valid bill of sale or deed of gift to his wife, which will be enforced against his heirs.

A gift by a man to his wife of bank shares may be upheld against the claims of his heirs. Adams v. Brackett, 5 Met. 280.

The widow may hold gifts of personal property from her husband, which he has not revoked at the time of his death, against his personal representatives. Fisk v. Cushman, 6 Cush. 20, 52 Am. Dec. 761.

A gift of money by a man to his wife gives her a valid title thereto after his death as against his legal representatives. McCluskey v. Provident Sav. Inst. 103 Mass. 300.

Although the husband retains the legal title to personalty given by him to his wife, upon his death, which removes her disabilities, the title will vest in her eo instanti, and will not descend to his personal representatives. Thomas v. Harkness, 13 Bush, 27, Overruling Bridges v. Wood, 4 Dana, 610.

A gift of land will be sustained in equity as against the heirs of the husband. Majors v. Everton, 89 Ill. 56, 31 Am. Rep. 65.

An absolute gift of property by a man to his wife makes her the absolute owner as against his representatives, and upon his death the legal and equitable titles unite in her so as to permit her to recover possession of the property in an action at law. Underhill v. Morgan, 33 Conn. 105.

If the husband makes an actual gift of

It follows that, upon the death of Caroline I. Weller, her husband, Jacob Weller, became entitled to an estate by curtesy in the Main-street lot; and that, subject to this curtesy interest, the estate vested in the heirs of Mrs. Caroline I. Weller, but no estate vested in them until her death, and then only as her heirs.

As to this feature of the case the decree of the chancellor is reversed and modified so as to give to Jacob Weller a curtesy interest in the Main-street lot or its proceeds.

The title to the Beale-street lot was vested in Caroline I. Weller by deed from her husband, Jacob Weller, executed April 10, 1876. The husband conveys this property to the wife to her sole, separate, and exclusive use as a separate estate, free and discharged from all his control and liabilities, but with full power to her to sell, convey, or mortgage the same at her pleasure. The habendum recites that she is to have and to hold it as separate estate as above stated, with power of alienation, and it contains a general warranty.

It is insisted for complainant that the terms and the language of this deed deprive her husband, Jacob Weller, of any interest in the estate, both during the life of the wife and after her death.

In the answer filed in this case two of the children—Carrie I. and Forrest L.—set out over their signatures that they desire their father, Jacob Weller, to retain possession of this Beale-street lot, and receive the rents therefrom as long as he lives.

money to the wife, which she retains until after his death, though he could have reclaimed it during his lifetime the personal representative cannot recover it of her. Puryear v. Puryear, 12 Ala. 13.

Courts of equity may recognize and enforce contracts between husband and wife in her favor as against his administrator. So that where he purchases slaves in her name, and treats them as her property, during his lifetime, and the property purchased is a reasonable portion for her, equity will uphold the transaction. Williams v. Mauil, 20 Ala. 721.

A gift by a man to his wife will be upheld in equity as against his heirs. Riley v. Riley, 25 Conn. 154. The court says of Dibble v. Hutton, 1 Day, 221, that, so far as it holds a contrary doctrine, the question can no longer be considered as standing where it stood when that case was decided; that that case is an anomaly in the law, and its doctrine is not at this time satisfactory to the profession; that the doctrine of the case so viewed is an illiberal and obsolete relic of the ancient law of baron and feme.

Taking security for money loaned in the joint names of husband and wife will entitle the wife to claim it against the personal representatives of the husband in case he dies leaving the securities outstanding. Christ's Hospital v. Budgin, 2 Vern. 683.

A deposit of money in the name of husband and wife becomes hers upon his decease without disturbing it. Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum v. Strain, 2 Bradf. 34.

A note given by husband to wife may be enforced against his estate. Templeton v. Brown, 86 Tenn. 55, 5 S. W. 441.

But it has been held that equity will not enforce a conveyance to the wife against a child for whom no provision has been made. Crooks v. Crooks, 34 Ohio St. 610.

IX. Homestead and community.

The rule which permits the husband to make valid conveyance to his wife applies to property in which they have a common interest.

Since the passage of the married women's acts a grant by a man to his wife of his interest in property held by entireties with her is valid. Meeker v. Wright, 76 N. Y. 262.

A gift by a man to his wife of the community property is valid. Higgins v. Higgins, 46 Cal. 259; Jackson v. Torrence, 83 Cal. 521, 23 Pac. 695; Carter v. McQuade, 83 Cal. 278, 23 Pac. 348.

A gift by a man to his wife of the community property by purchasing real estate and having the title transferred to her is valid. Peck v. Brummagin, 31 Cal. 440; Wright v. Wright (Cal.) 41 Pac. 695; Alferitz v. Arivillaga, 143 Cal. 646, 77 Pac. 657.

If a man causes a deed for property purchased with community funds to be made to his wife reciting that it is for her separate use, the title will vest in her as her separate estate. McCutchen v. Purlinton, 84 Tex. 604, 19 S. W. 710.

The husband may, by direct conveyance, convert community property into separate estate of his wife. Story v. Marshall, 24 Tex. 305, 76 Am. Dec. 106; Smith v. Boquet, 27 Tex. 507; Lewis v. Simon, 72 Tex. 470, 10 S. W. 554; Callahan v. Houston, 78 Tex. 494, 14 S. W. 1027.

And a deed of community property will convert it into separate estate. Hunter v. Hunter (Tex. Civ. App.) 45 S. W. 820.

A deed by a man to his wife of community property will vest the title in her as against his subsequent grantees. Taylor v. Opperman, 79 Cal. 468, 21 Pac. 869.

But the presumption that the property became the separate property of the wife may be rebutted. Smith v. Strahan, 25 Tex. 100.

And a conveyance by a man to his wife of community property may be shown by parol evidence not to have been intended to become her separate estate, notwithstanding the deed recites the consideration paid out of her separate property, where the recital of consideration was without the knowledge of the grantor. Kahn v. Kahn (Tex. Civ. App.) 56 S. W. 946.

If the property is purchased with community money, and, at the instance of the husband, conveyed to the wife, the presumption is that the property remains community property; but this presumption may be rebutted. Hall v. Hall, 52 Tex. 294, 36 Am. Rep. 725.

Community property conveyed by the husband to a third person, and by the latter to the wife, remains community property. Parker v. Chance, 11 Tex. 513. The court says it is immaterial whether the reconveyance be to the wife or husband, or whether it be to the name of either or both, the property conveyed

It has been held by this court that a deed made by a third person to the wife, her heirs and assigns, forever, to be free from the control and liabilities she may hereafter have, with full power to dispose of the same at all times as she deems proper, does not deprive the husband of this curtesy estate in such property after her death. Carter v. Dale, 3 Lea, 710, 31 Am. Rep. 660; Frazer v. Hightower, 12 Heisk. 94; Baker v. Heiskell, 1 Coldw. 641.

Clearly there is nothing in this deed to deprive the husband of his curtesy interest in this land if the deed had been made by a third person; and this is virtually admitted. But it is said that, inasmuch as the deed was made by the husband to the wife, a different rule prevails.

belongs to the community. The direction of the husband that the deed shall be made out in the name of the wife is not of itself sufficient to rebut the presumption that the property belongs to the community. When the husband intends to relinquish his right in the community property and transfer it to his wife, his act must be explicit and such as to leave no doubt as to his intentions. A mere transfer of the property to a stranger, with directions to reconvey to the wife, will not accomplish the object, and show that a donation was intended.

The presumption is that purchases by a man in the name of his wife with community funds do not change the character of the community property. Smith v. Strahan, 16 Tex. 314, 67 Am. Dec. 622; Higgins v. Johnson, 20 Tex. 389, 70 Am. Dec. 394.

But this presumption may be rebutted by proof of intention to make the property her separate estate. Higgins v. Johnson, 20 Tex. 389, 70 Am. Dec. 394.

So, in Story v. Marshall, 24 Tex. 805, 76 Am. Dec. 106, the court says, in the absence of any intention outside of the deed it must be taken as evidencing the intention which upon its face it imports; that is, to convey to the wife the estate of the husband in the property. The court further says, such a deed must have been intended to have some operation upon the estate of the grantor, and that must be taken to have been to change the estate from community into separate property of the wife, in the absence of evidence of any other or different purpose in the making of the conveyance. To deny it that effect would be to render the deed wholly inoperative and void.

The gift of homestead property by a husband to his wife vests in her the legal estate subject to his rights in the homestead. Oaks v. Oaks, 94 Cal. 66, 29 Pac. 330; Re Lamb, 95 Cal. 397, 30 Pac. 568.

Where, by statute, a husband and wife may enter into an agreement or transaction with each other respecting property, which either might if unmarried, a conveyance to his wife, by a man, of property upon which he has declared a homestead, will vest the title in her, so that upon their separation she will be the former owner, within the provision of a statute requiring the court to assign homestead property to the former owner upon dissolving

The case of Barnum v. Le Master, 110 Tenn. 638, ante, 353, 75 S. W. 1045, is cited to sustain this contention. In that case the court undertook to say what effect should be given a deed from the husband to the wife, and the court held that it should be held to pass to the wife the highest estate that the husband could convey. In the course of the opinion the court uses language as follows: "If a transfer of personal property to the wife by her husband did not, of its own force, vest in her a separate estate, the transfer would be a farce, and perhaps a fraud upon her, because the husband would immediately become again the owner of it by virtue of his marital rights, and the wife would take nothing. If the same result did not follow a conveyance of land by a husband to his

A conveyance of the homestead by the husband to the wife does not render it liable to her prior debts. Green v. Farrar, 53 Iowa, 426, 5 N. W. 557.

Under a statute requiring the acknowledgment of both husband and wife to convey the homestead, the acknowledgment of the wife is not necessary when the homestead is conveyed to her by her husband. Furrow v. Athey, 21 Neb. 671, 59 Am. Rep. 867, 33 N. W. 208; Harsh v. Griffin, 72 Iowa, 608, 34 N. W. 441.

If the wife declares a homestead upon property which has been given her by her husband the title thereto upon the death of the wife becomes vested in the husband. Ions v. Harblson, 112 Cal. 260, 44 Pac. 572.

X. Effect of divorce.

The marital rights of a man in land, which by his direction have been conveyed to his wife, are cut off by a decree of divorce in her favor adjudging him to be the guilty party. Schuster v. Schuster, 93 Mo. 438, 6 S. W. 259.

A settlement of real estate by a man upon his wife will not be set aside because of her subsequent divorce for her previous adultery. Lister v. Lister, 35 N. J. Eq. 49.

When a woman is granted a divorce from bed and board because abandoned by her husband, gifts of real estate which he has made to her will not be restored to him. Orr v. Orr, 8 Bush, 150.

The husband cannot regain the title, although the divorce is granted for the fault of the wife. Kinzey v. Kinzey, 115 Mo. 496, 20 L. R. A. 222, 22 S. W. 497.

But, since it is inequitable that a woman suing for divorce should retain property which has been settled upon her, she may be required by the court to make a reconveyance of it before her prayer for relief will be granted. Oliver v. Oliver, 5 Ala. 75.

And in Fitts v. Fitts, 14 Tex. 443, the court, upon granting a divorce according to the requirements of the Texas statute, placed property which had been conveyed by the husband in trust for the wife in the hands of a trustee to be managed for the benefit of the husband, wife, and children. The court said she derived the property from him. He could not wife, he would, by the same marital rights, become seised of an estate therein during their joint lives; and, if they have a child born alive, for his life, if he survives her as tenant by the curtesy."

It is admitted that in that case the husband and wife were both alive, and he could not, therefore, be tenant by the curtesy; and it is said that the question as to the right of the husband to curtesy, after the wife's death, was not involved in that case.

In Frazer v. Hightower, 12 Heisk. 94, the husband had conveyed to a trustee for his wife certain lands; and the question was whether the husband, after the death of the wife, took an estate by curtesy in the lands so conveyed to the trustee. In that case it was said: "By a fair construction, then, we think that, while Daniel Hightower, by this deed, did surrender to his wife, during the coverture, the rents, profits, and possession of this land, yet, as we have already said, he made no settlement of the estate beyond her lifetime. The death of the wife renders the tenancy by curtesy consummated or complete. Inasmuch, therefore, as this deed makes no settlement of the land in the event of the wife's death but provides only for dominion and control over it during the coverture, the husband thereby abridged his estate for that period only, and, having survived her, he is entitled to take as tenant by the curtesy. We see no reason why he shall not be taken to have intended, when have supposed by his transfer or other deed that he was about to deprive himself of the use of the property. By law he was entitled to the management of the separate property of his wife and to support out of its proceeds, having no property of his own. If there ever was a case when the court would depart from the ordinary rule of decision, and under its power of doing what is just and right make such provision as would meet the extraordinary circumstances of the particular case, this is one which strongly demands the interposition of the court.

XI. Form and provisions of conveyances.

When a deed is not sufficient to pass the estate out of the hands of the conveyer, but the party must come into equity, the court has never yet executed a voluntary agreement. To do so would be to make him who does not sufficiently convey, and his executors after his death, trustees for the person to whom he had so defectively conveyed; and there is no case where a court of equity has ever done that. Whenever you come into equity to raise an interest by way of trust you must have a valuable, or at least a meritorious, consideration. Colman v. Sarrel, 1 Ves. Jr. 54.

In Machen v. Machen, 15 Ala. 373, the court, upon the authority of Gamble v. Gamble, 11 Ala. 986, held that parol declarations by a man that slaves belonged to his wife did not have the effect of vesting the title in her as against his executors.

And the Machen Case was followed in Friereson v. Friereson, 21 Ala. 549, and Machen v. Machen, 38 Ala. 364.

A gift of notes and mortgages by husband to wife may be effected by handing them to her with directions to take care of them, accompanied with the statement that they are for the donee and the children. Mack v. Mack, 8 Hun, 325, 5 Thomp. & C. 530.

The settlement must be in such form as to place the property within the power and under the control of the wife. Townsend v. Maynard, 45 Pa. 198.

To be enforced in equity a bill of sale from husband to wife must have been delivered. Dyer v. Bean, 15 Ark. 519.

A mere written transfer upon the back of a mortgage without seal, although it purported to be a sealed transfer, is not sufficient to vest any interest in the wife. Tiffany v. 69 L. R. A.

Clarke, 6 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 474. The court says that where a gift is intended to be made of property, but in the mode in which it is intended to be made it is imperfect, a court of equity will not compel the donor or his representatives to complete it. The court admits that a husband may make a gift to his wife, and that the intention to do so was manifest, but states that the gift was imperfect. All was not done that might have been done; and the court will not, at the instance of a volunteer, compel its completion.

A provision in a conveyance by a man to his wife that the property shall revert to him upon her death without having disposed of the property will be given effect. Pollard v. Union Nat. Bank, 4 Mo. App. 408.

If the conveyance to the wife is made under the express agreement on her part to reconvey to the husband on his request, she has no interest which will descend to her heirs. Cotton v. Wood, 25 Iowa, 43.

The mere fact that a deed of separation provides that no suit shall be brought against the husband on behalf of the wife to compel him to make her a further allowance does not preclude her, in case of her bringing a bill for divorce because of his subsequent adultery, demanding alimony from his estate. Morrall v. Morrall, L. R. 6 Prob. Div. 98.

A gift from husband to wife will not bar dower unless given with a condition to that effect, or granted as a jointure. Bubler v. Roberts, 49 Me. 460; Reed v. Dickerman, 12 Pick. 148.

Where a man who, by marriage articles, had agreed that his wife should have a third of his personal property in case of his death, gave to her during his lifetime certain annuities which she claimed to hold in addition to the portion provided for by the articles, the court said that the transfer is not a good transfer so as to affect the marriage articles by making an alteration in the gross estate of the testator, the whole of which was liable by the marriage articles to be divided into such proportions which he could not voluntarily alter, and therefore this grant is a fraud on the articles, yet it is good as against the testator himself, and to be answered out of his testamentary share if sufficient; and in this court gifts between husband and wife have often been supported, though the law does not allow the property to pass. Lucas v. Lucas, 1 Atk. 270.

he made this conveyance to his wife, that she was to hold the estate as every estate of inheritance is held by a wife; that is, subject to curtesy."

Referring again to the case of Barnum v. Le Master, the court said, in support of its holding that "otherwise the wife would not only be deprived of all the fruits of ownership during all this time (that is, during the marital relation), but she could not sell or convey it without his consent and joinder in the conveyance. A power in the husband over the disposition of the property often enables him to control and reacquire title by reducing to possession the proceeds of the sale of it. The wife would acquire a bare right to sell with the concurrence of her husband while he lived, and only comes into full ownership and enjoyment in the event she should survive him. An estate more in the nature of a remainder than an absolute one taking effect immediately, which the deed purports to pass, and wholly inconsistent with the terms of the instrument."

We are of opinion that the conveyance of real estate by the husband to the wife should have the same effect as the gift or transfer of personal property,—that is, to divest out of the husband all interest, present or contingent, in the land; and upon the death of the wife the real estate should go to the devisees of the wife, if she make a will, and, if she die intestate, to her heirs, free from any claim on the part of the husband for curtesy or other interest; and that the case of a conveyance from a husband to the wife of real estate must, to this extent, be distinguished from a conveyance by a third person to the wife for her separate estate.

This case is distinguishable from the case of Carter v. Dale, 3 Lea, 710, 31 Am. Rep. 660, which was a conveyance from a third person to the wife, and not from the husband.

This case is distinguishable, also, from the case of Frazer v. Hightower, 12 Heisk. 94. In the latter case the conveyance was in trust for the wife, and the court construed the language of the conveyance to indicate that the object of the husband was merely to secure to the wife the rents and profits of her real estate during the marital relation, and no longer.

The decree of the chancellor as to the Beale-street property is also reversed; Jacob Weller having no interest therein or claim thereon.

The costs of appeal will be paid equally by complainants and defendants, and of the court below as directed by that court, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings under this holding and the agreements of parties heretofore made, as shown by the record.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Missouri, Respt.,

v.

Jasper COLEMAN, Appt.

1. That threats made by one on trial for murder to kill his victim were made a year or eighteen months before the homicide does not render evidence of them inadmissible.
2. The jury in a murder case cannot infer that a verdict was rendered by a coroner's jury, merely because the prosecuting attorney asked a witness whether or not he, as a member of such jury, did not render such verdict, which question the witness was not permitted to answer, so as to make the conduct of the prosecuting attorney ground for reversal.
3. In the absence of exception to the conduct of the prosecuting attorney NOTE.—As to homicide by officers of justice, see also, in this series, State v. Phillips, 67 L. R. A. 292, and note.

As to admissibility of record of coroner's inquest in evidence, see also United States L. Ins. Co. v. Kleigast, 6 L. R. A. 65; Consolidated Ice Mach. Co. v. Kelfer, 10 L. R. A. 696; and Cox v. Royal Tribe of Joseph, 60 L. R. A. 620. 69 L. R. A.

in reading the verdict of a coroner's jury in propounding a question to a witness, the supreme court will not set aside a verdict of guilty in a murder case merely because the coroner's verdict stated that the homicide for which accused was on trial was unjustified.

4. A police officer who kills a person whom he is attempting to arrest is guilty of a criminal offense if he uses more force than is reasonably necessary to effect his purpose.
5. Charging the jury as to the effect of verbal statements of accused, when there is no evidence that he made any, is not reversible error, where the facts disclosed by the record show that accused was not prejudiced thereby.
6. It is misleading to charge that municipal ordinances do not justify the shooting of a person by an officer in attempting to arrest him for their violation, in connection with a charge that the ordinances are admissible to prove the good faith of the officer in attempting to effect the arrest.
7. An instruction contained in the general charge need not, at the instance of the parties, be repeated in special instructions.
8. Mere failure of a person to submit to arrest does not give the officer the right to take his life, although the oflicer has good reason to believe that he has authority to make the arrest; and, if the officer acts in malice and with premeditation because the one he is attempting to arrest does not remove his hand from his pocket upon command, the officer will be guilty of murder in the second degree.

9. Failure to give an instruction which is not requested upon a matter to which the attention of the court is not called is not reversible error.

10. Instructions predicated on facts which do not exist are properly refused.

11. The omission of the recital that an information for murder is upon the oath of the prosecuting attorney is fatal to its validity.

12. The question of the invalidity of an information may be raised for the first time in the appellate court.

13. Failure of the clerk to indorse the word "Filed" upon an affidavit is a mere irregularity which may be amended at any time before or during trial, and objection to it cannot be made for the first time on appeal.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Chariton County convicting him of murder. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Ball & Sparrow and A. W. Johnson, for appellant:

The reading of the verdict of a coroner's jury as evidence is error in any cause, civil or criminal.

State v. Garth, 164 Mo. 553, 65 S. W. 275.

The fact that the court permitted the verdict of the coroner's jury to be read in the form of a question, and then sustained an objection by defendant, does not cure the error.

State v. Thomas, 99 Mo. 235, 12 S. W. 643; State v. Kuehner, 93 Mo. 193, 6 S. W. 118; State v. Fredericks, 85 Mo. 145; State v. Mia, 15 Mo. 153.

It was the duty of defendant, under the facts in this case, to arrest the deceased. Therefore, as such officer, he must, of necessity, have been the aggressor. As such officer it was his duty to use sufficient force to accomplish the arrest, and he must, of necessity, have been the judge of the force necessary to make the arrest, and to bring the deceased within his control.

State v. Dierberger, 96 Mo. 666, 9 Am. St. Rep. 380, 10 S. W. 168; 2 Bishop, Crim. Law, 6th ed. §§ 647, 651, pp. 354, 356; State v. Rose, 142 Mo. 418, 44 S. W. 329; State v. Lane, 158 Mo. 572, 59 S. W. 965; State v. McNally, 87 Mo. 644.

The information omits the words, "on his oath aforesaid," and is insufficient.

State v. Furgerson, 152 Mo. 92, 53 S. W. 427; 1 Bishop, Crim. Proc. 2d ed. § 712, p. 442; State v. Stacy, 103 Mo. 11, 15 S. W. 147; State v. Meyers, 99 Mo. 107, 12 S. W. 516.

Messrs. Edward C. Crow, Attorney General, and C. D. Corum, for respondent:

The competency of threats is not affected by remoteness.

State v. McNally, 87 Mo. 644; State v. Glahn, 97 Mo. 679, 11 S. W. 260; Underhill, Crim. Ev. p. 392.

The rule that an officer has the right, in making an arrest, to use all the force necessary to overcome resistance, even to the taking of life, does not apply as to a misdemeanor.

State v. Dierberger, 96 Mo. 666, 9 Am. St. Rep. 380, 10 S. W. 168; 2 Bishop, Crim. Law, § 649; State v. McMullin, 170 Mo. 629, 71 S. W. 221.

Burgess, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the September term, 1903, of the circuit court of Chariton county, the defendant was convicted of murder in the second degree, and his punishment fixed at twenty years' imprisonment in the penitentiary, under an information filed in the circuit court of said county by the prosecuting attorney of said county, charging him with having shot to death with a pistol at said county on the 8th day of August, 1903, one Rufus Cox, against the peace and dignity of the state. Defendant appeals.

The facts, briefly stated, are that at the time of the homicide the defendant was marshal of the town of Dalton, in said county. Deceased lived in the county, and on the day he was killed had gone to Dalton, taking some fish with him for sale, and was vending them upon the sidewalks of the town, in violation of a resolution of the board of aldermen of the town, which the marshal understood had theretofore been adopted. When Cox arrived in town he established himself upon the sidewalk, and began selling his fish. The defendant, as marshal, advised Cox that an ordinance had been passed prohibiting the use of the pavement for such purposes, and requested him to move his fish to some other place. It seems that the deceased at first demurred, but finally reluctantly removed his fish, at the request of the defendant, to the inside of a store, and remained in the store until late in the afternoon, when he again placed his fish upon the sidewalk. The defendant again remonstrated with him against using the sidewalk for the purpose, and attempted to get him to remove his fish. This the deceased declined to do, whereupon the defendant attempted to arrest him and lead him away, in pursuance of which defendant laid his hands upon the deceased upon three different occasions, and on each occasion the deceased freed himself from the grasp of defendant. The testimony on behalf of the state tends to show that the deceased did little more than decline to accompany the defendant, and that because of his declination, and without other provocation, the defendant drew his pistol from his pocket and shot him to death. The evidence shows that the defendant fired four shots, from the effects of which the deceased immediately died. The evidence on behalf of the defendant tends to show that after he had tried to place the deceased in his custody the deceased put his hand in his pocket, and that thereupon the mortal shot was fired. The defendant states on direct examination that he shot deceased in order to protect himself from bodily harm, but his cross-examination shows that he shot the deceased because the deceased failed to remove his hand from his pocket when defendant requested him to do so. His own testimony does not suggest that he was in imminent danger of attack, or that he had any cause to believe that he was in imminent danger. His whole testimony goes to show that he murdered the deceased because the deceased would not remove his hand from his pocket.

There are a number of assignments of error which we do not think of sufficient importance to demand our attention, for in no event could the judgment be reversed because of the rulings of the court below upon them, so that we will direct our attention to such matters as seem to require more serious consideration.

The first of these is in relation to the testimony of one James Winkler, a witness for the state, who testified over the objections of defendant to threats made by defendant a year or eighteen months before the trial that he was going to shoot Rufus Cox, having prepared himself with a shotgun for the purpose, and was lying in wait for him, but that the witness discovered defendant, and dissuaded him from his purpose. The contention is that the threats were too remote to be competent, and especially so since there was no evidence of any threats or bad blood on the part of the defendant since that time. But it is well settled that, in trials for murder, threats made by the defendant towards the deceased are competent, and the nearness or remoteness of the time when made to the date of the homicide does not affect their competency as evidence. State v. Adams, 76 Mo. 357; State v. Grant, 79 Mo. 137, 49 Am. Rep. 218; State v. McNally, 87 Mo. 644; State v. Glahn, 97 Mo. 679, 11 S. W. 260. 60 L. R. A.

Defendant complains of the action of the court in permitting the attorney for the state to read to the court in the presence of the jury the verdict of the coroner's jury. It was not read in evidence, but the attorney for the state asked witness Davenport whether he, as a member of the coroner's jury, returned a certain verdict. The question was objected to, and the objection sustained. No objection was made to the action of the prosecuting attorney in propounding the question. Under such circumstances, it should not be assumed that the jury could have inferred that the witness returned such a verdict as the attorney for the state suggested, nor could the jury have inferred that the witness returned any verdict as a member of the coroner's jury. While statements of attorneys in the presence of a trial jury, or questions they propound, are not evidence, they should not be permitted to make statements or ask questions from which the jury could infer that the matter about which such statements may be made, or questions asked, is in fact true. But we do not think any such inference could have been drawn by the jury in this instance. Had the witness answered that he did return such a verdict, there would be more merit in the contention. There is no question but that the verdict of the coroner's jury was inadmissible for any purpose, and when the prosecuting attorney asked the witness if he returned the verdict, to wit, "Upon formal inquiry concerning the facts, and careful examination of the body, we find the deceased came to his death by a wound from a pistol fired from the hands of Jasper Coleman, of Dalton, Missouri, and from evidence we find that the killing of Rufus Cox by Jasper Coleman was unjustified," objection was made by defendant, and was promptly sustained by the court. The killing is admitted, but attempted to be justified upon the ground of self-defense, so that, if defendant was in any way prejudiced by propounding the question to the witness with respect to the verdict, and reading the verdict in the presence of the jury, it was by the use of the words that the killing "was unjustified," at the conclusion of the verdict, but we do not think the verdict should be set aside on that ground. And, as there was no exception taken to the action of the prosecuting attorney in propounding the question, we do not think he was guilty of such impropriety as would justify this court in interfering with the verdict upon that ground,—especially as the trial court refused to set aside the verdict on that ground. Hollenbeck v. Missouri P. & Co. 141 Mo. 97, 38 S. W. 723, 41 S. W. 887.

It is said for defendant that the evidence was insufficient, under all the facts in the case, to convict the defendant of any offense with which he is charged in the information. That the defendant was an officer of the law, and that the deceased knew him to be such, are clear. It is equally clear, under the facts of this case, that it was the duty of defendant, as such officer, to arrest the deceased, and to use sufficient force to accomplish the arrest, and bring the deceased within his control; but, if he used more force than was reasonably necessary for that purpose, and killed Cox, he was guilty of a criminal offense, its grade depending upon the facts and circumstances in evidence. State v. Dierberger, 96 Mo. 666, 9 Am. St. Rep. 380, 10 S. W. 168; State v. Rose, 142 Mo. 418, 44 S. W. 329; State v. Lane, 158 Mo. 572, 59 S. W. 965. There was, we think, an abundance of evidence to take the case to the jury upon this feature of the case.

It is also claimed by defendant that the court erred in giving instruction No. 4, because of the want of testimony upon which to base it. It reads as follows: "(4) Court instructs the jury that, if verbal statements of the defendant have been proved in the case, you may take them into consideration, with all the other facts and circumstances proved. What the proof may show you, if anything, that the defendant has said against himself, the law presumes to be true, because said against himself; but anything you may believe from the evidence the defendant said in his own behalf you are not obliged to believe, but you may treat the same as true or false, when considered with a view to all the other facts and circumstances in the case." Conceding that there was no evidence upon which to base the instruction, we are not inclined to think the judgment should be reversed upon that ground. Certainly this could not be done unless the error was prejudicial to defendant, and, while the presumption is that an error made against a defendant when on trial for crime is prejudicial, this presumption may be overcome by the facts and circumstances in evidence, if sufficient, and we can but conclude from the facts disclosed by the record that the error was not prejudicial. In fact, we are unable to see in what way defendant was prejudiced, and we are of the opinion that he was not; hence the error was not prejudicial.

Instruction numbered 8, given on the part of the state, is also complained of. This instruction reads as follows: "The records and ordinances, and as well, also, the verbal testimony of Mayor Seigle, have been admitted in evidence before the jury as tending to prove defendant's good faith in attempting to arrest deceased; but the jury are instructed that under the said ordinances and records the selling of fish, or an obstruction of the sidewalk, did not constitute an offense thereunder, and does not justify or excuse the defendant for shooting deceased." This instruction seems to us to be misleading, in that, while it tells the jury that the records, ordinances, and the verbal testimony of Mayor Seigle are admitted in evidence as tending to prove defendant's good faith in attempting to arrest deceased, it proceeds to say, "but . . . under said ordinances and records the selling of fish, or an obstruction of the sidewalk, did not constitute an offense thereunder, and does not justify or excuse the defendant for shooting deceased," and so couples the absence of excuse for shooting deceased with the preceding part of the instruction as to neutralize the question of good faith on the part of defendant in his efforts to make the arrest. In a word, want of excuse, as here used, seems to be inconsistent with good faith.

It is insisted by defendant that instruction numbered 9, given on the part of the state, is erroneous, in that it omits the question of reasonable doubt; but this question is covered by one general instruction given upon the part of the state, by which the jury were told that before they could convict the defendant they must find him guilty as charged, beyond a reasonable doubt. This was all that was necessary. It is not essential that it should be repeated in any other instruction.

It seems that the court struck out that part of instruction numbered 11 asked by defendant which told the jury that defendant had the right to take the life of the deceased in the event of the failure of deceased to submit to arrest, and then gave it, and, in so doing, defendant insists, committed error. If the attempt to arrest deceased had been for felony committed by him, defendant's contention would be correct; but, where the attempt to arrest is for a misdemeanor or breach of the peace, "it is not lawful to kill the party accused if he fly from the arrest, though he cannot otherwise be overtaken, and though there be a warrant to apprehend him. . . . But, as in case of felony, so here, if the officer meet with resistance and kill the offender in the struggle, he will be justified." 1 East, P. C. 302. "When, as a general proposition, one refuses to submit to arrest after he has been touched by the officer, or endeavors to break away after the arrest is effected, he may be lawfully killed, provided this extreme measure is necessary." 2 Bishop, Crim. Law, § 647. In the case of State v. Dierberger, 96 Mo. 666, 9 Am. St. Rep. 380, 10 S. W. 168, it was said: "These authors, ancient and modern, lay down the law in substantially the same terms. They show that the protection which an officer is entitled to receive is a different thing from self-defense. The officer, when making an arrest, may, of course, defend himself, as may any other person who is assaulted, but the law does not stop here. The officer must of necessity be the aggressor. His mission is not accomplished when he wards off the assault. He must press forward and accomplish his object. He is not bound to put off the arrest until a more favorable time. Because of these duties devolved upon him, the law throws around him a special protection. As we said in the recent case of State v. Fuller, 96 Mo. 165, 9 S. W. 583, his duty is to overcome all resistance and bring the party to be arrested under physical restraint, and the means he may use must be coextensive with the duty." State v. Rose, 142 Mo. 418, 44 S. W. 329. But in the case at bar the deceased was not guilty of either a felony or misdemeanor, nor even of the violation of the town ordinances; and the court, in effect, so declared. But defendant had the right to arrest for the violation of a town ordinance committed in his presence, had such been the case. Deceased had been selling, or offering for sale, fish on the sidewalks, to defendant's personal knowledge, and in his presence, whereupon he reported the fact to the chairman of the town board, who advised him that it would be necessary to go and kindly ask Mr. Cox to take his fish off the sidewalk, and, if he refused to do so, it would be his duty to remove the fish from the sidewalk himself, and, in case he became loud or noisy or swearing, he should arrest him for disturbing the peace of the town; and, in attempting to comply with the direction of the chairman of the board, the homicide occurred, as before stated. It thus seems that defendant had good reason to believe that he had the authority to arrest deceased, and if, when making such arrest, he was acting in good faith, and deceased resisted, he had the right to apply force to accomplish it; and if it became necessary to kill him to save his own life or person from great bodily harm, he had a right to do so. State v. McNally, 87 Mo. 644. As was, in effect, said in State v. Dierberger, 96 Mo. 666, 9 Am. St. Rep. 380, 10 S. W. 168, the defendant had a right, in his effort to make the arrest, to use all force that was necessary to overcome all resistance, even to the taking of life; and, if 69 L. R. A.

he used no more force than was reasonably necessary to then and there accomplish the arrest, then he should be acquitted. But although defendant may have believed he had authority to arrest the deceased, yet if, in so doing, he used more force than was reasonably necessary to accomplish the arrest, and shot and killed the deceased in malice and with premeditation because he did not remove his hand from his pocket when commanded to do so by defendant, defendant was guilty of murder in the second degree, unless acting in self-defense. But if defendant used more force than was reasonably necessary in making the arrest, he was guilty of manslaughter in the fourth degree. State v. Rose, 142 Mo. 418, 44 S. W. 329. But no instruction was asked on manslaughter in the fourth degree, nor was the court's attention called to its failure to instruct upon the law of the case; hence there was no error in its failure to do so. State v. Cantlin, 118 Mo. 100, 23 S. W. 1091; State v. Waters, 156 Mo. 132, 56 S. W. 734; State v. Furgerson, 162 Mo. 668, 63 S. W. 101.

Defendant insists that the court erred in refusing to give the first, second, third, and fourth instructions asked by him. These instructions are all predicated on the theory that the deceased was violating an ordinance of the town when defendant attempted to arrest him, when in fact there was no ordinance prohibiting the sale of fish on the streets of said town, and were therefore properly refused.

Another contention is that the information is bad, in that it only charges manslaughter in the fourth degree, if in fact it charged any offense at all. The objection to the information is that it does not conclude, "and so the said L. N. Dempsey, prosecuting attorney within and for Chariton county, Missouri, as aforesaid, upon his oath, says that he, the said Jasper Coleman, him, the said Rufus Cox, in the manner and form and by the means aforesaid," etc., but omits the words "upon his oath says," etc. Indictments for murder concluding substantially the same way have frequently been held bad by this court. State v. Meyers, 99 Mo. 107, 12 S. W. 516; State v. Stacy, 103 Mo. 11, 15 S. W. 147; State v. Furgerson, 152 Mo. 92, 53 S. W. 427. At common law all indictments for murder were prosecuted by indictment, and concluded as follows: "And so the jurors aforesaid upon their oath aforesaid do say that the said A. B., him, and the said E. F., in manner and form aforesaid, feloniously, wilfully, and of his [own] malice aforethought, did kill and murder." 1 Whar- ton, Prec. of Indictments & Pleas, 114; 5

Chitty, Crim. Law, 738; Kelley, Crim. Law & Pr. 309. In State v. Meyers, 99 Mo. 107, 12 S. W. 516, Sherwood, J., in speaking for the court, said: "All the authorities show the proper conclusion of an indictment for murder marks the feature of that offense which distinguishes it from manslaughter. Without such conclusion, the previous words charge but the latter offense. 2 Bishop, Crim. Proc. §§ 536, 548, 550; 3 Chitty, Crim. Law, 243, 737. Hence the importance of the conclusion in the count for murder. That conclusion, in order to be valid, charges murder as the result of the previously made allegations." Without such conclusion, the offense charged would be but manslaughter. In 2 Hawkins, Pleas of the Crown, pp. 369, 370, it is said: "Having already, in the chapter of indictments, incidentally shown the principal points relating to this matter, I shall only take notice in this place that, seeing an information differs from an indictment in little more than this: That the one is found by the oath of twelve men, and the other is not so found, but is only the allegation of the officer who exhibits it, whatsoever certainty is requisite in an indictment, the same, at least, is necessary also in an information; and consequently, as all the material parts of the crime must be precisely found in the one, so must they be precisely alleged in the other, and not by way of argument or recital." In State v. Kelm, 79 Mo. 515, it is said that an information differs principally from an indictment in this: That an indictment is an accusation found by the oath of twelve men, whereas an information is only the allegation of the officer who exhibits it; citing Bacon, Abr. pp. 167-170, 174; 2 Hawk. P. C. 26, § 4. Therefore, being of the same dignity, and for the same purpose, they must, in cases of murder, be governed in their material allegations by the same law. Therefore the information is invalid, and, being so, the question may be properly raised for the first time in this court; and, while it cannot be amended in this court, it may be amended as to matter of form or substance at any time by leave of court before trial. Rev. Stat. 1899, § 2481. Our conclusion is that an information for murder should conclude, "And so the prosecuting attorney aforesaid upon his oath does say that the said ——— him, the said ———, in manner and form, feloniously, deliberately, premeditatedly, and of his malice aforethought, did kill and murder."

Depositing of the affidavit of Robert Cox with the clerk of the circuit court of the county was sufficient filing, within the meaning of § 2477, Rev. Stat. 1899. But, even 69 L. R. A.

if it were not, the failure of the clerk to indorse upon it "Filed," and the date thereof, was at most an irregularity which could have been amended at any time before or during trial, and cannot be raised for the first time in this court.

For these intimations, the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

Brace, P. J., and Fox and Lamm, J.J., concur. Valliant, J., concurs, except as to the state's fourth instruction, which he thinks is erroneous. Gantt, J., concurs in all that is said, except as to the form of the information, from which he dissents. Marshall, J., absent.

Gantt, J., dissenting:

As said by my learned brother, I concur in all the conclusions reached by him in the foregoing opinion, save and except that the information is invalid for the sole reason that the prosecuting attorney, in his conclusion, does not say, "And so L. N. Dempsey, prosecuting attorney as aforesaid, upon his oath, or official oath doth say," etc. It will be observed that all the words of a proper conclusion of an indictment for murder are employed by the prosecuting attorney, save and except the words "upon his oath," or "official oath." There is no difference of opinion amongst us as to the necessity of concluding an indictment for murder with the words, "and so the grand jurors, upon their oath aforesaid, do say that he [the said defendant, naming him] wilfully, deliberately, premeditatedly, and of his malice aforethought, him [the said deceased, naming him], in the manner and form and by the means aforesaid, did kill and murder, against the peace and dignity of the state." Such was the essential requirement of the common law, and when the people of Missouri, in their organic law, ordained "that no person shall, for felony, be proceeded against criminally otherwise than by indictment," they meant an indictment as understood at common law. Long prior to the adoption of our Constitution the word "indictment" had been construed, and was well understood by our people; and it had uniformly been held that, in an indictment for murder, it was essential that it should conclude, "and so the grand jurors, upon their oath, do say," etc. The settled construction from Coke down to State v. Meyers, 99 Mo. 107, 12 S. W. 516, I accept, and have followed during my incumbency here.

The question here is, Are those words "upon his oath," or "upon his official oath," as necessary to a valid information for murder since the adoption of the amendment permitting the prosecution of murder by information as they are in an indictment? The conclusion of the majority of my brethren is that they are, and that the information in this case is invalid for that reason. With the utmost respect for the judgment of my colleagues on this point, I am constrained by my investigation to take the contrary view, and dissent. At the outset, I agree that both at common law and under our Constitution an information should and must be as certain and definite as to its statement of the essential facts constituting an offense as an indictment, because the defendant is entitled to know the nature and cause of the accusation against him, in order to enable him to prepare his defense. 2 Hawk. P. C. p. 369; Wharton, Crim. Pl. 9th ed. § 87. It will hardly be controverted that this information measures up strictly to every requisite of a good common-law indictment as to the statement of every fact necessary to advise the defendant of the nature and cause of the accusation against him. The only possible objection urged against it, or that can be lodged against it, is that the prosecuting attorney, who preferred the information in his official character, did not repeat his conclusion that "upon his oath" or "official oath," he made the charge of murder.

As I understand the reasoning of my brethren, it is held that, because an indictment was required to conclude that, "upon the oath of the grand jurors," the charge of murder was made, it must follow that, where an information is resorted to by the prosecuting attorney, he must conclude by saying "upon his oath," or "official oath," that he makes the charge. I have already adverted to the fact that we have held that an indictment for murder must conclude with a charge that the defendant did kill and murder, upon the oath of the grand jurors, because we have adopted the common-law indictment. The same reasoning necessarily applies to an information, for, when we incorporated an information, in the Constitution, as a mode of prosecuting felonies, we likewise imported it from the common law, and, by the same token, it must be understood in its common-law sense. State v. Kyle, 166 Mo. 303, 56 L. R. A. 115, 65 S. W. 763; Ex parte Slater, 72 Mo. 102; State v. Kelm, 79 Mo. 515. Bishop in his new Criminal Procedure, Vol. 1, 4th ed. § 144, says: "The criminal information should be deemed to be such, and such only, as in England is presented by the attorney or solicitor general. This part of the English common law has plainly become ours. And as, with us, the powers which in England are exercised by the attorney general and 69 L. R. A.

the solicitor general are largely distributed among our district attorneys, whose office does not exist in England, they would seem to be entitled, under our common law, to prosecute by information, as a right adhering to their office, and without leave of court." This statement of Bishop met the express sanction of this court in State v. Kyle, 166 Mo. 306, 56 L. R. A. 115, 65 S. W. 763.

Having settled that the information of our Constitution is the common-law information, in the absence of a statute prescribing a form or additional safeguards, let us inquire what was the form of the common-law information. A form for an information for murder at common law is not to be found, because murder was prosecuted by indictment of a grand jury; but obviously it was the purpose of the people, in adopting information as a method of procedure, to adopt the common-law information, as far as applicable to the prosecution of felonies. Nowhere in the criminal informations of the common law was the attorney general or solicitor general or the Crown officer of the King required to allege that "upon his oath of office," or "upon his official oath," he gave the court to understand and be informed that an offense had been committed. Mr. Bishop, in his first volume of New Criminal Procedure, § 712, says "that only in formal parts, at the beginning and close, does this information differ from an indictment." But it does differ in these respects. The reason, I submit, is this: When the attorney general in England filed his information, he did so virtute officii, and it was an official act; and the courts took ex officio notice of his office, and of his right to file and prosecute the offense without leave of the court. As the law never requires a useless thing, why should he have been required to state that his official act was under his official oath? The answer is, the courts of England never required him to allege that he preferred an information upon his oath of office. Whenever he filed an information, it was his official act, and was done under the sanction of his oath of office; and so I say the same official character is stamped upon the information filed by the prosecuting attorneys. The courts are bound to recognize their official acts, without alleging the nontraversable statement that they have filed their informations under their oaths of office. Our statute (Rev. Stat. 1899, § 2535) provides that no indictment or information shall be deemed invalid for want of the averment of any matter not necessary to be proved. Every circuit court is bound to take judicial notice of the incumbent of the office of prosecuting attorney in the counties in which it is held, and it is entirely unnecessary to prove the prosecuting attorney's title to the office, or that what he asserts as such officer is under his oath of office. State v. Sickle, Brayton (Vt.) 132; Territory v. Cutinola, 4 N. M. 305, 14 Pac. 809; 3 Burn, Justice of the Peace, 911; 1 Chitty, Crim. Law, 845, 847. In Kelm's Case, 79 Mo. 515, it was pointed out that "the text-books are uniform in defining an information to be an accusation or complaint exhibited against a person for some criminal offense, 'either immediately against the King, or against a private person, which, from its enormity or dangerous tendency, the public good requires should be restrained and punished, and differs principally from an indictment in this: That an indictment is an accusation found by the oath of twelve men, whereas an information is only the allegation of the officer who exhibits it.' 5 Bacon, Abr. pp. 167, 170, 172; 2 Hawk. P. C. chap. 26, § 4." The usual and accepted formula was that the attorney general, or the solicitor general if the office of attorney general was vacant, and in certain cases the Crown officer in the King's bench as a matter of right, and without leave of court, filed the information, and, in behalf of the King, "gave the court to understand and be informed that the defendant, at," etc., committed the particular offense. It was required that he state with certainty all the material parts of the alleged crime, and not by way of argument or recital, but it was not necessary for him to state that he made such allegations under his official oath, either in the commencement or conclusion of his information. Whereas, as the grand jury could only make their presentment under their oath, it was essential that their indictment should show that they charged the defendant by virtue of their oath. As said by Judge Sherwood in State v. Meyers, 99 Mo., loc. cit. 116, 12 S. W. 518: "Of course, if a crime is to be charged, it must be done by the grand jurors upon their oaths. It does not appear that the grand jurors have charged murder in the conclusion before us." In that case the conclusion altogether omitted any charge by the grand jurors under their oath, but merely stated, "and so said Charles Meyers and John Bogard in manner and form," etc. Whereas in this case the conclusion is, "And so the said L. N. Dempsey, prosecuting attorney within and for Chariton county, Missouri, as aforesaid, says that he, the said Jasper Coleman, him, the said Rufus Cox, in the manner and form and by the means aforesaid, feloniously, wilfully, deliberately, premeditatedly, and of his malice aforethought, at the county of Chariton, in 69 L. R. A.

the state of Missouri, on the 8th day of August, 1903, did kill and murder, against the peace and dignity of the state." The only omission, therefore, that can be suggested, is the failure to state that "upon his oath aforesaid" he makes said information and charge. It was pointed out in Rex v. Wilkes, 4 Burr. 2527, by Lord Mansfield, that there is a difference between informations and indictments. Indictments are found upon the oaths of a grand jury, and can only be amended by themselves. Whereas, "informations are as declarations in the King's suit." I have, after the most careful research, been unable to find any case in which at common law it was ruled that it was essential to the validity of an information that the attorney general or solicitor general or the Crown officer of the King's bench should state that he made his charge "upon his oath," or "official oath;" and, as we have no statute prescribing such a form, I think it should be ruled that such an allegation is not essential, and that this objection to this information is not tenable. That the prosecuting attorneys of the several counties in this state may prosecute by information, as a right adhering to their office, and without leave of the court, is now the accepted law of this state. State v. Kelm, 79 Mo. 516, 517; State v. Ransberger, 106 Mo. 145, 17 S. W. 290; State v. Kyle, 166 Mo. 303, 56 L. R. A. 115, 65 S. W. 763. Prosecuting attorneys are officers whose duties and terms of office are prescribed by law, and the several courts take judicial knowledge of the incumbent of this office in the several counties. When, therefore, a prosecuting attorney files an information in a criminal cause, he is presumed to do so by virtue of his office, and it is not necessary for him to allege his right to do so. As he is authorized by his official position to file an information and prosecute the alleged offender, the presumption is that when, as in this case, he informs the court in his official character, as prosecuting attorney, it should be held that what he alleges is under and by virtue of his oath of office; and no good reason can be seen why he should allege that he makes the information upon his oath, or official oath, as the very filing in his official character necessarily implies that he does so in obedience to the obligations of his official oath, and in the performance of the duties of his office. As already said, the information in this case having been made by the prosecuting attorney in his official character, it would add nothing to the security of the defendant for that officer to state that he charged the defendant with the offense upon his oath as such officer. All that he alleges, all that he charges, must be conclusively presumed to be upon that oath, which was one of the prerequisites to his qualifications for the office itself.

To guard against groundless and vindictive prosecutions, and to secure good faith in the institution of criminal proceedings, the general assembly has required the information to be verified by the prosecuting attorney or some competent witness; but I submit this is the only requirement of an oath by the prosecuting attorney, and that nowhere is he required to state in the body of his information that it is under oath, or official oath.

METROPOLITAN STREET RAILWAY

(186 Mo. 350.)

1. The owner of a wagon, seated beside the driver whom he employs, is chargeable with the driver's negligence in attempting to cross a street car track in front of an approaching car which is in plain sight.
2. It is negligence to attempt to drive across a street car track in dangerous proximity to an approaching car which is in plain sight, whether the car is actually seen or not.
3. A motorman in charge of a street car, upon seeing a wagon approaching the track, has the right to presume that the driver will use his senses to avoid driving onto the track in front of the car.
4. To hold a street car company liable for the results of a collision with a team attempting to cross the track in front of a car notwithstanding the negligence of the driver, those in charge of the car must have been guilty of gross negligence, or reckless and wanton conduct.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jackson County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John H. Lucas for appellant.

Messrs. Leon Block and William C. Hock, for respondent:

Respondent's negligence, if she was negligent, in not observing the approaching car, does not relieve the appellant of liability where the motorman saw respondent in a perilous situation in time to have avoided injuring her.

Bunyan v. Citizens' R. Co. 127 Mo. 12, 29 S. W. 842; Klockenbrink v. St. Louis & M. River R. Co. 172 Mo. 678, 72 S. W. 900.

Respondent's perilous situation is not confined to the time her horse came upon appellant's track. It arose the moment the motorman saw the respondent approaching the track in a manner indicating that she was intending to cross in front of a near approaching car, which she seemingly did not see.

Bunyan v. Citizens' R. Co. 127 Mo. 12, 29 S. W. 842; Ennis v. Union Depot R. Co. 155 Mo. 20, 55 S. W. 878; Klockenbrink v. St. Louis & M. River R. Co. 172 Mo. 678, 72 S. W. 900; Jackson v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 157 Mo. 621, 80 Am. St. Rep. 650, 58 S. W. 32.

This accident was not the result of mutual or concurring negligent acts of the respondent and the motorman. The causal connection between respondent's negligence and her resulting injuries ceased the moment the motorman observed her in a position of peril and in time to have avoided the injury to her.

On motion for rehearing.

Valliant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff alleges that she suffered a personal injury in consequence of a collision between a wagon in which she was riding and a street car of defendant. She sues for $5,000 damages, alleging that the collision was the result of defendant's negligence.

The scene of the accident was in Fifth street, between Walnut and Main, in Kansas City. Fifth street runs east and west; Walnut and Main cross it at right angles, running north and south; Walnut is east of Main. Between Walnut and Main streets, and parallel to them, is an alley which also crosses Fifth street at right angles. Defendant operates a double track street railroad along Fifth street; a car going west runs on the north track, crossing Walnut, the alley, and Main street. Just west of the alley on the north side of Fifth street is the city market.

On December 24, 1901, the plaintiff was seated beside the driver, a colored man, on the driver's seat, on an open one-horse spring wagon, driving through the alley northward, aiming for the market house. They emerged from the alley on the south side of Fifth street, drove across the south track, and, just as the front wheel of the wagon got on or sufficiently near the south rail of the north track, a car of defendant going west struck the wagon with a blow sufficient to break the shaft from the axle on that side, and the jar caused the plaintiff's injury. She testified that the car struck the wagon, "and it jolted very hard, and I went on the end of the seat, and that gave me an awful pain in the back, and I felt kind of funny in my whole body. Otherwise I would have went over on the left side on the street, but the colored boy held me back. And he helped me down from the wagon; I couldn't sit there."

The petition alleges negligence in four specifications: "First, the motorman of said defendant in charge of said car negligently failed to stop the same in time to avoid said collision, which by the exercise of ordinary care he might have done. Second, the servants of said defendant in charge of said car negligently failed to ring any bells, or to give other warning of the approach of said car. Third, the motorman of said defendant in charge of said car negligently failed to keep a vigilant watch ahead, and negligently failed to observe said wagon on or approaching said north track in a position of danger in time to have stopped said car and thereby avoid said collision, which said motorman might have done had he been exercising ordinary care. Fourth, the motorman of said defendant in charge of said car negligently failed to stop the same within a reasonable time after he saw, or by exercising ordinary care might have seen, the dangerous situation of this plaintiff."

The testimony on the part of the plaintiff tended to prove as follows: It was a clear winter day. The car going west stopped at Walnut street to take on some passengers, and then moved on its course. It was going slowly, not to exceed 4 miles an hour. The street was crowded with vehicles and people. The wagon on which the plaintiff was riding came out of the alley into Fifth street, aiming northward across the tracks. The driver testified: "When we was coming out through the alley between Walnut and Main we didn't see any car at all; but when we got on the second track we seen the car about as far as from here over there. . . . I couldn't tell exactly how far; but, anyhow, we were beckoning him to stop, . . . for him to hold up, because I couldn't go either forward or back; the people was ahead of me in the crowd, and wagons behind me. . . . He just came right on up and hit the wagon, and broke the shaft loose, and jostled us both up." Witness said he did not stop or check up at all when he came into the street from the alley, and was going tolerably fast when he got on the north track; he was aiming to get out of the crowd. The car stopped in almost the same instant that it struck the wagon. It shoved the wagon about 2 feet. The plaintiff herself testified that they saw no car until they were on the second track,—the north track. She said: "It was awfully crowded with people, and we looked, and, of course, I did not see any car at all. Of course, there was so many people in front of us, and we drove right in; and when we got to the second track I saw the car, and hallooed and screamed as much as possible, and it looks to me like there was a car that struck the wagon, and it jolted very hard." She was asked how far the car was from her when she hallooed to the motorman. She said: "About as far as from here to that wall; about 25 feet; I couldn't tell you exactly. I began to make motions and to halloo and scream, and the rest of the people right in front of our wagon they began to make motions to the motorman, and he was keeping on going slowly." She said that when they came out of the alley they saw no car; that they could not see either east or west more than 25 feet; and when asked to explain why she could not see farther, seated as she was above the heads of the people on the driver's seat in the wagon she said she could not explain it, but that 25 feet east or west was as far as she could see. Her attention was called to her statements on a former examination in which she was asked if she could not see for the distance of half a block, her answer being, "I suppose so; I couldn't tell exactly; I saw quite a distance:" to which she replied, "Well, that is 25 feet." She testified that her eyesight was good. She and the negro driver of her wagon testified that they did not hear any bell or gong. There was testimony tending to show that the jar of the collision caused serious injury to the plaintiff. At the close of the plaintiff's evidence the defendant asked an instruction in the nature of a demurrer to the evidence, which the court refused, and exception was taken.

On the part of defendant the testimony tended to prove as follows: The car stopped at Walnut, and then moved on westward, going slowly. It was a fine, clear day, and there was nothing to prevent one seeing the car coming distant a block away. The track was slippery at that point; it was downgrade, and the motorman was moving cautiously. The wagon came out of the alley, the horse going at a trot, aiming straight across the tracks, the driver and the plaintiff looking to the west. The motorman saw the wagon coming, and at once began ringing his gong, and, when it seemed as if the driver intended to cross the north track in front of the car, the motorman continued sounding the gong, halloed at the driver, applied his brakes, reversed the power, turned on the sand, and used all the means at hand to stop the car, and had brought it almost to a stop when the collision occurred.

The case was submitted to the jury. The verdict was for the defendant. The court sustained the plaintiff's motion for a new trial on the ground that it had erred in giving certain instructions for defendant. Defendant appeals.

If it should be conceded that the defendant was guilty of negligence in either of the three particulars first specified in the petition, still the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover in consequence thereof, because her own negligence contributed to produce the result. It was her wagon, the driver was her servant, and his negligence is chargeable to her. The plaintiff and her driver both testified that they did not see the car that struck them until they were on the north track. The car was there in plain view to be seen by anyone who would look, and, if they did not see it, it was because they did not use their eyes. There is no suggestion of an excuse in the record for their failure to see the car. The motorman saw the wagon as soon as it came out of the alley, and he was in no better position to see the wagon than were the plaintiff and her driver to see the car. If the driver saw the car coming (and, even in the face of his assertion to the contrary, it is as probable under the circumstances that he did as that he did not), yet ventured to cross in such dangerous proximity to the car, it was failure to observe that degree of care that an ordinarily prudent person in his situation would have observed. If he did not see it, it was because he did not look, and the act of not seeing, for that reason, was as negligent as an act of seeing and not heeding. It is unnecessary to decide, under the circumstances of this case, whether the car or the wagon had the right of way, because, if it should be conceded that the wagon had the right of way (which is not even contended), and that, as soon as the motorman saw the wagon emerge from the alley and attempt to cross the street, he ought to have stopped his car, yet kept on in his course, still the driver of the wagon, seeing the car coming (or shutting his eyes so he could not see), and knowing that it could not stop as quickly as the horse could, was guilty of negligence in driving immediately in front of it, or so close to it as to render a collision inevitable, or, if not inevitable, at least not improbable.

Counsel for respondent in their brief seem to rely more on the fourth specification of negligence in the petition than the three preceding; that is, that the motorman failed to stop the car "within a reasonable time after he saw, or by the exercise of reasonable care might have seen, the dangerous situation of the plaintiff." The motorman saw the wagon when it first came out of the alley, and saw the course the driver was aiming to take. He saw that the driver and the plaintiff had their faces turned to the west as they crossed the south track, and, if the motorman drew any inference from that fact, the natural inference was that they were taking proper care, because the danger they were in while crossing the south track was from a car coming from the west, and the motorman had a right to infer that when they had passed over the south track, and were approaching and about to enter upon the north track, they would, for the same reason, turn their faces to the east. Turning from the west to the east was but the occupation of a moment, a space of time too short to be measured. But whether he noticed how their faces were in fact turned, and drew inferences therefrom or not, he saw the wagon and the driver, and the course they were taking, and he had the right to presume that the driver would use his senses. Even though he saw the horse approach close to the north track, yet if he still presumed that the driver would exercise the care that a man of ordinary prudence and common sense in his situation would exercise, and stop until the car would pass, we cannot say with certainty that he was guilty of negligence in acting on that presumption. And even if it could be said that under those circumstances a question at least of negligence arises, which, as a question of fact, ought to be submitted to the jury, still we cannot say that it is a question of such gross negligence or reckless or wanton conduct as justifies the court in submitting to the jury to say whether or not the plaintiff ought to recover in spite of her own negligence. It requires more than the showing of a mere possibility that the accident might have been avoided in order to bring a case within the humanitarian doctrine announced in Kelley v. Missouri P. R. Co. 101 Mo. 67, 8 L. R. A. 783, 13 S. W. 806; Morgan v. Wabash R. Co. 159 Mo. 262, 60 S. W. 195, and Klockenbrink v. St. Louis & M. River R. Co. 172 Mo. 678, 72 S. W. 900. If it be conceded that the plaintiff's evidence tends to show that the defendant was guilty of any negligence at all, it is the utmost that can be claimed for it, while it shows the negligence of her driver very much more conspicuously. Though the street may have been crowded, yet there was nothing to prevent him from stopping until the car could pass. Even the horse showed a more intelligent appreciation of the situation than did the driver, because, when it was attempted to urge him onto the north track in the face of the danger, he shied as far to the west as he could, and thus saved himself from being struck.

An argument is built upon the estimates of witnesses as to the distance the car was from the horse when he got on the north track and the distance in which it was possible to have stopped the car after the motor-man saw the horse on that track, and the conclusion is drawn that the car was 20 or 25 feet distant, and could have been stopped in 15 feet. No witness measured any distance, and no one pretended to speak with precision; under the excitement and confusion of the occurrences the so-called estimates were little, if any, better than guesses. So far as the plaintiff's estimate of the distance is concerned, she showed by her answers, when she was asked as to the distance she could see when elevated on the seat of the open wagon, that her faculty in measuring distances by the eye was not great. Counsel for the plaintiff place reliance as to this point on the testimony of the motor-man as helping out his case. But the motor-man spoke with no precision on that subject,—said, in fact, he could not do so; but he did speak with precision when he said that the moment he saw that the horse was coming on the north track he reversed the power, applied the brake, turned ~~and~~ on the track, and stopped the car in the shortest time and space possible.

It is unnecessary to cite authorities to sustain the conclusion that under the plaintiff's own evidence in this case she was not entitled to recover. And since, in no view of the case, could a verdict for the plaintiff be sustained, it is unnecessary to look at the instructions. Whether the instructions were right or wrong, the verdict was for the right party; it was the only verdict that the evidence warranted. The court therefore erred in granting a new trial.

The judgment granting a new trial is reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to the Circuit Court to overrule the motion for a new trial and enter judgment for the defendant on the verdict.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

George W. SLACK et al., Appts.,
v.

Eliza E. REES, Resp't.

(.....N. J.....)

A deed without power of revocation, from a parent who is incapacitated physically, and weak mentally, to his daughter, who has for some time had the care of him, made without the benefit of competent and independent advice, will be set aside by equity.

(November 15, 1904.)

A PPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Chancery Court in favor of defendant in a suit brought to set aside a deed. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Aaron V. Dawes for appellants.

Mr. Edwin R. Walker for respondent.

Gummere, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The two complainants and the defendant are the only children and heirs at law of George H. Slack, deceased, who died on the 13th day of August, 1902, at the age of sixty-eight years. On the day before his death he executed a deed to his daughter, Mrs. Rees, conveying to her two houses and lots in the city of Trenton. He owned no other real estate, and his personal estate was insufficient for the payment of his debts. His sons seek to have the conveyance set aside and declared void upon the following grounds: That their father lacked mental capacity to make the deed, that it was the product of undue influence exercised by their sister upon him, and that, in making the deed, he did not have the benefit of competent and independent advice.

The deceased, for a number of years before his death, suffered from the disease known as "locomotor ataxia." By the progress of the disease his physical powers became gradually weakened, and his mental powers also were somewhat affected. But, although his mind was somewhat weakened, we fully concur in the conclusion of the learned vice chancellor, who heard the case below, that he retained sufficient mental capacity to dispose of his property.

The second ground of attack upon the conveyance—that it was the product of undue influence—presents a more difficult question.

NOTE.—As to effect of settlor's failure to understand the legal import of his act, see Ricards v. Safe Deposit & T. Co. 63 L. R. A. 145.

As to power to revoke voluntary settlements, see Neisler v. Pearsall, 52 L. R. A. 874, and note.

For a period of nearly three months prior to his death he was an inmate of his daughter's home. He was, during all that time, dependent upon her for the care and service which a man in his weakened physical and mental condition constantly requires. The normal relation of parent and child, as it had existed in earlier years, had been reversed, and the daughter had become the guardian of the father. In this situation the law presumes that a gift made by the parent to the child is the product of undue influence, and casts upon the latter the burden of proving the contrary. It was considered by the vice chancellor, before whom the case was tried, that she had discharged this burden. After a careful review of the testimony, we are not at one as to the soundness of this conclusion. A decision upon this point in the case, however, is rendered unnecessary, as we conclude that the conveyance must be set aside because, in making it, the donor did not have the benefit of competent and independent advice as to its effect. That the absence of such advice will invalidate a deed of gift which contains no power of revocation, where a relation of trust and confidence exists between the donor and donee, is not denied, and indeed, it was so held by the vice chancellor. He seems to have considered, however, that such relationship was not shown unless it was made to appear that the donee occupied such a dominant position toward the donor as to raise the presumption that the latter was without power to assert his will in opposition to that of the donee. But this is not the situation. The rule has a much broader sweep. Its purpose is not so much to afford protection to the donor against the consequences of undue influence exercised over him by the donee, as it is to afford him protection against the consequences of voluntary action on his part, induced by the existence of the relationship between them, the effect of which upon his own interests he may only partially understand or appreciate. The following citations from our own decisions make this plain: "In all transactions between persons occupying relations, whether legal, natural, or conventional in their origin, in which confidence is naturally inspired, is presumed, or in fact reasonably exists, the burden of proof is thrown upon the person in whom the confidence is reposed, and who has acquired an advantage, to show affirmatively not only that no deception was practised therein, no undue influence used, and that all was fair, open, and voluntary, but that it was well understood." Hall v. Otterson, 52 N. J. Eq. 528, 28 Atl.

907, on appeal, 53 N. J. Eq. 695, 35 Atl. 1130. "Where parties hold positions in which one is more or less dependent upon the other, courts of equity hold that the weaker party must be protected; and they set aside his gifts, if he had not proper advice independently of the other." Haydock v. Haydock, 34 N. J. Eq. 575, 38 Am. Rep. 385. "The rule to be gathered from the English and American cases is that the burden of proof was cast upon the donee to establish that the donor fully appreciated what he was doing, or, at all events, in the doing had the benefit of disinterested and competent advice." Coffey v. Sullivan, 63 N. J. Eq. 302, 49 Atl. 520. The present case is a marked example of the wisdom of the rule. The deed was made by Mr. Slack almost immediately after a prostrating attack, which was a phase of the disease from which he was suffering. Neither of the physicians who were in attendance upon him expected the attack to be fatal. As soon as he was sufficiently recovered from its violence to permit it, an attorney, who had previously been employed by him in other matters, was sent for; and, upon his arrival, Mr. Slack stated to him that he wished him to draw a deed conveying to Mrs. Rees certain property which he owned in Trenton, and asked the attorney whether he had better make a will or a deed. He was advised by the attorney that it would be better to make a deed, and did so. No power of revocation was reserved in the deed, and its effect, if valid, was to practically strip him of his whole estate; for his personal property, as has already been stated, was insufficient to pay his debts. If the opinion of his physicians as to the effect of the attack upon him had turned out to be accurate, he would, for the rest of his life, have been dependent upon the charity of others, except so far as a pension which he received from the national government would have sufficed to support him. From his inquiry made of the attorney,—whether it would be better for him to make a will or a deed,—it seems quite probable that he considered the one would be more effective than the other to presently deprive him of all further interest in the estate to be embraced in the instrument which he proposed to execute. It is difficult to understand the failure of the attorney to advise Mr. Slack as to the effect of such a deed as was executed. He not only should have done this, but, in the language of Malins, V. C., in Coutts v. Acworth, L. R. 8 Eq. Cas. 558, he should have insisted upon inserting in it the reservation to the donor of the power to revoke the gift, unless Mr. Slack had distinctly refused to have it done.

The decree will be reversed, and the record remitted to the Court of Chancery, with instructions to that court to enter a decree setting aside the conveyance in question, and declaring it to be null and void.

COLUMBIA REAL ESTATE COMPANY.

*A signed, but undelivered, lease may be given in evidence to prove an agreement upon the details of a lease pursuant to one of the terms of a previously signed memorandum in writing of an oral agreement for a lease; and if said previous memorandum of agreement for a lease, and the signed, but undelivered, lease, taken together, show a completed agreement upon the terms of a lease, the statute of frauds is satisfied, and specific performance may be decreed.

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Chancery Court in favor of defendant in a suit to compel specific performance of an agreement to make a lease. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Alden B. Endicott and E. A. Higbee for appellant.

Mr. George A. Bourgeois for appellee.

Fort, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill in this case is filed for the specific performance of an alleged agreement to make a lease. The written memorandum in evidence to prove the alleged agreement consisted of two writings, as follows:

Agreement made this Seventh day of May between Columbia Real Estate Co., of the first part, and Mrs. Charlton, of Atlantic City, of the second part, Witnesseth, that the party of the first part will make a lease for ten years of a certain building on their grounds in rear of stores to contain about eighty feet in width by one hundred feet in depth with a fourteen-foot entrance from boardwalk, the consideration to be a rental of twelve hundred dollars per annum payable yearly in advance, lease to date from June 15th, 1901. The party of the first part to be put to no expense whatever in this matter, and security to be given for the rent.

Columbia Real Estate Co.,
By H. G. Bergman, Agt.
S. A. Charlton,

Witnesseth by Ida J. Atkinson.

Received, Atlantic City, May 7th, 1901, of Mrs. S. A. Charlton one Hundred dollars on acc. of agreement for lease to be made to Mrs. Charlton, for which details are to be settled on.

Columbia Real Estate Co.
By H. J. Bergman, Agt.

The vice chancellor found that these two papers were signed and passed at the same time, and relate to the same transaction, and must be deemed parts of one instrument. With this conclusion we agree.

These papers, standing alone, would not justify a decree for specific performance. By their terms it is stated that other details are to be settled between the parties. Unless it was shown, therefore, by other writing signed by the defendant, that such details had been agreed upon, the bill must be dismissed.

There was proof in the cause of negotiations between the parties looking to an agreement as to the details of the proposed lease, under the terms of the writing of May 7, 1901; and a draft of a lease was offered in evidence, signed by the complainant, which it was alleged embraced all the details under the said writings of May 7, 1901, as finally agreed upon in the negotiations between the parties. It was not disputed that a draft of lease containing all the details was prepared for the purpose of carrying out the agreement contained in the writings of May 7, 1901. It was admitted that it was so prepared for the defendant by his attorney. A duplicate of this detailed lease was sent by the defendant to the complainant for her acceptance and signature. That these details were accepted by the complainant is evidenced by her signature to the paper sent to her, as it appears in evidence. To establish that these details had also been agreed upon and accepted by the defendant in compliance with the writings of May 7, 1901, the complainant offered to prove that the defendant had signed a duplicate of paper in evidence signed by the complainant.

To make this proof, the complainant called for the production of said duplicate as signed by the defendant, and upon this point the record is as follows:

Henry J. Bergman sworn for complainant.
Direct examination.

By Mr. Higbee:

Q. You are one of the officers of the Columbia Real Estate Company?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You are the Mr. Bergman who had negotiations with Mrs. Charlton, the complainant, are you not?

A. I am.

Q. Look at exhibit Cl. Did you ever see that before?

A. I think I have.

Q. When and where?

A. About the latter part of May or the early part of June, at Mr. Bourgeois's office.

Q. You know whether or not there was a duplicate prepared of that?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Who has the duplicate?

A. I have it.

Q. Where is it now?

A. Mr. Bourgeois has it.

Mr. Higbee: We ask for the production of the duplicate.

Mr. Bourgeois: Here it is (producing it).

Q. Paper produced by Mr. Bourgeois being handed to counsel for complainant, he shows it to the witness and asks: Who is Orro G. Leonard, who has signed his name as president? (Objected to as irrelevant.)

The vice chancellor: What significance has this?

Mr. Higbee: We want to show that this lease in duplicate was executed by the Columbia Real Estate Company.

The vice chancellor: What difference does that make?

Mr. Higbee: If the lease which was produced to us, having been prepared by their attorney, and which we signed, and also the duplicate, which they acknowledge to be a duplicate, is signed by the defendant himself, it certainly goes to show, it seems to me, that those were the terms agreed upon by the parties.

The vice chancellor: An undelivered, though signed, contract, remaining in the possession of the parties bound by it, has no legal efficacy. It is only when the party obligated has passed it over to the other party that it becomes of any binding effect. The paper marked "exhibit Cl" is in no way obligatory upon Mrs. Charlton, because it remained in her possession. The paper here produced on call by the attorney for defendant is no obligation whatever upon the Columbia Real Estate Company, because it remained in the hands of the attorney for the Columbia Real Estate Company. The mere execution gave it no force or effect. It is its delivery that gives it force.

In excluding this offer of proof, we think the learned vice chancellor erred. The writing was admissible in evidence. This offer was not made to prove a lease, but to prove by this writing, taken in connection with the writings of May 7, 1901, that all the terms or details of the proposed lease had been fully agreed upon by writings signed by the party to be charged therewith. It is clear, as the vice chancellor held, that the duplicate signed by the defendant's president could not become a lease until it was delivered; but it was none the less a memorandum in writing, signed by the defendant, showing the details of the proposed lease as they had been agreed upon between the parties pursuant to the memoranda of May 7, 1901. Our statute reads as follows: "That no action shall be brought . . . (4) upon any contract or sale of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest in or concerning them, . . . unless the agreement, upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person thereunto by him or her lawfully authorized." 2 Gen. Stat. § 5, p. 1603. The signing by the complainant is immaterial. Only the party to be charged therewith need sign. Reuss v. Picksley, L. R. 1 Exch. 342, 35 L. J. Exch. N. S. 218; 1 Benjamin, Sales, § 255, p. 279; Laythoarp v. Bryant, 2 Bing. N. C. 744; Fry, Spec. Perf. § 346; Hatton v. Gray, 2 Ch. Cas. 164; Green v. Richards, 23 N. J. Eq. 32; Reynolds v. Tompkins, 9 N. J. Eq. 332, 334. Nor is it necessary that all the terms of the contract be agreed to at one time, nor written down at one time, nor on one piece of paper. If all the papers, taken together, contain the whole bargain, they form such a memorandum as will satisfy the statute. 1 Benjamin, Sales, § 220, p. 236; Johnson v. Buck, 35 N. J. L. 338, 343, 10 Am. Rep. 243; Peck v. Vandemark, 99 N. Y. 30, 1 N. E. 41; Ide v. Leiser, 10 Mont. 5, 24 Am. St. Rep. 17, 24 Pac. 695; Rauditschek v. Blank, 80 N. Y. 478; 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 852, note 2 for cases. Nor does it signify to whom the memorandum is addressed. It may be to a third person, and yet be a good writing to satisfy the statute of frauds. Form is not important. Brown, Stat. Fr. § 354; Bateman v. Phillips, 15 69 L. R. A.

East, 272; Lee v. Cherry, 85 Tenn. 707, 4 Am. St. Rep. 800, 4 S. W. 835; Moss v. Atkinson, 44 Cal. 3; Hollis v. Burgess, 37 Kan. 487, 15 Pac. 536; Moore v. Mountcastle, 61 Mo. 424; Barnett v. McCree, 76 Hun, 610, 27 N. Y. Supp. 820; Singleton v. Hill, 91 Wis. 51, 51 Am. St. Rep. 868, 64 N. W. 588. The reason for this is clear. The memorandum is only necessary to evidence the contract, not to constitute it. As Tindal, Ch. J., says in Laythoarp v. Bryant, 2 Bing. N. C. 744: "The contract is made before any signature thereof by the parties." The memorandum or note is only to evidence what the contract was. To prevent perjury as to such contracts, the statute declares that evidence of what the contract was must be contained in some memorandum or note in writing signed by the party to be charged therewith. When the memorandum exists, and is legally given in testimony, it becomes evidence of the contract claimed to have been made. The memorandum is not the contract, but only evidence of the contract.

We think that the complainant had the right to put in evidence the signed duplicate of the detailed proposal for a written lease which she contended had been prepared by the defendant and signed by it. It was evidence of an agreement upon the details mentioned in the writings of May 7, 1901; and if such writings, when taken together, show a completed agreement for a lease, they satisfy the requirements of the statute of frauds. This is not a question of the admission of a signed deed in evidence to prove an oral agreement to convey, where no previous written memorandum of any part of the oral agreement exists. Nor is it a question whether the delivery of an undelivered deed, duly signed and acknowledged, said to have been drawn to carry out an oral agreement to convey, will be decreed by the court. The question here is simply this: Will the court, in a suit for specific performance of an oral agreement to make a lease, admit in evidence all the paper writings signed by the parties to the negotiation, even though some of the papers be signed but undelivered instruments, in order to see, when all the papers are taken together, whether they contain the completed terms for a lease as agreed, so that a decree may be made? We think this question must be answered in the affirmative. Judge Harlan, speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States in a case where a memorandum of the agreement of sale was made, in which details were left to be fixed, and a deed was executed and sent for examination, as the duplicate lease was in this case, says: "Whatever may be said as to the effect of this deed in passing title, if it was delivered only for purposes of examination, or if the previous memorandum of sale had been for any reason . . . defective, under the statute of frauds, its recitals, coming as they do from the vendor, are competent for the purpose of showing the precise locality of the property which the memorandum of sale was intended to embrace." Ryan v. United States, 136 U. S. 68, 84, 34 L. ed. 447, 453, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 913.

Whether, where no signed memorandum of the oral agreement has been made, a signed, but undelivered, instrument, said to have been drawn to carry out the oral agreement, will alone be resorted to to satisfy the statute, it is not necessary to decide in this case. The courts differ upon that proposition. In the second edition of Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, vol. 29, p. 855, title, Verbal agreements, notes 12 and 13, will be found a citation of all the authorities in the several states affirming or denying that an undelivered executed deed will satisfy the statute. They are so variant that I shall not attempt to reconcile them, and, indeed, it is not necessary to do so, upon the only question necessary to be decided in this case. If Brown v. Brown, decided by this court, can be taken as an authority for an undelivered, executed instrument not being a sufficient memorandum to satisfy the statute, which is not decided, still that case is not in conflict with the view here expressed, as there was not there any written memorandum of the agreement to give the assignment there sought to be specifically enforced, unless it was permissible to gather it from the signed, but undelivered, assignment in evidence, alone. 33 N. J. Eq. 650.

There was error in the refusal to admit the offer of the signed duplicate of the undelivered lease in evidence, and for this there must be a reversal.

Upon all other questions raised in the case, we think the complainant had complied with the terms of the agreement on her part, and that for none of these should specific performance of the agreement have been denied her.

I shall vote to reverse the decree, and to remit the record to the court of chancery, for further proceedings in accordance herewith.

- *1. The object of a bill of review is to procure the reversal, alteration, or explanation of a decree in a former suit, and must rest on error in law upon the face of the decree, fraud in procuring the decree, new or newly discovered matter which could not have been used before the decree was made.
2. When it is sought to reverse a decree upon the discovery of some new matter, leave of the court must first be obtained by petition, supported by affidavit that the evidence is not only new, but could not have been discovered by reasonable diligence before the hearing.
3. Although there is no express statutory limitation as to the filing of bills of review, the analogous limitation of the right of appeal should govern, and a bill of review cannot be filed after the lapse of three years from the final decree, except in case of new or newly discovered matter.

Vroom, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appeal in this cause is from a decree advised by Vice Chancellor Pitney upon a bill of review filed by Adele Louise Watkinson, the respondent, against Howard E. Watkinson. The bill was filed to review and set aside a decree of divorce obtained by the said Howard E. Watkinson in the court of chancery of this state on December 11, 1896, and actually filed on December 17th following. The ground of the decree was adultery.

The record in this case shows that on November 5, 1900, nearly four years after the signing of the above decree, the defendant in said cause and the respondent here filed a petition in the court of chancery which was entitled a petition of defendant to open decree, to which was annexed the affidavit of the defendant that the said petition was true in all respects, and on the 28th of November, 1900, she exhibited a bill of review praying that the decree of divorce, for the reasons in said bill set forth, 69 L. R. A.

The object of a bill of review, or a bill in the nature of a bill of review, is to procure the reversal, alteration, or explanation of a decree in a former suit. 2 Dan. Ch. Pl. & Pr. 1576. If the decree has been signed and enrolled, the practice is to file a bill of review; if not, a bill in the nature of a bill of review. As stated by Judge Story in Dexter v. Arnold, 5 Mason, 310, Fed. Cas. No. 3,856: "This distinction between a bill of review and a bill in the nature of a bill of review, though important in England, is not felt in the practice of the courts of the United States, and perhaps rarely in any of the state courts of equity in the Union. I take it to be clear that in the courts of the United States all decrees as well as judgments are matters of record, and are deemed to be enrolled as of the term in which they are passed. So that the appropriate remedy is by a bill of review." See also Wiser v. Blachly, 2 Johns. Ch. 489. Such a bill must rest on error in law upon the face of the decree, without further examination of matters of fact, fraud in procuring former decree, new facts, or upon some new matter which has been discovered after the decree, and could not possibly have been used when the decree was made. 2 Dan. Ch. Pl. & Pr. 1576; Mitford, Ch. Pl. 101; Taylor v. Sharp, 3 P. Wms. 371; Wiser v. Blachly, 2 Johns. Ch. 489.

It seems to be the settled practice in equity, when it is sought to reverse a decree signed and enrolled upon the discovery of some new matter, to first obtain the leave of the court to the filing of the bill, and the usual practice is to make the application by petition, supported by affidavit that the evidence is not only new, but could not have been discovered by reasonable diligence before the hearing; and, as said by Daniels, the court must be satisfied that the new matter has come to the knowledge of the applicant and his agents for the first time since the period at which he could have made use of it in the suit, and that it could not with reasonable diligence have been discovered sooner, and that it is of such a character that, if brought forward in the suit, it would have altered the judgment. 2 Dan. Ch. Pl. & Pr. 1563; Wilkinson v. Parish, 3 Paige, 653.

Presumably, leave was given to the filing of the present bill of review, although the fact of the granting such leave does not appear in the record before us, nor is the fact of such leave having been granted set out in the bill, as it should be where new matter is alleged upon which it is sought to impeach the decree. Mitford, Ch. Pl. 106.

At that time the posture of affairs was this: The appellant had filed his bill for divorce against the respondent upon the ground of adultery on June 13, 1896. An order of publication against her as an absent defendant was made returnable August 31, 1896, and an affidavit made and filed by the solicitor of the appellee that he had personally delivered a copy of the usual printed notice in cases of divorce to the respondent on the 9th day of July, 1896, at her place of abode in the city of New York. She did not appear to the suit, and an order of reference was made to James S. Aitkin, special master, and the hearing came on before him in October of the last-named year, and on the 28th of October the master filed his report advising that a decree of divorce should be made for the crime of adultery, and on the 11th of December, 1896, a decree of divorce was duly made pursuant to said report.

The depositions thus taken before the master showed that the complainant was then a resident of the city of Trenton, in this state, and that he had lived there for fifteen years then last past. The crime of adultery charged in the bill was proved satisfactorily to the master, and he reported in favor of a divorce, which was granted. The petition before mentioned as having been filed to open the decree, or, if it may be considered, for leave to file a bill of review, alleges that the petitioner first positively heard that a decree of divorce had been granted to her husband during the year 1900. She further alleges that she and her husband removed to New York city in November, 1895, and lived there together until August, 1896, at which time he secured certain letters, was indignant at the contents thereof, and blamed the petitioner therefor, and left her; that in August or September, 1896, the petitioner signed some papers which she understood to be in an action of divorce, but she was without means or any friends or advisers, and her health broken down, and her condition and mind were such that she was unable to even consider or think of the matter; that subsequently, in September or October, 1896, her husband returned to New York and cohabited with her pending the action brought for divorce, and informed petitioner that no suit was pending, and in other ways imposed upon the petitioner and the court.

The bill of review filed in November of 1900 admits that the complainant therein in July or August, 1896, was informed of the institution of a divorce suit against her by her husband, and charges that subsequently he returned to her, assured her that he had abandoned his suit for divorce and cohabited with her, and that notwithstanding that he was living with her as husband and wife, and assuring her that he had abandoned said divorce proceedings, he was in fact prosecuting the same, and in fact in December 1896, obtained a decree of divorce against the complainant, and that she did not defend said cause because she believed that the same had been abandoned; that said defendant was at the time of filing his said bill a resident of the state of New York; that after filing his said bill he condoned any fault or misconduct of complainant; and that his conduct was a fraud upon the court, and made the decree null and void; and that the complainant had but recently discovered the fraud practised upon her, and only recently had heard that a decree of divorce had been granted in said cause.

The answer of the defendant denies specifically the allegations of the said bill of review, that he had condoned the offense of the complainant, or had assured her that he had abandoned the suit for divorce. He further denies the allegation that the divorce proceedings were a fraud upon the court or the complainant, and that he was at the time of the filing of his bill for divorce, or at any other time, a resident of the state of New York.

After the hearing of witnesses, the vice chancellor advised a decree in favor of respondent upon the ground that the complainant had no domicile or residence in the state of New Jersey at the time of the filing of the bill which resulted in the decree attacked, or during the pendency of that suit, and that the adultery on the part of the wife upon which the decree therein was based had been thoroughly condoned by the husband, and that the allegation of condonation pending that suit and before the decree therein was sustained by the weight of the evidence, and that the complainant's delay in asserting her right had not been such as to bar her from relief.

In his opinion the learned vice chancellor sets out at some length what, to use his own language, is termed a statement of the undisputed facts of the case, and adds that it would seem that the husband, the appellant here, had no residence or domicile in New Jersey at the time he was carrying on his suit here for divorce. If this could be considered an undisputed fact, or even a fair deduction from the proved facts, in this case, it would decide this case, for it would have to be admitted that he committed thereby a fraud upon the court; but in my opinion the testimony does not by any means establish this as a fact. The testimony of the appellant before the master in this suit for divorce, on October 9, 1896, disclosed that he then resided in Trenton, New Jersey, and that he had lived in Trenton for fifteen years then last past. This was corroborated by the testimony of the father of the appellant, a clergyman of the Baptist denomination, who testified that at the time he married his son to the respondent, on the 6th of November, 1889, his son was a resident of Trenton; that he had resided in Trenton ever since, and still resided there on the day he testified, October 10, 1896. It is true that in his examination before the vice chancellor the appellant said that after his wife left him and had gone to New York and resided there in a flat he went there and lived with her for four or five months, when he again went back to Trenton. I find it difficult to perceive how this temporary residence in New York city can be held to affect his residence or domicile in Trenton in the absence of any evidence of intention on his part to abandon it. The fact that he did not intend to change his domicile is manifested by appellant's beginning his suit for divorce after he returned to Trenton, and this established his belief, not only as to his residence, but his domicile in this state. The learned vice chancellor, for the purpose of sustaining the view that the appellant had abandoned his residence in New Jersey by residing in New York city a few months, cited the case of German Sav. & L. Soc. v. Dormitzer, 192 U. S. 125, 48 L. ed. 373, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 221, as "directly in point." An examination of that case discloses that it is far from being in point. In the opinion in that case Mr. Justice Holmes said that it appeared from the testimony of the husband that before he made a contract for part of the land in question he had sold out his property and business in Kansas and had gone in search of what he called a new location, and that when he bought this land he desired to locate there. These facts, the court held, were sufficient for the courts of Kansas to find that he had changed his domicile.

It seems unnecessary to point out how absolutely the facts in the case under consideration are at variance with those in the case cited; the intent in that case of the husband to change his domicile being apparent from his own testimony, while here there is no evidence whatever to warrant the belief, or to enable a court to find, that the appellant intended to change his domicile.

To construe the temporary residence by appellant with his wife in New York to be a change of domicile seems to me unwarranted; for, as Mr. Justice Depue said in Harral v. Harral, 39 N. J. Eq. 279, 51 Am. Rep. 17, "to the factum of residence there must be added the animus manendi, and 69 L. R. A.

that place is the domicile of a person in which he has voluntarily fixed his habitation, not for . . . temporary or special purpose, but with a present intention of making it his home, unless or until something which is uncertain or unexpected shall happen to induce him to adopt some other permanent home." The doctrine laid down by the courts of the United States is that a domicile, having been once acquired, continues until a new one is actually acquired animo et facto. 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 15; Cadwalader v. Howell, 18 N. J. L. 138; Clark v. Likens, 26 N. J. L. 209.

I am unable to agree with the conclusion reached below, that, as alleged in the bill of review at the time of beginning his suit for divorce, the appellant was a resident of the state of New York, and therefore am of opinion that there was no fraud practised on the court of chancery by the appellant in swearing that he was a resident of the state of New Jersey.

The second ground upon which below was based the right of the respondent to relief is because, as stated in the opinion, after the adultery charged in the bill, and after the commencement of the husband's suit, and the service upon the wife of process, and before decree, the husband returned to the wife and cohabited with her, and led her to believe that he had abandoned the suit.

Condonation, standing alone, would not have justified the granting leave to file a bill of review; for how can that be considered new matter, which could have been produced and used by the respondent at the time when the decree was made? Every allegation relating thereto, if true, was known to the respondent during the pendency of the divorce suit, and before the entering of the decree, and if intended to be interposed as a defense should have been pleaded and proved in that suit. It is too late if it is first made known in an application for a bill of review; for, as was well said by Lord Chancellor Talbot in Taylor v. Sharp, 3 P. Wms. 371, "unless this relief were confined to such new matter, it might be made use of as a method for a vexatious person to be oppressive to the other side and for the cause never to be at rest." Now, after the lapse of four years from the entering of the final decree of divorce, and years after the taking from her of the child pursuant to the terms of said decree, she came before the court of chancery charging that she was deceived by her husband as to the abandonment of the suit for divorce; that during the pendency of that suit he condoned her guilt; and, further, that she never knew of the granting of the final decree of divorce until after her time for taking an appeal had expired. No extended review of the testimony is, it seems to me, necessary in the matter of the alleged deception on the part of the appellant as to the abandonment of the divorce proceedings, for the extent to which the respondent goes in her testimony is that she supposed from appellant's conduct he had abandoned the proceedings, but there is no pretense whatever that the appellant ever told her that he had done so, and in fact she testifies distinctly that she never had any conversation with him relating to the suit for divorce pending the suit. The testimony of the appellant is that he never visited his wife during the pendency of the proceedings, and never saw her save when he visited the boy, who was then living with her. The charge that the respondent had been led to believe that the appellant had abandoned his suit for divorce is not sustained in fact. This being so, the charge of fraud falls, and no ground can exist for the consideration of the alleged condonation, which, as before stated, could not be held to be new matter warranting the giving leave to file a bill of review, but was a personal defense of the respondent, which she could set up as a defense or waive, as she saw fit.

This brings us to the consideration of the respondent's alleged denial of knowledge of the existence of the granting of the decree of divorce until shortly before the time she filed the petition for a bill of review. An examination of her petition discloses that upon that very vital part of the respondent's case the allegation in the petition is that "your petitioner first heard positively that a divorce had been granted to her husband, Howard Watkinson, for infidelity on the part of your petitioner, through William D. Tyndall, an attorney and counselor at law of New York and New Jersey, who examined your petitioner in supplementary proceedings during the year 1901." Again the averment in her bill of review is: "And your oratrix having but recently discovered the fraud practised upon her, and having only recently learned that a decree of divorce had been granted in said cause so as aforesaid instituted by her said husband, she expressly charges said decree, so fraudulently obtained as hereinbefore mentioned, ought to be set aside," etc.

The evident intent of the above allegation was to excuse the laches of the petitioner, the respondent here. An examination of her testimony on this point is interesting.

one of the masters in chancery, she was asked and replied:

Q. Did you know that he had obtained the decree of divorce at that time [summer of 1897]?

A. He said that he had.

Q. When did he say that?

A. Well, he told me that when I first saw him after he left home, November. The next time I saw him he said he had the divorce. When it was granted I don't know; he didn't say when he got it.

Now, in the testimony before the vice chancellor, in referring to the summer of 1897, she was asked and said:

Q. (By the Court). I understand you to say he came to your father's house and stayed a week the next summer (1897). He asked you when was the last time he had sexual intercourse?

A. The last time was in the summer of 1897, at home.

Mr. Tyndall: That was after the decree.

The Court: After the decree, if she was willing to accept him as a concubine would a stranger.

A. I didn't know the divorce was granted.

Q. (By the Court). He never told you the divorce was granted?

A. He never told me, and I never knew it any way to be positive of it.

Mr. Backes: Did I understand the witness to say she didn't know and he never told her?

A. He never told me, no, that the divorce had been granted; nobody ever told me.

It is difficult to reconcile the very material variance between the testimony of the respondent given at two different times in the same cause. One thing, however, it does demonstrate, and that is the truth of the vice chancellor's comment that the wife clearly is not to be implicitly believed.

No attempt was made to reconcile these statements of the respondent, and, in my opinion, the respondent has failed to sustain the allegation of the petition and bill that she had only learned of the granting of the divorce in the year 1900, and she has no standing to urge it as new matter, then only brought to her knowledge, to enable her to file a bill of review.

The respondent having failed to make out a case either on the question of residence or of condonation and fraud, we are brought to the consideration of the very serious and important question of whether her laches and delay in petitioning for the filing of a bill of review has barred her right to the relief prayed for. The record in this case shows that the petition for leave to file a bill of review was not filed until nearly four years after the entering of the final decree in the suit for divorce, and the question to be determined is whether the laches and delay of the respondent in asserting her rights is a bar to this suit.

The rule in the English courts is that, when twenty years have elapsed from the time of pronouncing a decree which has been signed and enrolled, a bill of review cannot be brought, unless the plaintiff was under disability. Dan. Ch. Pl. & Pr. 1580; Mitford, Ch. Pl. 105; Lytton v. Lytton, 4 Bro. Ch. 441; Deloraine v. Browne, 3 Bro. Ch. 633.

And in the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Thomas v. Brockebrough, 10 Wheat. 147, 6 L. ed. 288, Washington, J., in commenting upon the question of the limitation of the right to file a bill of review, said: "It must be admitted that bills of review are not strictly within any act of limitations prescribed by Congress, but it is unquestionable that courts of equity, acting upon the principle that laches and neglect ought to be discountenanced, and that in cases of stale demands its aid ought not to be afforded, have always interposed some limitation to suits brought in those courts." And this case explicitly declares the rule, never since departed from, in that court, as follows: "There is no statute expressly limiting bills of review, but the courts of the United States are governed in this particular by the analogous limitation of the right of appeal, and therefore a bill of review cannot be filed after the lapse of five years from the final decree." Applying this rule to the practice in our state, after the lapse of three years leave would not be granted to file a bill of review.

There is, however, one exception to the general rule in England as noticed by Mitford, and that is the discretionary power of the court in the case of newly discovered evidence, and this exception Judge Washington recognizes in Thomas v. Brockebrough, 10 Wheat. 147, 6 L. ed. 288, saying: "Whether a bill of review, founded upon matter discovered since the decree is in like manner barred by the lapse of five years after such decree, is a question which need not be decided in the present case, since we are all of opinion that it is in the discretion of the court to grant leave to file a bill of review for that cause." My examination of the authorities leads me to the conclusion that the law as above laid down in the Supreme Court of the United States has been almost uniformly followed in this country.

The time of appeal having expired when this application for leave to file the bill of review was made, the petitioner was barred unless her case could be brought strictly within the exception of newly discovered evidence, or of some special equity that would give the court the discretionary power to make the order.

The question of fraud being eliminated from the case, there is left only one matter which could in legal contemplation have been urged, either as a newly discovered fact or as a ground of special equity upon which to rest an application for a bill of review, viz., the ignorance of the petitioner of the existence of a decree of divorce until after the time for appeal had expired. But it has already been shown that this has no foundation in fact, for the petitioner in her own testimony admits and swears to her knowledge of the final decree in the divorce suit within a year after the entry of the same.

But in the court below the learned vice chancellor said that he was unable to see how any delay beyond the time limited for taking an appeal on the part of the respondent could on any known principle affect her right to a declaration by the court that the decree of divorce was invalid and void ab initio by reason of the lack of jurisdiction of the court of chancery to proceed in the cause. He then adds that where there is a lack of jurisdiction by reason of a want of residential domicile on the part of both parties, combined with extraterritorial service and the absence of any formal appearance by the defendant, it followed that the decree was absolutely void. It was for this reason that he held that the respondent's belief was not affected by her laches. But, as we have already shown, there was a residential domicile on the part of the appellant when he filed his bill for divorce, and, although the service on the wife of process was extraterritorial, it conformed to the law of this state, and the decree, instead of being void, was valid and binding upon the parties.

There is, however, another consideration why the laches of the respondent should not be overlooked, and that is that on the strength of the decree in the court of chancery the appellant has married again, so that other rights have now intervened, and an entirely innocent party will suffer should the decree be revoked.

I am clearly of the opinion that the earlier decision of the court of chancery that the appellant had a legal domicile and residence in this state when he filed his bill for divorce has not been successfully impeached, that there was no condonation on his part of the adultery of his wife that she is now entitled to set up, and that the delay of the respondent in asserting her rights bars her from the relief prayed for by her.

The decree below should be reversed, and the bill of review dismissed.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

H. S. HANCOCK

v.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY, Appt.

(..... N. C.)

1. The validity and interpretation of the contract, as well as the rule measuring the damages arising upon its breach and the company's liability therefor, are to be determined by the laws of the state where a telegram is filed for transmission in case the points of inception and termination are in different states.
2. The credibility and value of the testimony of a lawyer of another state as to what the rule upon a certain subject is in that state may be submitted to the jury.
3. The exercise by the trial court of its discretion as to the setting aside of a verdict as being contrary to the clear weight of the evidence will not ordinarily be reviewed on appeal.
4. Mere disappointment and regret are not included in the rule allowing damages for mental anguish upon failure of a telegraph company promptly to deliver a death message.
5. One claiming damages for delay in the preparations for interment of his relative because of failure promptly to deliver a telegram has the burden of showing that the preparations would have been made had the telegram been promptly delivered, and such fact will not be presumed.

(March 8, 1905.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Craven County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for failure promptly to transmit and deliver a telegram. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

NOTE.—As to damages for mental anguish because of default of telegraph company, see also, in this series, Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Rogers, 13 L. R. A. 859; Wilcox v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 17 L. R. Messrs. W. W. Clark and F. H. Busbee & Son, for appellant:

When the law of the place whence the message was sent, and that of the place of delivery, both refuse to recognize such damages, they cannot be recovered, although the action may have been brought in a jurisdiction which recognizes the right to recover them.

Thomas v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 25 Tex. Civ. App. 398, 61 S. W. 501.

Such damages cannot be recovered in Maryland.

The law of the state in which the contract was entered into should control.

Disappointment and regret are not synonymous with mental anguish.

Hunter v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 135 N. C. 458, 47 S. E. 745.

Mr. W. D. McIver for appellee.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We gather from the record these facts: The plaintiff and his brother resided in North Carolina, and their father, S. M. Hancock, at New Church, Virginia. The family burial ground is Goodwill cemetery, in Maryland, 8 or 10 miles from the father's home. Its nearest depot is Pocomoke City, Maryland, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles away. New Church and Pocomoke City are about 11 or 12 miles distant. On Saturday, July 11, 1903, the plaintiff was at Johns Hopkins Hospital, with his brother, Thomas, and his wife.

Co. 39 L. R. A. 463; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Robinson, 34 L. R. A. 431; Cashion v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 45 L. R. A. 160; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Ferguson, 54 L. R. A. 846; Gray v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 56 L. R. A. 301; Connelly v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 56 L. R. A. 663; Robinson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 57 L. R. A. 611; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Crocker, 59 L. R. A. 398; Cowan v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 64 L. R. A. 545; Barnes v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 65 L. R. A. 606; and Green v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 67 L. R. A. 985.

Thomas had gone there for an operation, under which he died. At the defendant's office in the hospital, about 6 P. M. Saturday, the plaintiff filed a telegram as follows: "S. M. Hancock, New Church. Thomas dead. Will arrive at Pocomoke 3 A. M. H. S. Hancock." This telegram was not delivered until Monday, 13th. There being no earlier train, the plaintiff, with his brother's body, and the widow, arrived at Pocomoke City Monday morning a half hour late, at 4 o'clock. A storm prevailed, which prevented the plaintiff leaving the train until 6:30 A. M. There was no one to meet him, and no preparation had been made for the burial. The plaintiff again telegraphed by the Postal Company to his father, who arrived between 9 and 10 A. M. Preparations were made, and the interment took place about 5 P. M.

1. The contract in this case was made in Maryland, and the contracting parties are presumed in law to have had in contemplation only such damages arising from the breach of it as could be awarded under the law of Maryland at the date of the telegram. In this case the sender was in Maryland at the time he filed his telegram. The sendee was in Virginia. The defendant, we judge by depositions in the record, was under the belief that the law of Virginia in some way affects this contract. The law of Virginia has no relation to it. If a telegraphic message is delivered to the company in one state to be transmitted by it to a place in another state, the validity and interpretation of the contract, as well as the rule measuring the damages arising upon a breach and the company's liability therefor, are to be determined by the laws of the former state, where the contract originated. Bryan v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 133 N. C. 607, 45 S. E. 938, Citing Reed v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 135 Mo. 661, 34 L. R. A. 492, 58 Am. St. Rep. 609, 37 S. W. 904. If under the law of Maryland, as interpreted and expounded by its highest court, damages on account of mental anguish, not connected with or growing out of a physical injury to the plaintiff's person, could not be awarded, then the plaintiff in this action can recover only the costs of the telegram and costs. Where, as on the trial had in this case, the defendant relied upon the testimony of an attorney at law in Maryland, who testified by deposition as to what he believed the law of that state to be, the court very properly submitted to the jury the testimony to be passed on by them as to its credibility and value. If the jury render a verdict in any case contrary to the clear weight of the evidence, the remedy is, and it is the duty of the trial judge, to set it aside; but we cannot ordinarily review the exercise of such power. Possibly the jury were not satisfied from the deposition of the attorney (Mr. Cross) as to what is the law of Maryland. The defendant will have an opportunity on the next trial to further enlighten the court and jury more specifically upon the law as to the proper measure of damages for mental anguish as it is administered in Maryland.

2. The judge, among other things, charged the jury that, "upon the question of damages, the message upon its face disclosing its urgency and relating to death, the defendant had notice that a failure to deliver might reasonably cause mental anguish to the sender; and in such case the damages for mental anguish are such damages as the jury shall find the plaintiff has suffered from disappointment and regret occasioned by the fault or neglect of the company in its failure to notify the sendee, in order that preparations and arrangements might be made for the reception and interment of the body." The court erred in using the words "disappointment and regret." There is a very material difference between the significance of those words and that keen and poignant mental suffering signified by the words "mental anguish." The right to recover damages for purely mental anguish not connected with or growing out of a physical injury is the settled law of this state, and it is too late now to question it. Our authorities are up to this time uniform and unanimous as to the general doctrine. Differences, of course, arise as to its application in particular cases. Young v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 107 N. C. 370, 9 L. R. A. 669, 22 Am. St. Rep. 883, 11 S. E. 1044, to Hunter v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 135 N. C. 459, 47 S. E. 745. The language used in nearly all the cases in this and other states where such damages are allowed is "grief and mental anguish." We do not find anywhere that damages are allowed for "disappointment and regret." The lexicographers define anguish to be "intense pain of body or mind." It is derived from the Latin word anguis, a snake, referring to the writhing or twisting of the animal body when in great pain. Stornmouth's Dict. Mr. Justice Douglas, speaking for the court, said: "We use the word 'anguish' as indicating a high degree of mental suffering, without which the plaintiff should not recover substantial damages. Mere disappointment would not amount to mental anguish, or entitle the plaintiff to more than nominal damages." Hunter's Case, 135 N. C. 459, 47 S. E. 745. The addition of the word "regret" by his honor does not help the matter. Regret indicates no greater degree of mental suffering than does disappointment. Both are of very frequent occurrence in the lives of most men, and with some scarcely disturb their mental poise. In this connection we desire to supplement what was said by Judge Douglas in Hunter's Case as to what particular mental anguish is to be considered by the jury in awarding damages. Jurors may possibly confound the mental anguish naturally arising from the loss of a near relative with that which grows out of the defendant's negligence. The jury have no right to consider anything except the latter in awarding damages. We commend to the careful consideration of the superior-court judges the language of the opinion in the Hunter Case, upon that subject, and that they explain the law in reference thereto with great care to the juries, whether requested to do so or not, lest injustice be done the defendant by confounding the natural grief at the loss of a near kinsman with that anguish which is claimed to result from the negligence of telegraph companies.

3. The judge charged the jury that they might consider the failure of the father to arrange for the interment of the deceased, if they should find from the evidence that such arrangements would naturally be presumed to have been made by the sendee if the telegram had been delivered prior to the arrival of the train on Monday. It is plain that the plaintiff has no cause for complaint that his father did not meet the 3 A. M. train Sunday, for the plaintiff did not arrive until Monday at 4 A. M. The only contention the plaintiff makes is that, if the telegram had been delivered with reasonable promptness, his father would have met him promptly on Monday morning, and would have had all arrangements made for the interment, so that it would not have been delayed from about 10 A. M. until 5 P. M. Monday, in consequence of which delay the plaintiff avers he suffered great mental anguish, and claims damages on that account. The plaintiff must therefore prove that his father could and would have met him promptly on Monday morning on arrival of the train at 4 o'clock, and that he could and would have made on Sunday, or prior to the plaintiff's arrival, all necessary arrangements for the prompt interment of his brother's body on Monday morning, and avoided the delay in the obsequies from 10 A. M. until 5 P. M., thereby saving the plaintiff from the pangs of mental anguish which he avers he endured. The law does not presume that the father could have done these things. Many contingencies, such as illness, absence from home, inability to get the work done on Sunday, may have prevented, however willing the father may have been to discharge such a parental duty. There was no evidence tending to prove such facts, and the jury had no right to presume them. In Bright v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 132 N. C. 326, 43 S. E. 844, Justice Walker says, referring to defendant's objection to the testimony of Cooper, the addressee, that he would have gone to Wilkesboro had he received the telegram, that the testimony was not only competent, but indispensable; and uses the following language: "We are unable to understand why this is not competent. It tended to prove the very fact which the defendant, in the last exception considered by us, asserted it was necessary for the plaintiff to prove in order to recover substantial damages; and it was necessary to prove this fact if the plaintiff sought, as she did by her complaint and evidence, to recover damages for the mental anguish which resulted from his failure to go to Wilkesboro."

As there is to be a new trial, it is unnecessary to consider the defendant's further exceptions. They relate to alleged errors that may not again occur.

Morgan, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was convicted of the crime of burglary in the third degree, and sentenced to five years in the penitentiary. His principal contention on the appeal is that the court erred in refusing to give certain requested instructions bearing on the relation of the owner of the building, and of a certain detective, to the commission of the alleged crime. His claim is that the owner of the building consented to the burglary, and that defendant was instigated to commit the burglary under the undue influence of the detective in causing him to become intoxicated.

The facts are uncontradicted in respect to what transpired before the burglary, and are as follows: About January, 1904, several crimes, including burglaries, larcenies, and arson, were committed in Minto, Walsh county, North Dakota, without any success by the local authorities in arresting the perpetrators and bringing them to trial. Thereupon the county authorities sought the aid of one Walker, a detective from St. Paul. The detective had an interview with the state's attorney upon his arrival in the county, and secured from him the names of the persons suspected of complicity in the past crimes, among them being the name of the defendant. The detective thereupon acted as a cook in a restaurant in Minto. This restaurant was kept in connection with a place kept by one Gile, where intoxicating liquors were unlawfully sold. The restaurant feature of the establishment was a pretense, as a matter of fact, and was resorted to for the purpose of giving to the detective the appearance of having employment at the place. After some days the defendant and Walker became acquainted, and soon became constant companions. They ate together, slept together, drank to excess together, and became confidential with each other and intimate in their relations. The detective loaned the defendant small sums of money at one time, and in conversation about money matters the detective told defendant that he had $65 coming from Canada. The defendant then stated to Walker that he knew where "we could get some money," and, upon being asked where, answered, "in some of these stores around here." The defendant and Walker finally, and after much consideration of the time and place of a burglary, concluded to break into a store. The detective says in respect to the final conclusion: "We arranged a deal to break this store open." The first suggestion of a burglary, as between the defendant and Walker, came from the defendant. Several stores were suggested by the defendant as ones that might be burglarized, and among them Zulesdorff's, the one that was broken into. Before the store to be burglarized was agreed upon, Walker secured a letter of introduction to the mayor of Minto from the state's attorney. Walker presented the letter to the mayor, and told him of the contemplated burglary, and further stated: "I told him what I was there for, and told him about the stores, this building to be broken open, and told him that I didn't want myself in some place where I might get shot, . . . and told the doctor, if he knew any store-keeper in town there that would keep a secret, he had better go and notify him, and afterwards I would see him." Dr. Evans, the mayor, suggested that Zulesdorff's store be selected, and saw Zulesdorff in pursuance of this request, and Zulesdorff sent Walker word that he wished to see him. Walker saw Zulesdorff thereafter, and testifies as to what transpired between them as follows: "And he said that he had seen Dr. Evans, and he said that things would be all right; and I told him that after it was broken into he was to keep still about it, and told him what I wanted to know on the outside; and I said, 'By doing that I can get in a little work, and can find out the rest of these people;' so that was about all that was said between I and Frank Zulesdorff."

Later, he testified as follows upon his further cross-examination:

Q. And Zulesdorff told you it would be all right?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that he would permit you to use his store in your plans, and would keep the matter a secret for a sufficient length of time to enable you to complete the job?

A. Yes, sir.

Zulesdorff did nothing further in reference to the burglary, except that he marked two $5 bills that he left in the money drawer with other money on the Saturday night preceding the burglary, which was committed on Sunday night. The doors and safe and money drawers were locked, and left in the same manner as usual. He marked the bills so that he could identify them in case they were stolen. On these facts it is claimed that Zulesdorff consented to the breaking, and that the defendant cannot, in consequence of such consent, be rightfully convicted of the crime of burglary.

After the conversation between Zulesdorff and Dr. Evans and Walker, it was definitely decided by defendant and Walker that the Zulesdorff store was the one to be burglarized. Walker says that he never made any suggestions to the defendant as to the burglary; that he simply acquiesced and agreed to defendant's plans. In answer to a question as to "why you didn't go on with your plans then, everything being all right," he testifies: "Yes sir, right enough if I had wanted to work the plan myself, but I didn't want to do that. I wanted him to do it himself, if he wanted to do it." Walker and defendant agreed to break into the store Saturday night, and went to the store for that purpose, but something happened after they got to the store causing the breaking to be abandoned on defendant's request. He then said, however, "We will try it to-morrow night." On Sunday night they again went to the store, and broke into it by joint force. The defendant removed the marked bills and other money from the money drawer, and a fur-lined coat was also taken from the store by defendant, and they left the building together. After leaving the building the money, $18.60, was equally divided between them. The overcoat was hidden in a livery barn by the defendant, and subsequently found by an officer and returned to the owner. In a few days the defendant was arrested at the instance of one Gile, and his trial and conviction followed.

Upon these facts, two questions are presented for consideration which were raised at the trial by requests to instruct the jury, and they were also urged on a motion for a new trial: (1) Did the owner of the property consent to the breaking into of his building by the defendant? (2) Did the fact of the detective Walker's participation in the burglary entitle the defendant to a reversal of the judgment of conviction?

Upon the first question, the facts as narrated show that Zulesdorff did nothing by any act to aid in the burglary of his building. He remained passive after being informed of the intended burglary. The plan of a burglary had been arranged before he was advised of the plan of the detective to join the defendant in the proposed burglary as a feigned participant. Zulesdorff gave the detective no instructions. He did not advise him as to the manner of proceeding, nor do anything to assist in the burglary. The store was closed and locked in the usual manner. When he consented to remain away, at the request of the detective, for the purpose of securing evidence, it was not certain that his store was the one to be burglarized, nor when it was to occur. The Zulesdorff store was selected as the one to be burglarized after the detective's interview with him. Under these conditions it cannot be said that he consented to the burglary. Before the owner's consent will be a defense to a burglary, the owner must participate, or in some way aid or solicit or encourage the burglary. Mere knowledge that a person's property is to be burglarized, followed by inaction on his part to thwart it, is not deemed a consent to it. His consent must be manifested by some act of assistance. Mere passiveness for the purpose of securing evidence of the burglary is not such consent as can be urged by the burglar as a defense. The detective was not the agent of Zulesdorff in the matter at all, nor did he have charge of the building in any sense, hence the detective's acts cannot be said to be those of the owner. In People v. Hanselman, 76 Cal. 460, 9 Am. St. Rep. 238, 18 Pac. 425, the court said: "And under the authorities we do not think that there is such consent where there is mere passive submission on the part of the owner of the goods taken, and no indication that he wishes them taken, and no knowledge by the taker that [he] . . . wishes them taken, and no mutual understanding between the two, and no active measures of inducement employed for the purpose of leading into temptation, and no preconcert whatever between the thief and the owner." In State v. Sneff, 22 Neb. 481, 35 N. W. 219, the court said: "The fact that those in charge of a building hear of an intended burglary to be committed by breaking into the building, do not prevent it, but put a force in the building to capture the burglar, and he is so captured, does not affect the guilt of any burglar." In a similar case to this, in State v. Jansen, 22 Kan. 498, in speaking of the conduct of the owner of the building the court said: "His willingness to assist in and facilitate the detection and arrest of a criminal was no consent to the commission of the crime." In McAdams v. State, 8 Lea, 456, the court said: "A man may direct his servant or a third person to appear to encourage the design of a thief and lead him on until the offense is complete, so long as he does not induce the original intent, but only provides for its discovery after it has been formed." See also Thompson v. State, 18 Ind. 386, 81 Am. Dec. 364; Clark, Crim. Law, p. 11; Varner v. State, 72 Ga. 745; State v. Stickney, 53 Kan. 308, 42 Am. St. Rep. 284, 36 Pac. 714; State v. Adams, 115 N. C. 775, 20 S. E. 722; 6 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 182, and cases cited.

Upon the second question, the state's evidence shows that the detective did not instigate the commission of the offense. The suggestion of committing the crime, and the active planning of it, is shown to have come from the defendant. The detective fell in and agreed with the defendant's plan. It is true the detective deceived the defendant as to the purpose of his complicity in the crime. He assisted by his acts, but with a hidden purpose. Without commending this practice, or commenting upon it as dangerous and generally of doubtful propriety, we will say that, if the defendant is shown to have committed the crime in its completeness, the feigned complicity of a detective in the crime should not be a shield to the defendant. The authorities almost unanimously hold that a detective may aid in the commission of the offense in conjunction with a criminal, and that the fact will not exonerate the guilty party. Mere deception by the detective will not shield the defendant, if the offense be committed by him free from the influence or instigation of the detective. The detective must not prompt or urge or lead in the commission of the offense. The defendant must act freely of his own motion, and, if he so acts, the fact that the detective was not an accomplice in fact will not accrue to his benefit. The defendant is not to be charged with what was done by the detective, as the two are not acting together for a common purpose. As was said by the court in State v. Jansen, 22 Kan. 498: "The act of a detective may, perhaps, not be imputable to the defendant, as there is a want of a community of motive. . . . But where each of the overt acts going to make up the crime charged is personally done by the defendant, and with criminal intent, his guilt is complete, no matter what motives may prompt or what acts be done by the party who is with and apparently assisting him." The cases cited above are all to the effect that the assistance of a detective in a burglary is no defense to a person who himself does every act essential to constitute the burglary.

The defendant did not testify at the trial, hence the facts as to what transpired between him and Walker at and before the burglary are all to be gathered from Walker's testimony. From this testimony, carefully scrutinized, there is no support, even by inference from the facts stated, for the contention that Walker instigated the crime, hence the proposed requests on the question of the instigation of the crime by him were properly refused as not applicable to the case under any theory or hypothesis to be drawn therefrom. The court gave the jury correct instructions on the question of consent. They were told that mere knowledge by the owner that the building was to be burglarized, without taking steps to prevent the same, would not be a consent to the commission of the offense. They were also instructed that, if the building was burglarized by the "procurement and consent" of the owner, the defendant would not be guilty. The jury were properly instructed on the effect of the intoxication of the defendant. Under such instructions the jury should have acquitted the defendant if the facts warranted a finding of intoxication as defined in the instructions. The evidence, in our judgment, would not warrant a finding that he was intoxicated at all when the crime was committed.

Complaint is made on the ruling of the court in admitting admissions in the nature of a confession made by the defendant in the presence of the state's attorney and others soon after the offense was committed. The ground of complaint is that such confession was made under the inducement of a promise made by the detective. The detective told the defendant while in jail after his arrest that "in order to help himself out" he had better tell who the parties were that were implicated in the crimes that had previously been committed in Minto. There was nothing said by him at this time as to the commission of the offense for which he was tried and what was there said by defendant was not admitted in evidence. In the conversation or presence of the state's attorney, the defendant admitted having assisted in burglarizing the Zulesdorff store. At this time defendant knew that Walker was a detective. But there was no promise made, and there is no ground for any claim that the admission was not voluntarily made, and without any suggestion even of any benefit to be gained by him by such admission. The admission was admissible. Willett v. People, 27 Hun. 460.

The court read to the jury the section of the Code relating to persons on trial for offenses not becoming witnesses for themselves, and the effect thereof, and that the jury should not consider that fact in making up their verdict. We have recently held that giving such instruction is not error. State v. Wisniewski, 13 N. D. —, 102 N. W. 883.

Exceptions were saved to the introduction and to the exclusion of certain evidence. We have carefully considered these exceptions, and find them without merit. One of these exceptions relates to excluded evidence of the defendant's condition as to sobriety when he was arrested two days after the burglary. Another relates to the ownership of the livery barn where the overcoat was hidden, and that the owner was defendant's father. Other assignments of error in refusing requests have been carefully considered, and found not prejudicial error, but 69 L. R. A.

properly refused. The evidence amply sustains the verdict, and the trial was without prejudicial error.

The judgment is affirmed.

All concur.

- *1. In an action to recover damages for false and fraudulent representations, by which the plaintiff had been induced to exchange real property for stock in a corporation, and had affirmed the contract after discovering the deceit, the measure of plaintiff's recovery, in the absence of a claim for special or exemplary damages, is the difference in value between what was received or parted with, as the case may be, and what would have been received or parted with, had the representations been true.
2. Misrepresentation of the price paid for property by the vendor or others does not constitute actionable deceit, in the absence of fiduciary relations between the parties, or other facts or circumstances giving rise to an express or implied agreement that the price paid should determine the price in the contract.
3. Where the facts found in a special verdict are insufficient to support the judgment for plaintiff, by reason of the absence of findings on matters in dispute essential to the complete determination of the issues, a new trial must be granted.

Messrs. F. B. Feetham and Scott Rex for respondent.

Engerud, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment for plaintiff in an action to recover damages for alleged deceit in the exchange of property. The case was submitted to the jury for a special verdict, upon which judgment was ordered and entered against these appellants. A motion for new trial was made, based in part upon a statement of the case specifying as grounds for a new trial numerous errors of law, and the insufficiency of the evidence to justify some of the findings of the jury, and the insufficiency of the verdict to support the judgment. The motion for a new trial was denied. This appeal is from the judgment.

The appellants contend that the facts found by the jury are insufficient to sustain the judgment, and we think the point is well taken. The facts upon which plaintiff must base his right to recover are those established by the admissions in the pleadings and by the special verdict. So far as material on this appeal, the pleadings disclose substantially the following facts: On or about December 28, 1901, respondent purchased and received from the appellants 750 shares of stock in a coal-mining corporation in which the appellants were stockholders. The par value of the stock was $100 per share, but it was sold to the respondent at a valuation of $20 per share, or $15,000; and in exchange for said stock he sold and conveyed to the appellants a lot and business block owned by him, worth, exclusive of encumbrances, $15,000. The respondent did not avail himself of the right to rescind the transaction when he discovered the alleged fraud on the part of appellant. He retains the stock, and has affirmed the contract. He seeks to recover compensation for the loss which he avers he has suffered by reason of the falsity of the representations of the appellants.

All that the jury found touching misrepresentation by these appellants appears in the following questions and answers of the special verdict: "Question 5. Did the defendant Wright represent to plaintiff, with intent to induce him to purchase said stock, that defendants Pringle and Bates, or either of them, had purchased stock of said corporation at the price of $20 per share, for which they had paid the sum of $20,000? Answer. Yes." In answer to question 6 the jury found that Bates made the same representation set forth in question 5. "Question 9. Did the defendant Wright represent to plaintiff, with intent to induce him to purchase such stock of said corporation, that said corporation then had in its treasury a large amount of money available for the development of the mine of said corporation? Answer. Yes." In response to question 10 the jury found that Bates did not make the representation embodied in question 9. In response to other questions the jury found that the representations found to have been made were known by the persons making them to be false, and that plaintiff relied thereon, and was induced thereby to purchase the stock.

The only finding as to damage was the following: "What detriment did the plaintiff suffer by reason of purchasing such stock? Answer. $9,995.75." The form of this question indicates the erroneous theory upon which the case was submitted to the jury. Bearing in mind that the plaintiff had voluntarily affirmed the trade after knowledge of the alleged deceit, it will be seen that the jury were asked to award the plaintiff compensation, not solely for the deceit, but also for the plaintiff's own folly in adhering to a bad bargain. The jury were instructed that the measure of damages was the difference between the actual value of the stock purchased and the value of the property given in exchange. It was undisputed that the real property traded for the stock was worth $15,000. The method by which the jury were instructed to arrive at the answer to the question as to damages is shown by the following instruction: "The proof shows that at this time [December 28, 1901] there were 9,100 shares of the capital stock of this corporation outstanding, and each of such shares was therefore worth and of the value of the 1-9100 part of the entire assets of the corporation. Having, then, first determined the actual market value of the entire assets and business of said company at the time, you will divide such value by 9,100, the number of shares of stock then outstanding. This will give the actual value of each of such shares of stock at that time. Plaintiff purchased 750 shares of such stock, at the price of $20 per share. If you find that said stock at said time was worth less than $20 per share, then the difference between what you find to be the actual value of each share and $20 will be the damage that plaintiff sustained on each share, and 750 times this will be the total sum at which you will assess plaintiff's damages in answer to the above question." These instructions were excepted to by the defendants, and are assigned as error.

The business of this corporation was in an undeveloped state. It owned a large quantity of land in the lignite coal belt, and that land was the principal part of its tangible assets. It was unknown as yet whether the enterprise would be a profitable one or not. In other words, it was a purely speculative venture. It was undisputed that the plaintiff knew it to be such when he bought the stock, and that one of the principal inducements for him to buy the stock was the hope of great and sudden wealth, which the investment promised to yield if the enterprise should prove to be a profitable speculation. It appears from the record of the evidence admitted and excluded, and the instructions of the court, that in determining the value of the stock the jury were permitted to take into consideration only the actual net value of the tangible assets of the corporation. It is apparent that, if the respondent's theory of this case shall prevail, the result will be that respondent will have all the advantages of the speculative features of the enterprise, without assuming all the risk of such a speculation. His position is precisely the same as if he were to claim a right to share in the distribution of prizes at a lottery without paying for the chance. It is no answer to this proposition to say that respondent would not have engaged in the enterprise if he had not been deceived by the appellants. The unanswerable objection to that argument is that respondent voluntarily chose to adhere to the bargain, and retain all the benefits and advantages of the speculation, after he knew he had been deceived. He thereby forever estopped himself to claim any compensation for loss resulting from the making of the trade. It was an affirmance of the contract. Whether the bargain was good or bad, he must abide by it and take the consequences of his speculation. He cannot affirm the contract to the extent of the actual, present value of the tangible property received, and repudiate the speculative feature of it. Upon the discovery of the deceit he had his election to rescind or affirm, but he could not rescind in part and affirm the remainder. An affirmance in part validated the entire contract. Rev. Codes 1899, § 3934; Grannis v. Hooker, 31 Wis. 474. Having thus validated the contract, the only remedy left to the respondent was to seek compensation in damages for the loss resulting from the falsity of the representations upon the faith of which he made the trade. The rule by which such damages are to be measured, where no special or exemplary damages are claimed, was announced by this court in Fargo Gas & Coke Co. v. Fargo Gas & Electric Co. 4 N. D. 219, 37 L. R. A. 593, 59 N. W. 1066, to be the difference between what the property received would have been worth if as represented, and what it was actually worth at the time of the sale. 69 L. R. A.

In other words, the measure of damages for deceit where the contract is affirmed is precisely the same as for a breach of warranty in a contract of sale. Respondent argues that the rule adopted and applied in that case is not a universal rule of general application, but is applicable only where the circumstances are like those in that case. Counsel cites § 4997, Rev. Codes: "For the breach of an obligation not arising from contract, the measure of damages, except when otherwise expressly provided by this Code, is the amount which will compensate for all the detriment proximately caused thereby, whether it could have been anticipated or not." And § 3941, Rev. Codes 1899: "One who wilfully deceives another with intent to induce him to alter his position to his injury or risk is liable for any damage which he thereby suffers." He further cites § 3942, Rev. Codes 1899, defining actionable deceit, and § 3848, Rev. Codes 1899, defining actual fraud, and calls attention to the fact that actionable deceit and actual fraud are defined by the statute in the same language. From these provisions of the Code the conclusion is deduced that in all cases of actual fraud the defrauded party can waive rescission and recover damages, and that such damages are to be measured by the difference in value between what he received and what he parted with, regardless of the nature of the false representations. According to respondent's theory, it matters not whether the representations were such as to affect the value of the subject-matter of the contract, or not. If they come within the general definition of actual fraud, and the contract was induced thereby, the victim of the deceit can recover damages measured by the rule he has stated.

The provisions of the Civil Code cited by counsel are merely declaratory of well-established common-law principles. Deceit is actual fraud, and where the apparent consent of one party to a contract has been induced by the actual fraud of the other the contract is voidable. It is voidable not because of any supposed pecuniary damage done to the defrauded party, but because the consent of the latter was not free. Rev. Codes 1899, §§ 3836, 3841-3844. And fraud, actual or constructive, renders a contract voidable for the same reason that mistake, undue influence, duress, etc., have the same effect. Sections 3941, 3942, Rev. Codes 1899, merely declare that actual fraud is a tort for which the guilty party is liable to the injured party if any damage has been suffered by the latter. In other words, actual fraud, with damage, is a good cause of action, and constitutes actionable deceit. These statutory declarations of general principles throw no light on the precise question in this case. It is conceded that a person guilty of deceit is liable for all damages proximately resulting from the wrong. The question to be determined is, What loss, if any, has the plaintiff suffered as the proximate result of the false representations? Respondent asserts that he was inveigled into the speculation by the deceit of the appellants, and therefore the false representations are the proximate cause of the loss he has suffered. The argument is more plausible than sound. While it is true that he was inveigled into the speculation under a false impression of the facts, it is also conceded that he voluntarily elected to retain his interest in the enterprise after he was aware of the defendants' misrepresentations, and notwithstanding that he could have escaped all the consequences of a bad speculation by withdrawing from it by rescission. It is therefore clear that that part of the loss which would have resulted from the making of such a trade on the same terms without deceit is due to plaintiff's own folly, and is not properly chargeable to the false representation.

An instructive case on this subject is that of Page v. Parker, 43 N. H. 363, 80 Am. Dec. 172. The plaintiff had been induced by false representations to purchase an interest in a marble quarry, and pay therefor a sum much greater than its actual value. The defendants had made many representations. Some were false, some true, and others immaterial. The plaintiff sued to recover damages for deceit. The court held that the measure of damages in such cases is the difference between the value of the property as it actually was, and its value as it would have been if it were such as it was represented to be in those particulars in relation to which the false and fraudulent representations were made. The qualifying clause which we have italicized was said to be advisable in order to make it clear to the jury that the damages must be confined to such items of loss as were proximately caused by the representations which were false and material. To illustrate: If there were ten material representations, and only one was false, the plaintiff was entitled to compensation only to the extent that the value of the quarry was diminished by the nonexistence of the one fact which was falsely represented to exist. In Van Epps v. Harrison, 5 Hill, 63, 40 Am. Dec. 314, a good illustration of the same proposition appears. The defendant had given his bond for an interest in certain land, which was supposed to be very valuable as a town site. The price paid for the land was far in excess of its real value, having been based upon "boom" prices of land then prevailing. The defendant, among other things, claimed that the plaintiff had been guilty of deceit in the sale by falsely representing that the land was even, level, and suitable for building purposes, and required no grading. Justice Bronson, in stating the measure of damages to be applied in that case, used this language: "As the land, whether the representations were true or false, was in reality worth only a small part of the price which the defendant agreed to pay, there may be some difficulty in answering the question. . . . We must not go back to the date of the contract for the price, and then come down to the present day for the actual value of the land, and charge the plaintiff with the difference. The defendant must bear the consequences of the prevailing delusion about prices and new towns under which the purchase was made. On the other hand, the plaintiff cannot say that his fraud has worked no injury, because everybody has now found out that the land never was worth anything for the purpose of building a town upon it. . . . The cause must, as far as practicable, be tried just as it would have been tried the day after the contract was made, if the question had arisen at that time. The jury must assume, what the parties then believed, that the land was valuable as the site for a town, and then inquire how much less the land was worth for building purposes, taking the surface as it actually existed, than it would have been worth for those purposes had the plaintiff's representation concerning the surface been true." We believe these cases are sound and in accord with the overwhelming weight of authority. They illustrate the application of the rule announced by this court in Fargo Gas & Coke Co. v. Fargo Gas & Electric Co. 4 N. D. 219, 37 L. R. A. 593, 59 N. W. 1066, in cases where the circumstances were analogous to those presented by the case at bar. We can conceive of no reason why the circumstances of this case should call for the application of different principles in determining the rights and liabilities of the parties than are applied in other cases of deceit. There are cases which seem to make such a distinction. Amongst them may be mentioned Crater v. Binniger, 33 N. J. L. 513, 97 Am. Dec. 737; Smith v. Bolles, 132 U. S. 125, 33 L. ed. 279, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 39; Sigafus v. Porter, 179 U. S. 116, 45 L. ed. 113, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 34; Reynolds v. Franklin, 44 Minn. 30, 20 Am. St. Rep. 540, 46 N. W. 139; Higb v. Berret, 148 Pa. 261, 23 Atl. 1004. These cases seem to hold that in such cases as this the measure of damages is that adopted by the trial court,—the difference in value between what is parted with and what is received. These cases seem to proceed upon the theory advocated by the respondent in this case,—that the entire loss resulting from a contract induced by false representation is proximately caused by the deceit, because the contract would not have been made if deceit had not been practised. For the reasons hereinbefore stated, that theory is, in our opinion, erroneous. The first case in this country which we can find in which such a theory is advanced is that of Crater v. Binninger, 33 N. J. L. 513, 97 Am. Dec. 737, where Chief Justice Beasley confidently asserts that the rule is well established. The chancellor, however, wrote a separate opinion in that case, from which it appears that he differed from the chief justice as to the ordinary rule of damages in cases of deceit. The chancellor proceeds to show that the ordinary measure of compensation for deceit is the same as for breach of warranty, but concludes his opinion with the following remarkable proposition: "In this case Crater was willing to go in with Binninger at the cost price. Had Binninger told him truly that the cost price was $18,000, he would, no doubt, have been willing to go in at that price, and would have paid at that rate, and, if any subsequent loss was sustained, would have had no claim against Binninger; and the true measure of damages appears to me to be the excess which he was induced to pay by the false and fraudulent representation of Binninger. If that was the difference between $18,000 and $28,000, the one eighth would be $1,250, which, with the interest, would be the real damage. And the plaintiff below would be entitled to recover these damages, although he had made double the amount out of the enterprise as clear profit. If, however, the jury would believe that Crater, if he had been told the real price, would not have entered into the transaction at that price, but would have taken a share in the lands only at the higher price, then his embarking in the transaction at all was the result of the fraud of Binninger, and the rule of the judge at the trial was the correct one; but it should have been so stated to the jury." If we understand the chancellor's language correctly, it was his opinion that in such a case the jury should be left to speculate as to the probable course of conduct which the injured party would or would not have pursued under one or the other supposed state of facts, and the measure of compensation would depend upon what the jury conjectured the plaintiff would have done if he had known the truth. As both opinions were for reversal of the trial court, it is impossible to tell which of the two opinions received the sanction of the majority of the court. In Smith v. Bolles, 132 U. S. 125, 33 L. ed. 279, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 39, the opinion of Chief Justice Beasley in Crater v. Binninger is cited as authority. As an additional reason for adopting that rule, Chief Justice Fuller said that the defendant should not be held liable for "the expected fruits of an unrealized speculation." If it were true that the other rule imposed such liability, it is obvious that the argument of the chief justice would be fatal to the universal rule prevailing in case of breach of warranty. In cases of deceit or for breach of warranty, as well as in all other actions in tort or on contract for the recovery of damages, conjecture or speculation as a basis for estimating damages are excluded, for reasons familiar to the profession; and consequently the prevailing rule in breach of warranty and deceit does not in fact give the injured party "the expected fruits of an unrealized speculation." The decision in Smith v. Bolles was followed and approved in Sigafus v. Porter, 179 U. S. 116, 45 L. ed. 113, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 34. The same doctrine seems to have been given root in England by the case of Peek v. Derry, L. R. 37 Ch. Div. 541, decided in 1887. That case was reversed by the House of Lords (L. R. 14 App. Cas. 357) on the ground that the facts did not constitute actionable deceit, and hence there was no occasion to express any opinion as to the propriety of the measure of damages adopted in the lower court. The American cases which have adopted the rule advocated by Chief Justice Beasley in Crater v. Binninger, 33 N. J. L. 513, 97 Am. Dec. 737, seem to have been based upon the authority of Crater v. Binninger, Smith v. Bolles, 132 U. S. 125, 33 L. ed. 279, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 39, and Peek v. Derry, L. R. 37 Ch. Div. 541. The weight of authority as well as the better reason is against the rule supported by these cases. See cases cited in Fargo Gas & Coke Co. v. Fargo Gas & Electric Co. 4 N. D. 219, 37 L. R. A. 593, 59 N. W. 1066; 4 Sutherland, Damages, 3d ed. p. 3401, note 1.

It is plain to be seen that the rule advocated in the cases mentioned in some instances deprives the plaintiff of full compensation for the loss of what his bargain entitled him to, and in others imposes upon the defendant liability for losses not attributable to his fault. That rule sets up an arbitrary measure of damages, which violates that cardinal principle of the law of torts that the party at fault shall be held liable only for just compensation for the detriment proximately caused by his wrongful act. That principle is expressed in our

Civil Code by § 5014, Rev. Codes 1899, as follows: "Notwithstanding the provisions of this chapter, no person can recover a greater amount in damages for the breach of an obligation [contract of tort] than he could have gained by the full performance thereof on both sides except in the cases specified in the subdivisions on exemplary damages and penal damages and in §§ 4996, 5003, and 5004." (Breach of promise to marry, seduction, and wilful or grossly negligent injury to domestic animals.)

We can see no difficulty in applying to the facts of this case the same rule which was applied in Fargo Gas & Coke Co. v. Fargo Gas & Electric Co. 4 N. D. 219, 37 L. R. A. 593, 59 N. W. 1066. Compare what has been received with what would have been received if the facts had been as they were represented to be, or, if the deceit affected the amount of money or property parted with, compare the value of that property with what should have been given if there had been no deceit. The difference is the measure of compensation for plaintiff's loss if there are no penal or exemplary damages. It is apparent that the speculative feature of the transaction is common to both terms of the equation, and is therefore eliminated from the problem.

It follows from what has been said that the findings of the special verdict are insufficient to support the judgment. It is apparent that the representation as to what others paid for the stock did not affect its value. It has not been found that there were any fiduciary relations existing between the parties, or that there were any other facts or circumstances giving rise to an implied agreement that the price paid by the vendor or others should be the price to the plaintiff. It is not found or admitted that there was any express contract to that effect. In the absence of special circumstances of that nature, a mere false statement as to the price paid by the vendor or others is not actionable deceit. Hauk v. Brownell, 120 Ill. 161, 11 N. E. 416; Teachout v. Van Hoesen, 76 Iowa, 113, 1 L. R. A. 664, 14 Am. St. Rep. 206, 40 N. W. 96; Kilgore v. Bruce, 166 Mass. 136, 44 N. E. 108; Davenport v. Buchanan, 6 S. D. 376, 61 N. W. 47; Coulter v. Clark, 66 N. E. 739; Sandford v. Handy, 23 Wend. 260; Smith v. Countryman, 30 N. Y. 655; Ellis v. Andrews, 56 N. Y. 83, 15 Am. Rep. 379; Fairchild v. McMahon, 139 N. Y. 290, 36 Am. St. Rep. 701, 34 N. E. 779; Miller v. Barber, 66 N. Y. 558; Hubbell v. Meigs, 50 N. Y. 480; Medbury v. Watson, 6 Met. 246, 39 Am. Dec. 726; Hemmer v. 69 L. R. A.

Cooper, 8 Allen, 334; and other cases cited in notes 4 and 5, p. 492, Bigelow, Fr.

To avoid any misapprehension from the use of the term "fiduciary relation" in speaking of the special circumstances under which a misrepresentation as to cost or value may constitute deceit, we will say that we do not use that term in its technical sense. We apply it to any situation where trust and confidence are reposed by one party in another under such circumstances as to impose on the person trusted the obligation to act in good faith.

It has been said that the courts of Massachusetts and Maine have held that a misrepresentation as to cost is not material, and that those courts are at variance with the courts of New York and others. Bigelow, Fr. p. 492. This loose expression has led to the erroneous idea that some courts—especially those of New York—have held that a mere misrepresentation of cost may constitute actionable deceit. The language of Justice Bronson in Van Epps v. Harrison, 5 Hill, 63, 40 Am. Dec. 314, seems to give color to this idea. The learned justice seems to have entirely overlooked in that case the fact that the plaintiff had either expressly or impliedly agreed that the defendant and the other persons who contributed to the purchase price were to be let in "on the ground floor" in the speculation, on equal terms with the plaintiff, and were therefore entitled, under the contract, to receive their respective shares of the land on the basis of the price paid by the plaintiff. In other words, the terms of the contract itself made the price paid by the vendor a material fact, and hence the misrepresentation as to the price paid was clearly actionable deceit. It was doubtless for this reason that the majority of the court overruled Justice Bronson. Analysis of the other cases in New York and elsewhere, we think, will disclose that there is in fact no real difference of opinion as to when a misrepresentation as to the price paid by the vendor or others will or will not constitute actionable deceit. However inaccurately the idea may be expressed, the rule as exemplified by all the cases seems to be fairly uniform that a mere representation as to the price paid by the vendor or others is not actionable in the absence of special circumstances such as those we have mentioned. The finding that Wright wilfully misrepresented the amount of funds in the treasury convicted the defendant Wright of actionable deceit, but there was no finding or admission in the pleadings or evidence from which it can be ascertained how much he falsely exaggerated the assets in this respect. There are therefore no means of determining the amount of loss by reason of this misrepresentation.

By reason of the erroneous theory as to the measure of damages upon which the case was tried, the findings neither support the judgment, nor exonerate the appellants. There must therefore be a new trial. The view we have taken of the case renders it unnecessary to discuss the other assignments of error, as the questions presented by them are not apt to arise on another trial.

The judgment is reversed and a new trial granted as to both appellants.

All concur.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

Simon W. CRAMER, Plff. in Err.,

v.

SOUTHERN OHIO LOAN & TRUST COMPANY.

(.....Ohio.....)

*1. Section 3836-3, Bates's Anno. Stat. p. 2130, which confers power on building and loan associations "to assess and collect from members and depositors such dues, fines, interest, and premium on loans made, or other assessments, as may be provided for in the constitution and by-laws," and which further provides that "such dues, fines, premiums, or other assessments, shall not be deemed usury, although in excess of the legal rate of interest,"—is a valid enactment, and is not in conflict with § 26 of art. 2, nor with § 2 of art. 1, of the Constitution of Ohio.

2. Under the provisions of said statute, the premium for a loan, if reasonable in amount, need not be ascertained by competitive bidding for precedence in obtaining the loan, but it may be fixed at a uniform rate by the constitution and by-laws of the association.

(who is now deceased) to foreclose a mortgage on certain real estate in that county, and for a personal judgment against the husband. The petition alleges that plaintiff is a corporation under the laws of Ohio, and organized for the purpose of raising money to be loaned among its members, and that it is engaged in that business; that on the 24th day of June, 1896, under an application in writing for that purpose, and submitted to said company, Cramer became a member of the company, and a stockholder to the extent of 17 shares of instalment stock of class B of $100 each share; that on the same day he made application for a loan of $1,700, and offered as security for the same the mortgage in suit, an assignment of all fire insurance on the buildings, and a transfer of the 17 shares of stock; that the application contained, besides a description of the real estate, several conditions with which he would comply; that, acting on the application, the company loaned to Cramer $1,700, and as security for which he gave the mortgage, assigned the fire insurance, and transferred the said shares of stock.

It is alleged that Cramer, as one of the stipulations of the mortgage, "agreed to pay monthly, without demand therefor, until said loan was fully repaid, as follows: 'The dues upon said 17 shares of stock; the 5 per cent premium bid upon said $1,700, 5 per cent interest on said $1,700, and, in addition thereto, to pay all fines, penalties, and other charges which should become due against said shares, and all taxes, assessments, costs of insurance, and other charges upon said premises, in accordance with the constitution and by-laws theretofore duly adopted by said company.' " The dues were fixed at $8.50 per month on the 17 shares. The company alleged that Cramer failed to keep and perform the agreement made in his application and mortgage, so that on the 14th day of October, 1902, the sum due upon said loan, including principal, interest, premiums, fines incurred on said stock, and cost of insurance paid by the company, according to the terms of the agreement, amounted to $2,787.35 and that Cramer had paid thereon in cash and dividends to be applied only the sum of $1,391.83, leaving a balance due at that date of $1,395.52. For this amount the petition prays judgment and foreclosure.

The answer of Cramer admits that he obtained a loan from the Southern Ohio Loan & Trust Company for $1,700, and gave his mortgage to secure the same; admits that he has paid thereon the sum of $1,391.83; but he denies each and every other allegation of the petition. He further answered "that § 3836-3 of the Revised Statutes of Ohio (Bates's Anno. Stat. 2130), in so far as it presumes to authorize building and loan associations to collect dues, fines, interest, and premiums in excess of the legal rate of interest, is unconstitutional, against the public policy of the said state of Ohio, and void." He further claims in the answer "that any amount or sum of money exacted or attempted to be collected by the . . . company is usurious, and he claims the privilege of the usury statutes of the said state of Ohio." For the purpose of a settlement, and for no other purpose, he tendered in the answer the sum of $900, and he prays that "all amounts collected and heretofore paid in excess of the legal rate of interest be credited to him as payments of that amount of principal, and, if the amount found to be due is less than the amount here tendered, that the plaintiff be decreed to pay all costs after the date of making of the said tender." A jury was waived, and the cause was heard and submitted to the court, who made findings of fact in substance, that the plaintiff in that court, on the 24th day of June, 1896, was, and at the time of the trial, a domestic building and loan association, duly organized and empowered under the laws of Ohio, as such associations are described and defined by § 1 of "An Act to Provide for the Organization, Regulation, and Inspection of Building and Loan Associations, passed May 1, 1891" (88 Ohio Laws, p. 469). Further, that on the 24th day of June, 1896, defendant purchased from said company 17 shares of its instalment stock of the par value of $100 each, and became a member of said association, and that on the same day, and as part of the same transaction, he made application to the association for a loan of $1,700 in all respects as stated in the petition, which loan was granted on July 24, 1896, and that sum was paid to Cramer, on the terms and conditions aforesaid, and that to secure the payment of the loan he gave to the association his mortgage deed on the real estate described in the petition; and that the mortgage contained by reference thereto all the provisions and agreements in the application for stock and for the said loan. This mortgage was filed for record on the same day and recorded the succeeding day.

The court found the terms and conditions of the mortgage to be as above stated, but found that the premium mentioned in said application and mortgage was not fixed by any competitive bidding, but by the terms and provisions of the constitution and by-laws of said association, the said defendant and all other borrowers from said association of class B therein referred to were required to pay interest on their respective loans at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, payable in equal monthly instalments, together with a so-called premium at the uniform rate of 5 per cent per annum on said loan, in addition to said so-called interest. In addition to the findings, it was conceded and agreed in open court at the trial that the application and mortgage were signed by Cramer, and that book exhibit C is a true copy of the constitution and by-laws of the association, and was such when the loan was negotiated and made, and that before the loan was made Cramer had issued to him on his application 17 shares of stock class B in said association, and that before he received his loan he transferred said stock to the association.

It was further conceded that, if plaintiff's contention in this case is sustained, and its basis of computation is correct, the amount due it would be $1,480.89, but if the court should find the contract to be usurious, and determine that the rate of interest to be charged is 6 per cent, computed on the basis of partial payments, then the amount due is $840.03 to December 10, 1902; but, if the contract be usurious, and the rate of interest the plaintiff should recover should be 5 per cent, then, computed on the basis of partial payments to the same date, the amount would be $646.68. The court found the contract and mortgage to be usurious, and decided that the statute entitled "An Act to Provide for the Organization, Regulation, and Inspection of Building and Loan Associations," passed May 1, 1891 (88 Ohio Laws p. 469), in so far as it allows any such company to assess and collect from members and depositors such dues, fines, interest, and premium on loans made, or other assessments as may be provided in the constitution and by-laws," and that "such dues, fines, premiums, and other assessments shall not be deemed usury, although in excess of the legal rate of interest," is unconstitutional and void. The court also held that the plaintiff's claim should be computed on the basis of $1,700 as a loan at 6 per cent interest, to be computed on the rule of partial payments for each payment, by which rule there was then due the sum of $981.67, to draw interest from the first day of the term of court. Judgment was rendered for that amount, and foreclosure ordered. A motion for new trial was overruled, and the case taken on error to the circuit court, where the judgment was reversed, and that court rendered a judgment in favor of the association for $1,480.89, with 6 per cent interest thereon from June 2, 1903, and ordered foreclosure of the mortgage. Cramer prosecutes error to reverse the judgment of the circuit court.

Price, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The amount in controversy between the parties is $499.22, the difference between the judgment of the court of common pleas and that of the circuit court. This amount the plaintiff in error claims is all usury, and should not be charged against him. The Southern Ohio Loan & Trust Company is an Ohio corporation, organized under the provisions of §§ 3836-1 et seq., Bates's Anno. Stat. p. 2130. That section provides: "A corporation for the purpose of raising money to be loaned among its members shall be known in this act as a building and loan association. Associations organized under the laws of this state shall be known in this act as 'domestic' associations, and those organized under the laws of other states or territories, as 'foreign' associations. Associations may be organized and conducted under the general laws of Ohio relating to corporations, except as otherwise provided in this act." While this company did not adopt a name directly indicating that it became and is a building and loan association, it organized as such, and announced its purposes in the second article of the constitution as follows: "The Southern Ohio Loan & Trust Company is a corporation organized for the purpose of raising money to be loaned among its members to aid them in the purchase and building of homes, and to provide the advantages usually expected from savings banks and other similar institutions." This article embraces in terms the definition of a building and loan association found in the above section of the statute. The name of the corporation so organized is not material, if it has the purposes and characteristics named in the statute and in its own constitution. This requirement seems to have been fully met, for we find it further provided in the same article: "All stock is paid for in cash, or in monthly instalments, as provided for by the by-laws of this company. Whenever the amount of dues paid and dividends credited on any share shall equal the face value of said share, it shall be fully paid in and be considered to have fully matured, at which time it is subject to withdrawal." etc. Again, from same article: "Annually on the first business day of January, so much of the earnings as may be necessary shall be set aside to pay the current expenses of the company and the interest on deposits; so much as shall be decided by the board of directors shall be reserved for the payment of contingent losses, and the residue shall be transferred as a dividend and credited to the shares of stock in force in proportion to their average monthly balances. . . ." Article 10 of the by-laws provides that the funds of the company shall be loaned only to members on real estate security; and, further, that the borrower "shall in all cases receive the full amount applied for, for which he shall pay 5 per cent interest, and bid 5 per cent premium per annum. Interest and premium must be paid in monthly instalments, and accompany the dues to the home office." The same article provides that, if a member neglects to make his payments according to the terms of his mortgage and application, he shall be liable to an action at law for their recovery, besides the principal, all dues, interest, premiums, cost of insurance, taxes, fines due and owing the company (association). We have referred to so much of the constitution and by-laws of this association as seems necessary to show that its organization and operation are clearly within the scope of § 3836—1, supra. The clause in article 2 of the constitution of the corporation, "and to provide the advantages usually expected from savings banks and other similar institutions," is not involved in this case. It is not assumed by it that general banking powers will be exercised, and in the present case it is apparent that such powers were not exercised. Dearborn v. Northwestern Sav. Bank, 42 Ohio St. 617, 51 Am. Rep. 851. Therefore we find, as did the lower court, that the defendant in error, plaintiff in the foreclosure action, was and is a domestic building and loan association, organized and empowered under the laws of Ohio as described and defined by the act of the legislature above named.

The plaintiff in error desired to borrow

$1,700, and in order to obtain a loan of that sum subscribed for 17 shares of the stock in the association, and thereby became one of its members. He signed a written application for the loan to the full par value of the shares, and, according to the requirements of the association found in its constitution and by-laws, he executed and delivered to it a mortgage on real estate described in the petition, and as further security transferred back to the association the 17 shares of stock. The constitution and by-laws were made part of the covenants and stipulations of the application and mortgage. The condition of the mortgage now involved obligates Cramer to pay (1) the sum of $8.50 per month, being the monthly dues on the 17 shares of stock, to be credited as provided in the constitution and by-laws; (2) the interest due on $1,700. or money so advanced, payable monthly, as specified in the same instruments; (3) the premium bid on said $1,700, or money so advanced, as specified in said constitution and by-laws; (4) all fines, penalties, and other charges which said Cramer shall incur as a member of the association; (5) all rents, taxes, assessments, costs of insurance, and other charges upon said premises, in accordance with the constitution and by-laws. When we turn to the by-laws for the rates of interest and premium, we find the interest charged to be 5 per cent and the premium fixed at 5 per cent. The court below found, as we do, that the premium was not ascertained by competitive bidding, or, as sometimes called, at auction in open meeting of the members; and on that account it is claimed that the association determined an arbitrary or level premium, which renders the contract usurious when such premium and interest are added together. Here it becomes necessary to examine the legislation of this state upon the authority committed to such associations, and we find their first statutory authority in the act of February 21, 1867 (64 Ohio Laws, p. 18). It authorized any number of persons not less than five to associate themselves together and become a corporation "for the purpose of raising moneys to be loaned among its members for use in buying lots or houses, or in building or repairing houses, and such corporation shall be authorized and empowered to levy, assess, and collect from its members such sums of money by rates of stated dues, fines, interest on loans advanced, and premiums bid by members for the right of precedence in taking loans as the corporation by its by-laws shall adopt. . . . Provided, that the dues, fines, and premiums so paid, . . . although paid in addition to the legal rate of interest on loans taken by them, shall not be construed to make the loans so taken usurious." The act was amended in some respects May 5, 1868, and again May 9, 1868, but the feature of a competitive bidding was retained. Under these statutes we have the cases of State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Greenville Bldg. & Sav. Asso. 29 Ohio St. 92, State ex rel. Colburn v. Oberlin Bldg. & L. Asso. 35 Ohio St. 258, and Bates v. People's Sav. & L. Asso. 42 Ohio St. 655; and they decide that under the statutes then in force, in order to save the premium from being obnoxious to our laws against usury, it must have been paid for precedence in obtaining the loan, and at competitive bidding. Undergoing some changes subsequently, not important here, the statutes were recast in an act passed May 1, 1891 (88 Ohio Laws, p. 469), from which we have quoted in the earlier part of this opinion. Under the head of "Powers" (§ 3) it is now provided: "Such corporation shall have power, . . . to assess and collect from members and depositors such dues, fines, interest, and premium on loans made or other assessments, as may be provided for in the constitution and by-laws. Such dues, fines, premiums, or other assessments, shall not be deemed usury, although in excess of the legal rate of interest." Bates's Anno. Stat. § 3836-3, p. 2130. The statute now in force, and which was in operation when the mortgage in suit was executed, omits the former requirement, or, rather, condition, of competitive bidding as to the premium to be paid, and therefore, if the statute is valid, usury cannot be asserted as tainting the loan in question.

The legislature, we must assume, had a reasonable motive for this material change, for before that time this court, in the cases cited under the former law, held that, if the premium was not bid for precedence in obtaining the loan, it was usurious in case it and the interest exceeded the legal rate to be charged under the interest laws. We think a reason for the change in the statute may be readily found. Experience with competitive bidding did not tend to fairness and equality among the members. The amounts of premiums bidden at different times and by different borrowers were not uniform. At one time competition may be stronger than at another, thus increasing the sum to be paid. There was opportunity at least for fictitious competition to run the premium up. And, whatever the premium, high or low, the dividends were the same to all. The member who paid a high rate of premium received no greater dividend than the one who paid the lowest. There was no certain standard, and the rights of members thus varied with the seasons, or the financial stress in which the borrower might be found. The old law defeated the principle of mutuality, which is the basic principle of such associations. Now all borrowers are treated as upon a common level, and the premium is uniform, and all fare alike in that respect, and, of course, share alike in the dividends to be credited. Therefore the present law is not vicious, as declared by one of our circuit courts, but, on the contrary, it is fair, and is sanctioned by the rule of mutuality. We do not judge these associations by the operation and powers of banking institutions. A member of the former sustains a relation of mutuality to each and all of the other members. If he becomes a borrower, he is at the same time one of the lenders. In making a loan it is not contemplated that the principal debt will be repaid in bulk, but in instalments of dues, interest, dividends, and perhaps premiums. When these amount to the sum borrowed, the mortgage is canceled, the stock returned to the borrower, which he may hold free of liens, or he may withdraw from the association under its rules for that purpose. Therefore the relation of debtor and creditor, it may be said, does not strictly exist.

In Licking County Sav. Loan & Bldg. Asso. v. Bebout, 29 Ohio St. 252-254, Gilmore, J., says: "The object of these associations, and the powers with which they are clothed on becoming incorporated, are expressed in very general terms in the statute authorizing their incorporation. Each association, when incorporated, is left at liberty to adopt such a scheme or plan for working out and accomplishing its object as the members of the association may, by its by-laws, provide; and so long as these do not violate any of the provisions of the statute, nor transcend the powers granted, they will be binding and obligatory upon and between the members and the association." In Eversmann v. Schmitt, 53 Ohio St. 174, 29 L. R. A. 184, 53 Am. St. Rep. 632, 41 N. E. 139, this court stated in the syllabus: "(1) The members of a building association, whether borrowers or non-borrowers, have a mutual interest in its affairs; and, sharing alike in its earnings, must assist alike in bearing its losses. (2) A borrowing member is one who receives in advance the par value of his shares, and agrees in consideration of such advance to pay the weekly dues on the shares and the interest on the loan until the dues paid and the dividend declared and not paid are equal to the par value of his shares. He then ceases to be a member, and is entitled to a cancellation of the mortgage given to secure the obligations arising from the loan." In the opinion, on page 184 of 53 Ohio St., page 186, 29 L. R. A., page 635, 53 Am. St. Rep., and page 141 of 41 N. E., Minshall, J., uses this language: "Unlike other corporations for profit, a share in a building association has, at the inception, only a nominal value. Its value is expected to increase by the lapse of time and the success of the association. It is contrary to the purpose and genius of a building association that a share in it should be paid up at the time of the subscription. This is done by the payment of small dues, and the crediting, at stated times, of the earnings in the way of dividends. When the aggregate dues with the credited earnings equal . . . the par value of a share of stock, it is paid up, and the owner, for that share, ceases to be a stockholder." We deem these illustrations of the operation of such associations sufficient to show the subject of the legislation we are considering, and that bidding a premium for preference in obtaining a loan is not essential to avoid our statutes against usury. The law no longer requires it in order to suspend those statutes. Therefore the claim of plaintiff in error that he should pay no more than 6 per cent on his loan is not sustained.

But it is urged that, if our present statute authorizes an arbitrary rate of premium without competitive bidding, and the usury laws are suspended from operation on such associations, the statute is unconstitutional. This claim is urgently made, but in terms somewhat general and indefinite. It will now be seen that the foregoing discussion of the nature and characteristics of building and loan associations has an added value, and at the outset of what we shall say we suggest the difficulty of perceiving what the matter of bidding a premium for preference in obtaining a loan has to do with the constitutional question. Under the statutes in force prior to the present enactment, numerous cases came to this court involving a construction of the powers and operations of various building and loan associations. We have cited some of them. The constitutional validity of the former acts has never been seriously questioned in this court, and, while other questions as to the powers and rights of said corporations were thoroughly and ably argued by eminent counsel, it seems that it did not occur to any of them that the associations were proceeding under an invalid law. This suggestion is not conclusive of the question, but the incident is forcible at this day of the life of such institutions. And we are unable to see what the absence from the statute of the clause requiring competitive bidding of premiums can add to the constitutional argument against the existing law. Its validity or invalidity does not play or turn on the presence or absence of that clause. The arguments made here could have been aimed as well at all the former legislation on the same subject.

But wherein is the law unconstitutional? The counsel say the law violates § 26 of article 2, which requires that "all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation throughout the state." But counsel fail to enlighten us upon this proposition, and it is not even suggested where the point of conflict exists. It cannot be disputed that the statute is general in its terms, and that its nature and objects are general, providing as it does for the organization and operation of corporations to be known as building and loan associations; those organized under the laws of this state to be known as "domestic" associations, and those organized under the laws of another state or territory to be known as "foreign" associations. It is available in any county, city, or village of the state, and beyond doubt it has uniform operation throughout the state. As said in State v. Spellmire, 67 Ohio St. 86, 65 N. E. 622: "With us, 'uniform operation throughout the state' means universal operation as to territory. It takes in the whole state. And as to persons and things it means universal operation as to all persons and things in the same condition or category. When a law is available in every part of the state as to all persons and things in the same condition or category, it is of uniform operation throughout the state." This clear statement of the rule disposes of this branch of the contention, as no one will gainsay that the law in question is available in every part of the state.

However, it is more seriously and confidently asserted that the legislation confers special privileges on these associations which tend to the creation of a privileged class of corporations, and therefore the statute conflicts with § 2 of article 1 of our Constitution. It provides that "all political power is inherent in the people. Government is instituted for their equal protection and benefit, and they have the right to alter, reform, or abolish the same, whenever they may deem it necessary; and no special privileges or immunities shall ever be granted that may not be altered, revoked, or repealed by the general assembly." The seed of the evil said to be inhibited by a part of this section is supposed to consist of the following clause in § 3836-3, supra: "Such dues, fines, premiums, or other assessments shall not be deemed usury, although in excess of the legal rate of interest." This statute applies peculiarly, and perhaps alone, to building and loan associations, leaving other corporations and persons subject to the statutes against usury.

It is asserted that the legislation unlawfully discriminates in favor of these building and loan associations, and against all others, whereby all do not have the equal protection and benefit of our laws. This question is not raised by the state, but by a member of the association, whose relation thereto we have already described; and his right to do so in this collateral manner may well be doubted. He is a part of the association, and, equally with the other members, amenable to the constitution and by-laws adopted, all of which were incorporated in and became a part of his contract with the association. However, we are not averse to a brief consideration of the point raised. The organization of building and loan associations being authorized under a general law, we find the limitations upon their powers and the grant of their authority in few and simple rules. The major part of the government of their internal affairs is placed within the hands of the associations themselves, and the mutual rights of the borrowing and nonborrowing stockholders are to be worked out according to their own regulations; of course being supervised by limitations set by the statute. The law creating these associations can confer upon them such reasonable and ample powers for their successful operation as the general assembly may deem necessary, within the purposes and scope of their organization, and in doing this the legislature may classify the subjects upon which the powers are conferred, and yet keep within constitutional limits. As touching the precise question under consideration, we have no adjudication of this court; but similar provisions to ours are found in the Constitutions of nearly all of the states of the Union, and we avail ourselves of some of the decisions of other states where the present question was considered. In Iowa Sav. & L. Asso. v. Heidt, 107 Iowa, 297, 43 L. R. A. 689, 70 Am. St. Rep. 197, 77 N. W. 1050, it is held that "statutes exempting building and loan associations from the operation of the usury law are not unconstitutional." On page, 303, 107 Iowa, page 692, 43 L. R. A., page 202, 70 Am. St. Rep., page 1052 of 77 N. W. in the opinion of the court, by Waterman, J., it is said: "First, it is said that the building and loan law of the state is unconstitutional because it is class legislation. Some of the arguments advanced in support of this claim assail rather the policy of such statutes than the power to enact them. In theory these institutions are profit sharing. The amounts directly paid for the use of money go indirectly to the benefit of the stockholders through the increase in the value of their shares. Where the loans are confined to shareholders, we can see good reason for exempting such associations from the operation of the usury law. That the constitutional power exists to make the exemption we think is without serious doubt." In Zenith Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Heimbach, 77 Minn. 97, 79 N. W. 609-611, the supreme court of that state says: "It has been assumed by this court in several cases that the provisions of the statute . . . exempting building associations from the operation of our usury laws were constitutional, but the question was not directly raised or decided. In this case the defendant urges that such statutes are class legislation, and therefore unconstitutional. The operations of building and loan associations proper, when they adhere to the basic principles of their organization, differ so radically from ordinary loan transactions as to afford a proper basis for classification, and to justify the legislature in making a separate class of them; hence a statutory exemption of them from the operation of usury laws is constitutional. This proposition is sustained on principle and the great weight of authority, and we hold the statutes here in question constitutional." In November, 1899, the supreme court of Indiana, in the case of International Bldg. & L. Asso. No. 2 v. Wall, 153 Ind. 554, 55 N. E. 431, held that "the act of 1875 (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 3407), authorizing building associations, when loanable funds are on hand, to make loans to that 'member who shall take the same upon the terms most favorable to the company,' and declaring that premiums, fines, and interest on premiums should not be deemed usurious, does not contravene Const. art. 1. § 23, and art. 4, § 22, which prohibit the granting of special privileges and the passage of special laws relating to interest; since, under the essential nature of the contract, the member stands in the dual relationship of lender and borrower." The same court, in the month preceding, in Security Sav. & L. Asso. v. Elbert, 153 Ind. 198, 54 N. E. 753, made a similar holding, from which we need not quote. In Archer v. Baltimore Bldg. & L. Asso. 45 W. Va. 37, 30 S. E. 241, the supreme court of appeals of West Virginia held: "2. Building associations are authorized to adopt by-laws fixing a minimum premium at which to award loans to their members, such premiums to be deducted from the loans in advance or paid in periodical instalments. 3. Section 26, chap. 54, Code [1899], in so far as it exempts building associations from the operation of the general law in relation to usury, is not unconstitutional." The opinion of the court in that case is a valuable contribution to the law of such associations. We cite, as bearing upon both provisions of our Constitution said to have been violated in this case, Vermont Loan & T. Co. v. Whithed, 2 N. D. 83, 49 N. W. 318. The case is a thorough discussion of each of the grounds contended for by the plaintiff in error, and is in harmony with the other cases from which we have quoted. In People's Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Billing, 104 Mich. 186, 191, 62 N. W. 373, 374, the supreme court of Michigan says: "It is contended that the statute authorizing the formation of building and loan associations is class legislation and unconstitutional. This contention is not supported by the authorities. On the contrary, such legislation has been upheld in a number of the states, while we have found but a single authority sustaining the contention of defendants' counsel,—the case of Henderson Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Johnson, 88 Ky. 191, 3 L. R. A. 289, 10 S. W. 787. We think the reasoning of the authorities which sustain the constitutionality of such statutes is in accord with sound principle and the previous holdings of this court. As was said in Holmes v. Smythe, 100 Ill. 413: 'The statute under which the association was organized is a general law, applicable to all the citizens of the state who choose to bring themselves within the relations and circumstances provided for by it.'"

Each of the above cases cited others for its support, until the array of authority is almost unbroken, and truly formidable. Most of them are modern decisions, and made in the light of rapidly increasing financial business and needs of our people. We are fully satisfied that our statute which is assailed in this case contravenes no provision of our Constitution.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Muskingum County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in plaintiffs' favor in a proceeding to contest the will of Henry Irwin, deceased. Affirmed.

Statement by Price, J.:

One of the defendants in error, Metta Elma Jacques, commenced an action in the court of common pleas against the plaintiffs in error and others, contesting the will of Henry Irwin, who died on the 14th day of February, 1901. The instrument purporting to be the will bears date November 4, 1898, and it was presented for probate in the probate court of Muskingum county on the 23d day of February, 1901, and it was admitted to probate on the 9th day of March, 1901. Letters testamentary were issued thereon to Dr. Lewis H. Marshall, who thereupon qualified. After stating the relation which each of the parties to the suit sustained to the testator, and the provisions of the will, the petition alleges as the only ground of contest the following: "Plaintiff further says that the said paper writing or pretended will is not the valid last will and testament of said decedent, because the same is not executed and is not signed at the end thereof as required by the statute of Ohio." Those defendants who are now plaintiffs in error, except the executor, answered the petition, and averred that the said paper writing purporting to be the last will and testament of the said Henry Irwin is his last will and testament, and that is was duly executed and signed at the end thereof as required by the statute of Ohio; and they denied each and every averment in the amended petition that is inconsistent with the statements of the answer.

The issue being made up by these pleadings, the case came to trial by jury, and the defendant introduced and read to the jury the will of Henry Irwin, deceased, and the probate thereof, as shown by the records of the probate court, and then rested. The original will consisted of six pages of foolscap or legal-cap paper, the last page of which exhibits the ground of controversy. The printed record contains a facsimile of the page, except that a red line, which could not be photographed, ran from top to bottom of the page, passing between the word "estate" at the end of the marginal clause, and the word "attest" and parallel with the longer sides of the page.

The following is a facsimile of the will:

*My will is that my child or heir not take with this my last will and Testament- I have 62 demitchees cut-out and I have not-

The contestants introduced evidence tending to prove that after Dr. Marshall, the scrivener, had written the various provisions of the will and the attesting clause, he read the same over to the testator, who expressed his satisfaction with what had been written, but refused to sign it as his will until another provision was inserted to the effect that, if any child or heir should be dissatisfied with his will, he should be "cut out," and should have no part of his estate. To express his intention and desire in this respect, the clause on the left-hand margin of the last page was written by the scrivener, and when this was read to him he expressed his satisfaction, and then signed the body of the will under the attesting clause, and his signature was witnessed by two witnesses. Other material facts bearing on the subject appear in the opinion.

At the close of the testimony and arguments the court charged the jury as follows: "This is a proceeding known as a contest of a will. You will have the will with you in your retirement. Your verdict will be either that the paper purporting to be the last will and testament of Henry Irwin, deceased, is or that it is not the valid last will and testament of the said decedent. I give you this simple instruction to govern you in the consideration of this case. If you find from the evidence that the matter written upon the margin of the page upon which the testator's signature appears was written before the will was signed by him, and that the testator intended such written matter on the margin to be a part of his will, then I say to you such will was not signed at the end as required by statute, and your verdict should be for the plaintiff, and that the paper writing produced is not the last will and testament of Henry Irwin." This charge was excepted to by the defendants. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, finding that said paper produced is not the valid last will and testament of Henry Irwin, deceased. The court overruled a motion for new trial, and rendered judgment on the verdict. A bill of exceptions was taken, and error prosecuted in the circuit court, where the judgment was affirmed. Error is prosecuted in this court to reverse both judgments.

Messrs. F. H. Southard and Granger & Granger, for plaintiffs in error:

The will of Henry Irwin was signed at the end thereof.

The policy of the law to sustain wills generates a liberal construction of the statutes stating the formal requirements for a will, and frowns upon a strict and literal construction, which would have the tendency of overthrowing wills.

A substantial compliance with the formalities prescribed by the statute is sufficient.

In determining whether a will is signed at its end, each case as it arises presents its own controlling circumstances, and will be decided, keeping in mind the intention of the legislators in enacting the requirement: namely, Is it so signed as to adopt the whole instrument after it is finished, as to prevent interpolation, unauthorised addition, improper alteration, fraud? If it is so signed, it is signed at the end, within the legislative intent, although not literally and exactly at the end.

Price, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We are not required in this case to ascertain the intention of the testator in making the will before us, nor to construe its provisions, but to determine whether it was executed according to law. The undisputed testimony shows, and counsel for the parties agree, that it was the intention of Henry Irwin to make the marginal clause found on the sixth or last page a part of that instrument. As appears from the intended facsimile in our statement of the case, the body of the alleged will was written on the horizontal lines of the pages, but leaving, at least on the sixth or last page, a considerable blank space to the left of the ends of the lines. The signatures of the testator and the witnesses follow below the attestation clause, and are under the body of the instrument, and at its end, as if no marginal clause had been inserted. This marginal clause commences on the left edge of the page, running lengthwise therewith from near the bottom to near the top thereof. The lower end of the clause is 1 inch or more below and to the left of the names of the witnesses, and about 3 inches below and to the left of the signature of the testator. Between the lower end of the clause and the names of the witnesses there is a blank space of about 1 inch, and between it and the attestation clause the blank space is about 1½ inches in width. Between the subscribing and attestation clauses on the horizontal lines there is a blank space of four lines.

We think we have sufficiently described the location and relative situation of this clause, which constitutes the ground of the contest. Its history otherwise is very brief, and may be summed up in a few words. The will, as originally prepared by the scrivener, occupied, and yet occupies, six pages of foolscap or legal cap paper, on the last of which are the signatures of the testator and the witnesses. It was read over to the testator, and he expressed his satisfaction with its provisions so far as they had been written, but refused to sign until another provision should be inserted. He desired to prevent attack on his will and litigation that might follow at the instance of dissatisfied heirs, legatees, or devisees, and to this end requested that there be inserted a provision that would impose something of a penalty upon any person who would controvert the disposition he was making of the property. The marginal clause referred to was written in the space and in the manner just described, and it reads: "My will is that any child or heir not taken with this my last will and testament shall be disinherited, cut out, and shall have not one doll of my estate." With this in, the will was read to the testator, and he expressed his satisfaction, and signed it at the place before stated. The party or parties contesting the will alleged in the petition and contended at the trial that the will was void, because it was not signed at the end thereof.

On this subject our statute (Rev. Stat. § 5916) provides: "Every last will and testament (except nuncupative wills hereinafter provided for) shall be in writing, and may be hand written or typewritten, and such will shall be signed at the end thereof by the party making the same, or by some other person in his presence and by his express direction, and shall be attested," etc. We have seen that the testator intended the clause written on the margin to be a part of his will, and that he declined to sign until it or its equivalent was inserted somewhere in the instrument, but he did not direct where it should be inserted. If the language so written has no legal significance, and has no effect on the other provisions of the will, it might be treated as mere unimportant surplusage, as in Baker v. Baker, 51 Ohio St. 217, 37 N. E. 125. In that case the testator, after having signed the instrument disposing of his property and appointing his sister-in-law as the executrix, which was duly witnessed, wrote under the attestation clause the words, "My sister-in-law is not required to give bond when probated," and signed his name thereto, which was not attested. It was held that these words could not affect the construction of the will, were not dispositive in character, and that the will was signed at the end thereof. But if the clause is of a dispositive character, and may, in certain events, change the course of some or all of his property, its location in the instrument is of essential importance in deciding whether the will is signed at its end. Although the language of the marginal clause is crude, and is the expression of an illiterate man, yet its meaning is not doubtful when coupled with the directions of the testator which led to its insertion. According to the undisputed testimony, he was determined that his estate should be settled in peace, and according to his will, and that if any "child or heir" should not "take" with his will, he should be cut off without one dollar of his estate. Clearly, the clause has a dispositive character, and this seems to be admitted by counsel for plaintiff in error. In Bradford v. Bradford, 19 Ohio St. 546, 2 Am. Rep. 419, it is held that "a condition in a will whereby the testator excludes any one of his heirs who 'goes to law to break his will' from any part or share of his estate is valid and binding; and effect will be given to it as well in respect to bequests of personality as to devises of real estate." However, they urge that, while this is true, the beneficiaries under the will have all united to uphold it, and that this appears by their joint answer in this case, wherein they allege that the paper produced as the last will and testament of Henry Irwin is his valid last will and testament. Therefore, it is argued, the marginal clause can never have any chance for operation, and is no longer of consequence, in the settlement of the estate. But it must be borne in mind that the will was executed without any knowledge of what the "child or heir" might subsequently decide to do, and hence the intense desire to provide for the contingency. The will became operative when admitted to probate. The testator died, leaving the instrument just as he had made it, containing within its scope this dispositive clause, and no pleading could be filed in a case contesting the will that would change its dispositive character. It must be judged as it stood when inserted in the will, and as it was probated with the balance of the instrument.

We therefore recur to the question, Was the will signed at its end, as required by statute? The trial court submitted the question to the jury in a very concise instruction, which covered the whole law of the case. It is this: "If you find from the evidence that the matter written upon the margin of the page upon which the testator's signature appears was written before the will was signed by him, and that the testator intended such written matter on the margin to be a part of his will, then I say to you such will was not signed at the end, as required by statute, and your verdict should be for the plaintiff, and that the paper writing produced is not the last will and testament of Henry Irwin." This brief charge implied that the matter written in the margin is of a dispositive character, which was the decision of a question of law for the consideration of the court. The only questions of fact for the determination of the jury were: (1) Was the matter upon the margin written there before the testator signed the will? (2) Did he intend such written matter to be part of his will? If "Yes" is answered to both inquiries, then the statute is interposed by the court, and the jury was told that the will was not signed at its end. This charge is severely criticized by counsel as a usurpation of the province of the jury, whereby the court, and not the jury, decided the contest. We cannot concur in this criticism. It is true that, after a will has been admitted to probate, and is contested under the statute in the court of common pleas, the will and the record of its probate make a prima facie case for the contestees, and the burden is upon the contestants to overthrow the will, and that the ground of contest, as a general rule, is to be determined by the jury. But the court does not lose its jurisdiction to decide all questions of law that may arise on the trial. The questions of fact were left to the jury, and the court properly charged as to the legal effect of their findings. There could be no mistake as to the findings of fact, for it was clear and beyond dispute that the marginal matter was written before the testator signed the instrument, and that he not only intended, but demanded, that it be written somewhere in his will. The will was with the jury, and hence the charge of the court only applied the law to the facts, and this was the duty of the court. In Wagner v. Ziegler, 44 Ohio St. 59, 4 N. E. 705, this court held that, "in the trial of the contest of a will, where the testimony introduced does not tend to prove the issue on the part of the plaintiffs, showing incapacity of the decedent to make a will at the time the will was made, it is not error for the court, at the conclusion of the plaintiffs' testimony, to direct the jury to find a verdict sustaining the will." That holding simply means that the powers, duties, and functions of the court in the trial of will contests are practically the same as in other jury trials of civil cases.

Taking the instrument, the original last page containing the marginal matter as there found, and the undisputed evidence as to its insertion before the signing by the testator and the witnesses, and that the testator intended it to be a part of the will, did the trial court correctly apply the law? We think it did. The statute (§ 5916) prescribes the formalities to be observed in the execution of a will, and we think the intention of the legislature, as thus expressed, is very plain. The history of this and similar legislation evinces a purpose that such dispositions of property, real or personal, should be so executed as to prevent, as far as practicable, unauthorized and fraudulent additions and interlineations before or after the execution of the will. There should be some continuity in the expression of the testator's wishes, and, if a part of the will is aside from the continuity of the language, such as the marginal matter in this case, there should be some word or character used as a reference to the place it should occupy in relation to the other provisions, so that the end of the will may be ascertained. The authorities sustain this degree of liberality towards the work of incompetent persons who sometimes are called upon to draft wills, but beyond this the rule of strict observance of the statute is seldom, if ever, relaxed. The lawmaking body (our legislature) has the power to set the guards against fraudulent dealings with such solemn instruments, and it has done so, and we are not at liberty to disregard them.

The will before us has no reference by word or character to the marginal clause. There is nothing to show in what connection, if any, it should be read in relation to the other items or provisions. It might be taken as a stray but for the parol testimony adduced at the trial to the effect that it was written before the testator signed the will, and that he intended it to form a part of it. Evidently it was the last provision written, and was so written immediately before the testator and witnesses signed their names. The witnesses so testify, and the jury so found. Is the marginal clause the end of the will? If so, the testator did not sign it at the end thereof. There were blank marginal spaces on each of the six pages constituting the whole instrument. On the last or sixth page a space of four lines was left for testator's signature just preceding the attestation clause. There is no reference by word or character in that space to indicate that the marginal matter belongs there; nor is there any mark or reference in the entire instrument to indicate where it belongs. Hence, beginning at the first page, and reading the items and provisions in their consecutive order, down to the signature, we see nothing else until we have concluded, and then see off to the left on the margin the matter quoted, standing alone and unidentified. Yet the testimony and agreement are that the testator intended this matter to be a part of his will. As said in Baker's Appeal, 107 Pa. 381-392, 52 Am. Rep. 478: "Where, however the continuity of a writing otherwise complete it attempted to be broken by the insertion into it of a clause or paragraph written upon the same or a different page or sheet, the clause to be inserted must be plainly referred to, and be susceptible also of certain identification. The reference must, as we have already shown, be complete in the body of the will. The testator's intention cannot otherwise appear." An inspection of the will in contest here and a consideration of the uncontroverted facts lead us to the conclusion that the charge of the trial court is sound, and that the will was not signed at its end.

Bearing upon the construction of our statute and similar statutes of other states may be cited Glancy v. Glancy, 17 Ohio St. 135; Keyl v. Feuchter, 56 Ohio St. 424, 47 N. E. 140; Sisters of Charity v. Kelly, 67 N. Y. 409; Re O'Neil, 91 N. Y. 516; Re Conway, 124 N. Y. 455, 11 L. R. A. 796, 26 N. E. 1028; Wineland's Appeal, 118 Pa. 37, 4 Am. The doctrine of these cases seems to be that, as to the manner of the execution of a will, the courts look to the intention of the legislature, and not the intention of the testator. The intention of the latter is sought in the interpretation of wills, but the purpose of the legislation must be looked to as to the formalities prescribed for their execution. The application of these rules may in some cases work hardship, and thwart an intended disposition of property; but the safeguards cannot be frittered away because of the unfortunate work of an incompetent who has been given the grave responsibility of writing a will. The protection of wills from fraudulent and unauthorized changes, additions, and interlineations seems to be the paramount object of the statute, and its enforcement will no doubt work the greater good.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

The relator, Jean D. McKell, was appointed administratrix of her late husband's estate, and she was ordered to give bond in the sum of $200,000. The relator immediately tendered a bond in the required amount, but the probate judge refused to accept it, solely on the ground that it was signed by personal sureties, and not by a surety company, as required by the act of the general assembly entitled "An Act to Amend § 3641c of the Revised Statutes of Ohio, Relating to the Giving of Surety Bonds," passed April 20, 1904 (97 Ohio Laws, 182). The probate judge was fully satisfied that the bond was sufficient in every other respect. The relator, therefore, prays for writ of mandamus commanding the respondent, the probate judge, to approve and accept the bond so tendered. The respondent answers that he did not accept and approve said bond because the said statute provides that any administrator's bond in excess of $2,000 must be executed and guaranteed by a surety company or companies authorized by the laws of Ohio to guarantee the fidelity of persons holding places of public or private trust, unless the person required to give such bond shall make affidavit that he has applied to such surety company or companies for such bond and has been refused or rejected; that the bond offered by relator being in excess of $2,000 and not being executed and guaranteed by such surety company or companies, but by personal sureties, and no affidavit, as provided by law, having been filed, he was prohibited by the aforesaid statute from accepting or approving said bond. To this answer the relator has filed a demurrer. It is insisted on behalf of the relator in support of the demurrer that this statute is unconstitutional.

The provisions of the act are so interdependent and interwoven that the whole act must stand or fall together. It provides that the execution of all bonds for the faithful performance of official or fiduciary duties, or the faithful keeping, applying, or accounting for funds or property, or for one or more of such purposes, with certain exceptions, is thereby required to be by a surety company or companies. We are therefore not able clearly to perceive that the general assembly intended in any event to require bonds to be executed by a surety company or companies in any one of the classes mentioned, to the exclusion of another. This being so, if the statute is void as to administrators or other fiduciaries, it is void as to public officers, and, if void as to public officers, it is void as to fiduciaries, and the contention here made as to the bond of an administratrix involves as well the question as to the validity of the bonds of public officers.

ble rights of man which is guaranteed to every citizen by the Bill of Rights (Const. art. 1, § 1), subject only to such restrictions as clearly appear to be for the general welfare. The mere fact that the general assembly has enacted a law which narrows the liberty of contract as to the whole people, or as to a class of citizens, is not decisive. If it were so, the constitutional guaranty might be made a dead letter by bills passed through the procurement of interested parties, or in response to the demands of extremists in times of popular excitement. It is the province of the courts to determine whether a given statute infringes the Constitution, which is the supreme law; and therefore it is within the province of the courts to decide whether the common welfare demands a restriction of the right of individuals to contract freely for their own benefit or convenience. It is the undoubted right of the general assembly to require bonds to be given "for the faithful performance of official or fiduciary duties, or the faithful keeping, applying, or accounting for funds or property, or for one or more such purposes," and to make reasonable requirements as to execution, approval, and security to effectuate fully the purposes thereof. But, unless the public welfare should justify and require it, the power of the general assembly is so limited by the Constitution (art. 1, § 1) that it cannot deny or restrict the liberty of the officer or fiduciary to obtain or contract for a bond on terms satisfactory to himself. Before the enactment of this statute an officer was at liberty to present a bond signed by personal sureties or by a surety company or companies, as his own interest or convenience might suggest. The right of choice between the classes of sureties is now denied him. It is now made compulsory upon him to give bond signed by surety companies, and personal security is in effect abolished. It is very plain that the security companies may be greatly benefited by this legislation, but an adequate corresponding benefit or protection to the general public, such as would justify such a radical and drastic limitation upon individual rights, is not apparent. The amount of loss to the state, county, township, or municipality on official bonds, or to the beneficiaries under bonds of executors, administrators, guardians, trustees, or other fiduciaries, comparatively speaking, is trifling. Indeed, it is possible that the loss is no greater than would result when the bonds shall be signed exclusively by incorporated companies, which sometimes become insolvent as individuals do. It is true that the loss, if any default occurs, falls on the sureties, and that there have been special acts of the general assembly for the relief of sureties in cases in which it was claimed that the principal was not in fault. Some of these acts are meritorious, many of them improvident, and most of them unconstitutional. It argues nothing in favor of the legislation which is assailed here that sureties sometimes seek to escape from the consequences of their contract of suretyship. The fact remains that those whose interests are protected by personal bond rarely lose. We have not been advised of any necessity for, or general demand for, the abolition of personal security and the substitution thereof of corporate security, and the reasons which we have given persuade us that the public welfare does not require it.

But further, not only is the person who gives a bond deprived of the right to obtain it of whomsoever and however he pleases, subject only to the requirement that it really protects and secures the obligee, but the obligee is compelled to pay a security company for protection. The burden is not put on the officer or fiduciary to give protection, but on the public or estate to obtain protection. The requirement of the statute is that an executor, administrator, guardian, trustee, or other fiduciary shall give a security company as bondsman, and that the estate shall pay for it, which is a taking of private property for private uses without compensation; and that a public officer shall give bond with a surety company as surety, the premium to be paid out of the public funds. The effect of the latter provision is to require the state, county, township, or municipality to pay to the enrichment of security companies each year vastly more than it would lose by defaulting public officials; and it thus becomes evident that it would be more economical for the public to become its own insurer of the good faith of its officials, which would result, perhaps, in no official bond in any case. It does not seem to us, therefore, that any part of this statute was promoted by considerations of public necessity or public welfare, and thence it follows that it is an unconstitutional restriction upon the liberty to contract which is guaranteed by article 1, § 1, of the Constitution of this state.

It is contended on the part of the respondent that no citizen has an inalienable right to act as a legal representative or public officer; that the general assembly has power to provide for the descent and distribution of estates, and for the appointment and qualifications of executors and administrators, including the giving of bonds; that the general assembly has power to prescribe the manner of election to a public office, and the qualifications therefor; and that it logically follows from these premises that the general assembly has authority to determine the kind and sufficiency of the security to be given. The general soundness of this argument is not to be questioned; but it is pressing the conclusion too far to maintain that the legislature may go beyond the purpose of the security to be given, and may require things to be done which do not increase the protection of the obligee, which abridge individual rights without contributing to the general welfare, and which enrich a designated class of sureties to the exclusion of all others. Such a conclusion would lead not only to violation of article 1, § 1, of our Constitution, as already shown, but of article 1, § 2, also, which declares that "government is instituted for the equal protection and benefit" of the people. This basic principle of the Constitution is also violated when executors, administrators, guardians, trustees, or other fiduciaries whose bonds are fixed at an amount not in excess of $2,000 are excepted from the operation of the act. No good reason for this discrimination is apparent. If personal bonds are a public evil they should be abolished altogether. If bonds signed by surety companies are the only ones fit for the security of estates, all estates should be permitted to enjoy equally both the protection and the benefit. If any discrimination were necessary, it would seem to be the better way to allow all estates, large or small, to procure personal bonds or security-company bonds as they might be able or might prefer, instead of compelling the larger estates to pay tribute to the surety companies, while the smaller estates, presumably less desirable risks to the surety companies, are still permitted to give either personal bonds or bonds of security companies,—if the latter do not reject their applications, as the statute provides that they may do.

We do not regard any of the cases cited for the respondent as decisive of the question now before us. The issue raised here is whether the general assembly may make security by security companies exclusive and compulsory. It is not whether corporations may be authorized to secure bonds, nor whether the person giving bond may at his option give a bond signed either by personal securities or by security companies.

Our conclusion is that the statute is unconstitutional, and it is accordingly ordered and adjudged that the demurrer to the answer be sustained and a peremptory writ of mandamus allowed.

PETITIONS for writs of certiorari to review judgments of the Circuit Court for Wayne County denying writs of mandamus to compel the board of assessors of the city of Detroit to strike an assessment upon plaintiffs' property from the rolls. Affirmed. The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Graves & Hatch and Angell, Boynton, McMillan, & Bodman for plaintiffs in certiorari.

Mr. Timothy E. Tarsney for defendant in certiorari.

Carpenter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Writs of certiorari bring before us for review three mandamus proceedings determined in the circuit court for the county of Wayne. Each of the above-named relators is a corporation engaged in transporting goods by water, and each asks for a mandamus (which the lower court refused to grant) compelling respondent to strike from the assessment rolls an assessment on ac-cases decided in the United States concerning the legal places of taxation of the personal property of corporations in the states of their origin. It does not deal in general with any questions concerning the taxability of foreign corporations on account of personal property which they own and use outside of their own states, except to present some cases illustrative of the main theme, or those where peculiar circumstances have made a particular corporation, for all practical purposes, a domestic one in a state in which it did not originate.

Neither does this note include cases relating to inheritance or succession taxes involving corporate, intangible property interests; and it takes no account of the situs of shares of stock in foreign corporations at the domicile of the stockholder, whether that stockholder be a natural person or a domestic corporation.

The purpose of the note is to present the cases pertinent to the maxim, Mobilia personam sequuntur, in its application to taxing a corporation in its home jurisdiction and within the limits of the United States.

None of the ground gone over in previous notes in this series respecting the taxation of American corporations is again occupied. For this reason, the reader is referred to the note to Sandford v. Poe, 60 L. R. A. 641, on Corporate taxation and the commerce clause, where the subject of the state power to tax the instruments of commerce and the validity of taxes thereon were treated at length; also to the note on Constitutional equality in the United States in relation to corporate taxation, to Bacon v. State Tax Comrs. 60 L. R. A. 321; also to that part of the note on Taxation of corporate franchises in the United States, to Louisville Tobacco Warehouse Co. v. Kentucky, 57 L. R. A. 33, div. Warren*, 64 L. R. The questions relating to the taxation of the poles and wires of telegraph, telephone, light, heat, and power companies, street railways, gas and water mains, service pipes, and hydrants are considered to lie outside of the point under annotation, and need not be sought here.

For a case holding the mains, pipes, and hydrants of a water company assessable for taxes as part of the real estate and a note of the pertinent decisions, consult Oskaloosa Water Co. v. Board of Equalization, 15 L. R. A. 296. Another case in point in that behalf is Shelbyville Water Co. v. Illinois, 16 L. R. A. 505.

For a note upon the residence of corporations for the purposes of jurisdiction in the Federal courts, the reader is referred to Stephens v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 14 L. R. A. 184.

II. Essentials of jurisdiction.

It is unnecessary to cite more than a few especially apt cases to the point that either the corporation itself, or the property of it taxed, or both, to warrant a state in levying a tax, must be under the dominion of the assessing government.

The authority of a legislature to impose taxes extends over all persons and property within the sphere of its territorial jurisdiction; but where there is jurisdiction neither as to persons nor property the imposition of a tax will be ultra vires and void. St. Louis v. Wiggins Ferry Co. 11 Wall. 425, 20 L. ed. 192.

Unless either the property or its owner is within a state, that state has no jurisdiction to tax either the one or the other. Dallinger v. Rapello, 14 Fed. 32; Yost v. Lake Erie Transp. Co. 50 C. C. 511, 112 Fed. 746.

Whether or not choses in action may, under certain circumstances, be subjected to taxation in a state where their owner has no domicile, as several cases decide, they cannot be so taxed unless they have acquired what may be aptly called a business situs at the place of taxation. Herron v. Keeran, 59 Ind. 476, 26 Am. Rep. 87.

We readily concede, said the Tennessee supreme court upon a recent occasion, when considering the situs of a corporation, that under the Codes of all civilized nations jurisdiction ends where neither the person nor property count of certain steamboats owned by it. Said steamboats during the season are engaged in navigating the Great Lakes, and are seldom in the city of Detroit. In the articles of incorporation of the first two relators the township of Hamtramack, Wayne county, is named as the location of their general offices for business. In the articles of incorporation of the last-named relator, viz., the Wolverine Steamship Company, the village of Utica, Macomb county, is named as the location of its general office for business. At the place named as the location of their offices relators never had any regular business office. All they did there was to use the office or house of another for their annual stockholders' meeting, and in case of the Teagan Transportation Company also for the first meeting of the directors elected at said stockholders' meeting. Substantially all the other business of said Teagan Transportation Company which was not done on its boats was done in the city of Detroit. The management of the ordinary business of the last two named relators was carried on by their agent at Cleveland. Their funds, however, except those required "to pay the ordinary running expenses of the boats and the officers and crew," were received and disbursed by their treasurer at Detroit; and it may be inferred that this official at Detroit decided any business matters "outside the ordinary course" not necessary—that is, as we infer, which he may decide to be not of the defendant is within the territorial jurisdiction of the court. Young v. South Tredegar Iron Co. 85 Tenn. 189, 2 S. W. 202.

III. Localization of corporations.

The popular sense of the term "inhabitant" is the same as resident, or one who lives in a place. An inhabitant necessarily implies an habitation. It requires no reflection to determine that in this sense a corporation resides nowhere. Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Hartford, 3 Conn. 15.

A corporation as a mere ideal existence subsisting only in contemplation of law, an invisible being, can have no locality, occupy no space, and hence can have no dwelling place, unless the legislature explicitly or impliedly establishes one for it in a particular place. Wood v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 13 Conn. 202, 38 Am. Dec. 395.

The term "inhabitant" includes a corporation occupying an office or building in a town, ward, or village, and there conducting the business for which it was incorporated. Especially is this so with reference to the burdens of taxation for public purposes. Ontario Bank v. Bunnell, 10 Wend. 186.

A corporation is an artificial being, and has no dwelling either in its office, its warehouse, its depots, or its ships. Its domicile is in the legal jurisdiction of its origin irrespective of the residence of its officers or the place where its business is transacted. It retains that domicile until it ceases to exist. Merrick v. Van Santvoord, 34 N. Y. 208.

A corporation can have no legal existence in any state except by the law of that state. The legal entity or person which exists by force of law when a corporation is created can have no existence beyond the limits of the state which brought it to life and endowed it with its faculties and powers. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Wheeler, 1 Black, 286, 17 L. ed. 130.

In the jurisprudence of the United States a corporation is regarded as a citizen of the state which created it. It has no faculty to emigrate. It can exercise its franchise extraterritorially only so far as may be permitted by the policy or comity of other sovereignties. St. Louis v. Wiggins Ferry Co. 11 Wall. 425, 20 L. ed. 192.

For the purposes of jurisdiction of the Federal courts corporations are conclusively presumed to be residents of the states in which they were created, and of every district in the 69 L. R. A.

state of their domicile wherein they own property and exercise their functions, regardless of the location of their principal offices. East Tennessee V. & G. R. Co. v. Atlanta & F. R. Co. 15 L. R. A. 109, 49 Fed. 608; Locomotive Engine Safety Truck Co. v. Erie R. Co. 10 Blatch. 307, Fed. Cas. No. 8, 453.

When a foreign railroad is authorized to extend and operate its line in another state by a statute thereof, and does so in conformity therewith, it becomes to all intents and purposes, and subject to the same taxation as if, a corporation originating in such state. Com. v. Cleveland, P. & A. R. Co. 29 Pa. 370.

When the question is one of taxation it is conceded that railway corporations are persons within the meaning of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States in respect of due process of law and the equal protection of the laws. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 183 Ind. 513, 18 L. R. A. 729, 33 N. E. 421.

And they are also conceded to be persons within the meaning of a state constitutional provision giving every man a remedy by due course of law for injury to person, property, or fame. Ibid.

The decisions that corporations are persons, and are deemed to have a local habitation, residence, or domicile for the purposes of taxation, are harmonious. It is unnecessary to cite them upon this point here; they were exhibited in the writer's note on Constitutional equality in the United States in relation to corporate taxation, div. VII., p. 330, appended to the case of Bacon v. State Tax Comrs. 60 L. R. A. 321.

IV. Principal office as domicile.

a. In general.

In the absence of a statute, the rule is that personality is to be taxed where the owner resides. Walton County v. Morgan County, 120 Ga. 548, 48 S. E. 243.

Personal property, prima facie, is returnable for taxation where the owner resides. Morgan County v. Walton County, 121 Ga. 659, 40 S. E. 776.

It is the rule, subject to some qualifications, that personal property, with respect of its taxability, follows the residence of the owner. Sangamon & M. R. Co. v. Morgan County, 14 28 necessary—to submit to the board of directors.

The question of whether relators' property is taxable in the city of Detroit depends upon the constitutional validity and construction of § 3834, Comp. Laws 1897. That section reads: "All corporate property, except where some other provision is made by law, shall be assessed to the corporation as to a natural person, in the name of the corporation. The place where its office is located in its articles of incorporation shall be deemed its residence: Provided, its business is actually transacted at such office; but if it shall establish its principal office in any other place than the place named in its articles of incorporation, then the place where it transacts its prinicipal business shall be deemed its residence for all the purposes of this act. If there be no principal office in this state, then at the place in this state where such corporation or agent transacts business: Provided further, that all the personal property of all corporations heretofore or hereafter organized under the laws of this state for the purpose of engaging in maritime commerce or navigation shall be assessed only in the city, village, or township which is stated in their original articles of association or in any amendment thereof heretofore or hereafter made to be the location of their general office for business." This section was § 11 of the general tax law passed in 1893. See act No. 206, p. 358, Acts 1893. As originally enacted, the section contained

Ill. 184, 56 Am. Dec. 497; Kennedy v. St. Louis, V. & T. H. R. Co. 62 Ill. 395.

It is the general rule of law that the domicile of the owner is the place where, by a legal fiction, his personal property is regarded as having its situs, and where it is to be taxed. Herron v. Keeran, 59 Ind. 472, 28 Am. Rep. 87.

The place where the business of a merchant is carried on is where he keeps for sale the merchandise in which he deals, not where he purchases or temporarily stores it; and that is its situs for taxation under a statute requiring the personal property pertaining to the business of a merchant to be listed for taxation in the town or district where his business is carried on. Minneapolis & N. Elevator Co. v. Clay County, 60 Minn. 522, 63 N. W. 101.

A debt has its situs at the residence of the creditor, and constitutes a portion of his estate there; consequently, for the purposes of taxation both the creditor and the debt are within the jurisdiction of the state which contains that residence. Kirtland v. Hotchkiss, 100 U. S. 497, 25 L. ed. 562.

The residence of a corporation is for most legal purposes where its chief office or place of business is, and, except where it is by law otherwise provided, its personal taxes should be paid in that jurisdiction. Frankfort v. Stone, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 502, 58 S. W. 373.

A corporation is taxable at its principal place of business under a statute requiring the owner of personal property to be assessed in the town he inhabits. Portland v. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. 79 Me. 231, 9 Atl. 613.

The rule is that personal property, except as otherwise required, shall be listed and assessed for taxation in the county, town, or district where the owner resides, which in the case of a domestic corporation is the place where its principal office or place of business is located. Minneapolis & N. Elevator Co. v. Clay County, 60 Minn. 522, 63 N. W. 101.

So far as concerns the taxation of personal property incapable of an actual situs separate from the person or domicile of its owner, a corporation must be considered to reside where its principal office and works are located and its business is transacted. Pacific R. Co. v. Cass County, 53 Mo. 17.

The proposition is undoubtedly true that where a corporation has its residence there its personal property is liable to assessment and taxation, if the law has prescribed no different rule or regulation upon the subject. State ex rel. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. v. Severance, 55 Mo. 378.

As a general rule a private corporation will be held to reside in the town where its principal office is established. State, Warren Mfg. Co., Prosecutors, v. Warford, 37 N. J. L. 397.

A corporation must be deemed to have a residence at the place where its place of business is. Conroe v. National Protection Ins. Co. 10 How. Pr. 403.

The capital or personal property of a domestic corporation in New York is assessable in the ward where the principal financial business of the company is transacted, or, if there is no such office, then in the town or ward where are carried on the corporate operations. People ex rel. Oswego Canal Co. v. Oswego, & Thorp. & C. 678.

A corporation is embraced by a statute requiring local assessors to set down in the assessment roll all taxable personal property of each person in the taxing district above his debts. People ex rel. Cornell S. B. Co. v. Dederick, 161 N. Y. 195, 55 N. E. 927.

A domestic corporation is taxable upon its personal property in the city where it has its principal office, under a statute declaring all property in the state and all personal property belonging to the inhabitants thereof liable to taxation. Tripp v. Merchants' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 12 R. I. 435.

The personal property belonging to a corporation, and not composing a part of its capital stock which is otherwise provided for, is liable to be taxed where the corporation has its place of business, under a revenue law by which all personal property, except in certain enumerated and noninclusive cases, must be assessed to the owner in the town he inhabits. Augusta Bank v. Augusta, 36 Me. 255; Portland, S. & P. R. Co. v. Saco, 60 Me. 196.

A corporation is an inhabitant only at its domicile in its own state. A statute directing all personal property in or out of the state to be assessed to the owner in the city or town he inhabits does not warrant the assessment of a foreign insurance company with a local office. Boston Invest. Co. v. Boston, 158 Mass. 461, 33 N. E. 580.

Taxes which are by law collectible only from residents of the districts in which they are assessed are void when levied upon a corporation whose principal place of business is out-no special provision for the taxation of property of corporations engaged in navigation. The proviso relating to the taxation of such property (the last proviso above quoted) was put in the section by amendment in 1895. See act No. 229, p. 520, of the Public Acts of 1895. It is obvious that, if this proviso is constitutional, relators' property was not taxable in Detroit, but was taxable at the place named for the location of its general office for business. The contention of respondent's counsel that this property is taxable in Detroit compels them to affirm these two propositions: (1) That the proviso is unconstitutional; (2) that the statute, with the proviso eliminated, properly construed, makes their property taxable in the city of Detroit.

side of such district. Green Mountain Stock Ranching Co. v. Savage, 15 Mont. 189, 38 Pac. 940.

When a statute requires the personal estate of corporations to be assessed in the townships or wards where their principal offices are, a town wherein in the past the principal office of a railroad company was, is indisputably the proper town to assess it for personal taxes, after its secretary's office is set up in another part of such town, and therein are kept the company's safe and books, and there its annual elections are held,—especially when there is no proof that the company has any other office. State, Warren R. Co. Prosecutor, v. Person, 32 N. J. L. 134.

When a statute requires all property to be assessed in the township in which the owner, if a natural person, resides, and, if a corporation, has its principal office, an assessment upon a corporation in another township because part of its property is there located is void. State, Warren Mfg. Co., Prosecutors, v. Warford, 37 N. J. L. 397; State, Warren Mfg. Co., Prosecutors, v. Dalrymple, 56 N. J. L. 449, 28 Atl. 671.

But under a law enacting that taxes on visible personal estate shall be assessed in the township, ward, or taxing district where the property is found, the location of the corporate office is not material. State, Warren Mfg. Co., Prosecutors, v. Dalrymple, 56 N. J. L. 449, 28 Atl. 673.

In the state of New York domestic corporations are taxable (except as to real estate) only in the town or ward where their principal office or place of transacting their financial concerns, when they have such an office or place, is located; consequently, when a statute of said state provides for taxing foreign corporations in the same manner as if they were domestic ones upon their investments in business, they can only be taxed in those towns or wards where they have established their principal offices or places for transacting their financial concerns; therefore, a tax upon the chattels, stock, and machinery of a foreign corporation assessed where these are situated in the hands of an agent, when the principal office and place of business of the company is in another and different town or ward, is void. People ex rel. Ray State Shoe & Leather Co. v. McLean, 80 N. Y. 254.

We will consider each of these questions, but, as we should not determine a statute to be unconstitutional until it is shown that such determination is necessary to a disposition of the case we will consider them in inverse order.

2. If we eliminate the proviso, the constitutionality of which is in question, the statute made the property taxable "where its office is located in its articles of incorporation: . . . Provided, its business is actually transacted at such office; but if it shall establish its principal office "in any other place than the place named in its articles of incorporation, then the place where it transacts its principal business shall be deemed its residence for all the purposes of this act. If there be no principal office in an inhabitant of the city, town, or ward wherein is located its office of discount and deposit, and there it is taxable regardless of the residences of the associates. Miner v. Fredonia, 27 N. Y. 155.

The principal office or place of business of a corporation for the purpose of taxation is where its executive officers actually transact its business, and not the location stated in its articles of incorporation, when the law only requires such articles to contain its name and location, and not its principal office or place of business. And this is so notwithstanding the stockholders and directors held their annual elections at the place named in the articles of incorporation, and such place was therein called its principal office. Milwaukee S. S. Co. v. Milwaukee, 83 Wis. 590, 18 L. R. A. 353, 53 N. W. 839.

The situs of intangible property, it must be admitted, is, ordinarily, at the local residence of the corporation within the state where it was incorporated. Hubbard v. Brush, 61 Ohio St. 252, 55 N. E. 829, Scottish Union & N. Ins. Co. v. Bowland, 196 U. S. 611, 49 L. ed. 619, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 345.

The situs of a corporation determines the situs of its share stock. Young v. South Tredegar Iron Co. 85 Tenn. 189, 2 S. W. 202.

Intangible corporate property is taxable at the corporate domicile when no statute fixes a different situs, notwithstanding the corporate owner carries on corporate business in several places. Grundy County v. Tennessee Coal, Iron & R. Co. 94 Tenn. 295, 29 S. W. 116.

A domestic corporation engaged in mining, refining, and marketing its output in distant states, and having in such states deposits in bank, and debts due it for sales made therein and upon bonds representing investments therein made, is none the less liable to taxation upon its credits, bills and accounts receivable, as a part of its personal estate in the state of its origin, since, for the purpose of taxation, these have their situs at the home office. People ex rel. United Verde Copper Co. v. Feitner, 54 App. Div. 217, 66 N. Y. Supp. 769, Affirmed on opinion below in 165 N. Y. 645, 59 N. E. 1120.

The fact that a corporation created by one state to operate a ferry between it and another state maintains in the latter an office in a city thereof, where its president and other principal officers reside, and where its corporate seal and books are kept and the ordinary business meetings of its directors are held, and where this state, then at the place in this state where such corporation or agent transacts business." The court below, by a majority opinion, denied the mandamus. It must be assumed that the court found as a fact that relators' business was not actually transacted at the office named in their articles of incorporation, and was transacted at the city of Detroit. We cannot review this finding of fact, if there was evidence to support it. We can only inquire whether there was such evidence. It appears that all that was done at the office named in the articles of incorporation was to hold the annual meeting of stockholders, and in the case of the Teagan Transportation Company also the first annual meeting of directors elected by the stockholders. Unless we decide that the holding of annual meetings of stockholders and directors is the principal business of said corporations, we must hold that that principal business was not transacted at the place named in the articles of incorporation. It is true that we held in Detroit v. Lothrop Estate Co. 11 Det. L. N. 6, 99 N. W. 9, that the principal business was done at the office where the manager resided, and where the managers and shareholders "meet to do whatever is necessary for them to do." This by no means decides that the annual meeting of stockholders constitutes the principal business of the corporation. To so hold would, in my judgment, clearly frustrate the legislative purpose. It is said that the personal property of the corporation should be tax-

its boats are registered under the Federal navigation laws, is not conclusive as to the domicile of the corporation, and does not necessarily give such boats a situs for the purposes of taxation. St. Louis v. Wiggins Ferry Co. 11 Wall. 425, 20 L. ed. 192.

b. Of railroads.

The residence of a domestic railroad company for the purpose of taxing its rolling stock when no statute interferes is where its principal office is located. Sangamon & M. R. Co. v. Morgan County, 14 Ill. 164, 56 Am. Dec. 497.

If the legislature has made no rule for the apportionment and distribution of taxes upon railroad rolling stock, its situs for the purpose of taxation is regarded as being at the head office of the company. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Appeal Tax Court, 50 Md. 397.

When a railroad line is wholly within the boundaries of a single state, and the legislature thereof has prescribed no rule of distribution and apportionment of track and rolling stock, the only practical place for assessing and taxing it is at its principal business office and station. Appeal Tax Court v. Western Maryland R. Co. 50 Md. 274.

The office where the financial and business affairs of a railroad are managed, where its transfer and account books are kept, where its directors hold regular meetings, where its executive officers transact its business, and where its machine and repair shops are located, and its rolling stock kept when not on the road, is, for local taxing purposes, its domicile in the absence of any controlling statute to the contrary. Orange & A. R. Co. v. Alexandria, 17 Gratt. 176.

The personal property of a street railroad corporation, when no statute directs otherwise, is assessable for taxes and has its situs for taxation in the city where its head office is situated, even when no part of the line is within the municipal limits. Detroit v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 127 Mich. 604, 86 N. W. 1032.

The terminal station of a railroad which extends from one state through another and into a third is not the domicile of the company, when its head office, principal place of business, workshops, and storage depots are in other states. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Appeal Tax Court, 50 Md. 397.

For the purpose of distributing for taxation the unlocated personal property of a railroad corporation among the several counties through which the railway runs, so as to subject that property to county taxation in proper proportions, such corporation, in Georgia, is treated as residing sub modo in all the counties along its line of road, and therefore as much in one as in another. Columbus Southern R. Co. v. Wright, 89 Ga. 574, 15 S. E. 293; Sparks v. Macon, 98 Ga. 301, 25 S. E. 459.

A railroad company, said Davis, J., in People ex rel. Buffalo & S. Line R. Co. v. Fredericks, 48 Barb. 173, Affirmed in 48 N. Y. 70, should be considered as a resident of the several towns through which its road extends within the meaning of the New York tax laws. To most corporations a fixed locality is given by their charters as the place of their business operations. This locality they cannot change without the consent of the legislature, and it becomes the legal residence of the corporation. But a different rule prevails with railroads. They are organized for the purpose of constructing a road between specified places, and to conduct their business along such road through its whole extent. They own and occupy the entire road, and in every town thereof through which it passes they have and use all the characteristics of inhabitancy that can attach to a corporation. The locality of the corporation may in such case justly be said to cover the route of which the company has the constant and potential occupancy and use, and to be everywhere co-extensive with the road itself. If it has a principal office or place for transacting the financial concerns of the company, the statute has expressly provided that that shall be the place where its personal property or capital shall be assessed; but without this express enactment the personal property might be assessed in each town where it was owned and used. It is claimed that the locality of the principal office determines for all purposes the legal residence of the corporation. But this does not necessarily follow; because with railroad companies the principal office may be changed at pleasure or convenience to any point along the route. Indeed there is nothing in the law to prevent the company from having its principal office in a railroad car, and running it up and down the track as the exigencies of business may require. The principal office does not, therefore, give locality to the corporation in the sense in which it does to a purely local company.

ble at the place "where its office is located in its articles of incorporation: . . . Provided, its business is actually transacted at such office." By "business" the legislature meant something more than the annual meeting of stockholders and newly chosen directors. If it did not, other and more appropriate language would surely have been used. We come, then, to the question, Had the lower court the right to infer that the relator corporations did such business in the city of Detroit as to make their personal property taxable there? We have shown that substantially all the business of relator the Teagan Transportation Company was done in Detroit; that the treasurer of the other relators resided in Detroit, had (and, it may be inferred, there exercised) superior powers of business management, and that he there received and disbursed the funds of said corporation except those disbursed for the ordinary running expenses of their boats. If the holding of annual meetings of stockholders and directors did not constitute the principal business of the corporations (and we have stated that in our judgment it did not), it follows that the personal property of the corporation was taxable either at the place where it established an "office for the transaction of its principal business, or, if it had no principal office, then at the place in this state where such corporation transacts business." It is immaterial whether we say that the place where the corporation did its business in Detroit was "its principal

Under a general system for taxing corporate real estate in the towns where it is situated, and in the same manner as the real property of individuals, established by statutes antedating railroads, a railroad right of way in any given town through which the line runs is properly assessed therein as real estate as if the railroad company resided in such town, regardless of the location of its principal office. People ex rel. Buffalo & S. Line R. Co. v. Barker, 48 N. Y. 70.

A domestic railroad corporation having its principal office at one of its termini, and whose line runs through several counties, is not taxable solely in the county where that office is located upon its intangible property, for that has its situs for taxation along the whole line of the road. State v. Austin & N. W. R. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 60 S. W. 886.

This is because this particular, intangible property—franchise, privilege, immunity—is by the laws of Texas not separately taxable apart from the real estate. Writ of Error denied, in 94 Tex. 530, 62 S. W. 1050.

In State v. Austin & N. W. R. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 60 S. W. 886, Key, J., was unable to agree with his colleagues upon the question of the situs for taxation of the intangible property of domestic railroad corporations, but held it to be at the place where the home office of the company was situated, deeming the decision of the Texas supreme court in Ferris v. Kimble, 75 Tex. 476, 12 S. W. 689,—that the intangible personal property of a natural person is taxable only where he resides, taken associated with the constitutional and statutory requirements that all property, unless otherwise required, should be listed and assessed for taxation in the county and municipality where it is situated,—conclusive, as there is a sufficient analogy between the principal office and legal domicile of a corporation and the residence of a natural person to render one the equivalent of the other, and they are generally so regarded.

A writ of error was, however, denied by the Texas supreme court in 94 Tex. 530, 62 S. W. 1050, but this was done by holding the intangible property in question—franchises, privileges, immunities, etc.—under the Texas statutes a part of the realty, and not taxable apart from it.

The situs for taxation of the intangible property of a railroad corporation, unlike that of an individual, is not at the home office where the directing thought and control of the corporation is, but it is distributed wherever its tangible property is situated and its work is performed. State v. Austin & N. W. R. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 60 S. W. 886.

Writ of error denied upon the principal ground that the franchises, privileges, and immunities of a railroad are not separately taxable by the laws of Texas apart from the real estate. 94 Tex. 530, 62 S. W. 1050.

V. Effect of certificate of incorporation on the question of domicile.

If the charter of a corporation designates no place of general business of the company, the place where that business is done, and where the personal property used in it is situated, is the situs of such property for taxation. Atlantic & P. R. Co. v. Lesueur, 2 Ariz. 428, 1 L. R. A. 244, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 189, 10 Pac. 157.

And if the corporate charter does not fix the corporate domicile, and the officers and directors hold their meetings in several places, the domicile for taxing purposes will be held to be where the by-laws require the stockholders to hold their meetings. Grundy County v. Tennessee Coal, Iron & R. Co. 94 Tenn. 295, 29 S. W. 116.

Where the statute under which it is organized does not require a corporation to name its place of business or the location of its principal office in its articles of association, its residence or domicile for taxing purposes is where its principal place of business is situated. Austen v. Hudson River Teleph. Co. 73 Hun, 96, 25 N. Y. Supp. 916.

And when such statute does not require such a naming of the words of the statute, or their obvious equivalents, in respect of the corporate domicile, must be used in the articles of incorporation to have the effect of determining by their own force, against the real facts, the place where a corporation is to be assessed upon its property. Milwaukee S. S. Co. v. Milwaukee, 83 Wis. 590, 18 L. R. A. 353, 53 N. W. 839.

A business corporation which is not required to report to the state auditor is to be assessed for taxes, in Kentucky, in the same manner as a natural person, and, natural persons being assessable upon personal property only in the counties where they reside, is to be assessed and taxed upon its personal property only at its office for the transaction of business," or whether we say that it had no principal office in that city. The fact that it transacted business of the character already stated—business which was obviously more than clerical—made that the place where its personal property was taxable under the hypothesis that the proviso of 1895 was unconstitutional. We come to the consideration of the question.

1. Is the provision that "the personal property of all corporations heretofore or hereafter organized under the laws of this state for the purpose of engaging in maritime commerce or navigation shall be assessed only in the city, village, or township which is stated in their original articles of association or in any amendment thereof heretofore or hereafter made," constitutional? It will be noticed that this provision is not confined to "vessel property," so called, but extends to all the personal property of corporations "engaged in maritime commerce or navigation." While the personal property of individuals is taxable at their place of residence, and while the property of other corporations is taxable at the place of their principal business office, corporations engaging in maritime commerce or navigation may have their property taxed at whatever place they may choose to designate in their articles of incorporation. As the rate of taxation varies much in different localities, it gives to the latter corporations the right to select that place in which the rate of taxation is low-legal domicile, which is the place named in its articles of incorporation as its principal place of business. A tax assessed elsewhere is illegal and void. Langdon Creasey Co. v. Owenton Common School District, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 823, 76 S. W. 381.

There is a conflict upon this question.

In the state of New York it is the general rule that the principal office of a domestic corporation is, for the purposes of taxation, conclusively fixed by its certificate of incorporation, and that only in the place therein designated can it lawfully be subjected to a personal property tax. Western Transp. Co. v. Scheu, 19 N. Y. 408; Oswego Starch Factory v. Dolloway, 21 N. Y. 449; Union S. B. Co. v. Buffalo, 82 N. Y. 351; Conroe v. National Protection Ins. Co. 10 How. Pr. 403; Hubbard v. National Protection Ins. Co. 11 How. Pr. 149; Chesebrough Mfg. Co. v. Coleman, 44 Hun, 545; People ex rel. Knickerbocker Press v. Barker, 87 Hun, 341; 34 N. Y. Supp. 289; People ex rel. Edison Electric Light Co. v. Barker, 91 Hun, 594, 30 N. Y. Supp. 844; People ex rel. India Rubber & G. P. Insulating Co. v. Barker, 16 Misc. 252, 39 N. Y. Supp. 88.

And in Ohio, where corporations are required by statute (56 Ohio Laws, 113) to designate in their certificates of incorporation "the name of the county or place where the principal office" of the company is situated, such office is the domicile or residence of the corporation. Pelton v. Northern Transp. Co. 37 Ohio St. 450.

It is otherwise in Wisconsin and Michigan.

In Wisconsin a statutory requirement that a corporation shall state its "name and location" in its articles of incorporation does not enable a corporation conclusively to fix its principal office or place of business for the purposes of taxation under the tax laws. Milwaukee S. S. Co. v. Milwaukee, 83 Wis. 590, 18 L. R. A. 353, 53 N. W. 839.

And in Michigan the act requiring the articles of association of a corporation to state the city, or town and county, in the state where its general office for business is located, will not let it escape taxation upon its personal estate in another place where its actual business is transacted. Detroit Transp. Co. v. Board of Assessors, 91 Mich. 382, 51 N. W. 978.

It will be noticed that, inasmuch as the Wisconsin corporation law goes no further than to require corporations organized under it to state in their certificates of incorporation their names and locations, the decision cited is not irreconcilable with the New York and Ohio cases, but may reasonably be distinguished from them. It is possible, also, but more difficult, to distinguish in the same way the Michigan decision just cited; but the Michigan statute is very much more explicit in its language than that of Wisconsin, and the reasoning upon which the judgment rests discloses radical differences in principle.

The boats and vessels belonging to an Ohio corporation navigating the Great Lakes are taxable as personal property only at the place designated in its certificate of incorporation as that where its principal office is situated, and this notwithstanding the bulk of its business is transacted at a neighboring city in the same county and state, and that the office first occupied by it was removed to another part of the same town because the limits of such city were extended to take in the original office, and it was intended to avoid taxation in such city. Pelton v. Northern Transp. Co. 37 Ohio St. 450.

The principal office of a corporation, which constitutes its residence or domicile, said the Ohio supreme court, is not to be determined by the amount of business transacted there or elsewhere, but by the place designated in the certificate of incorporation. And when the corporation has established an office at the place named in such certificate no further inquiry as to the identity of the principal office is admissible. Ibid.

On the other hand, the Michigan supreme court, while admitting that a corporation has the same right that an individual has to select its residence, and that it may do so with a view to taxation, argues in this wise: The corporation must have a local habitation, just as the individual must have a residence. This must be an actual, not merely a nominal, one to affect taxation. The individual cannot have a nominal residence in the country and an actual residence in the city, and escape taxation in the city. Neither can the corporation fix its nominal domicile in the country, while its actual domicile for business is in the city, without becoming taxable at the latter place. If it does no business, and in the nature of things can do no business, at the place it selects as its office, except hold annual meetings of stockholders and directors, and actually carries on

est. It thus gives to them the privilege of paying less taxes than must be paid by other corporations or by individuals engaged in precisely the same business. Neither can it be said that individuals have the same right to select the place in which their property will be taxed because it will be taxed at the place in which they may choose to reside. It is true that individuals may determine where they will reside, and corporations in general may determine where they will do business, but, in order to make their property taxable at that place, the individuals must actually reside there (see Beecher v. Detroit, 114 Mich. 228, 72 N. W. 206), and the corporations must actually do business there (see Detroit Transp. Co. v. Board of Assessors, 91 Mich. 382, 51

N. W. 978). Neither such corporations nor individuals have the same right to determine the situs for the taxation of their personality as this statute undertakes to give to corporations engaged in maritime commerce and navigation.

The question arises whether such a law does not violate the provision contained in § 11, art. 14, of our Constitution, requiring a uniform rule of taxation. In Western Transp. Co. v. Scheu, 19 N. Y. 408, and Oswego Starch Factory v. Dolloway, 21 N. Y. 449 (cases relied on by relators), laws like that under consideration were enforced; but those cases throw no light on the constitutional question before us. There no constitutional question was raised,—perhaps none could be raised,—and no such all the business it was incorporated to do at another place, it will be taxable in the latter. Detroit Transp. Co. v. Board of Assessors, 91 Mich. 382, 51 N. W. 978.

The facts in the Ohio case of Pelton v. Northern Transp. Co. 37 Ohio St. 450, and in the Michigan case of Detroit Transp. Co. v. Board of Assessors, 91 Mich. 382, 51 N. W. 978, are indistinguishable, and the wording of the incorporation statutes of both states closely similar, yet the two decisions are diametrically opposed.

The certificate of incorporation of a New York corporation is not the less conclusive as to the corporate domicile for the purposes of the taxation of its personal property and the principal office or place for transacting the financial concerns of the company because it is deliberately chosen to avoid taxation in the place where the actual operations are intended to be conducted. If this is an evil it is for the legislature, not the courts, to apply the remedy. Union S. B. Co. v. Buffalo, 82 N. Y. 351.

The certificate is not the less conclusive because the actual principal place of business may be in fact elsewhere. People ex rel. India Rubber & G. P. Insulating Co. v. Barker, 16 Misc. 252, 39 N. Y. Supp. 88.

Nor can the conclusive effect of naming in the certificate of incorporation the principal office as respects the situs of the corporate personal property for taxable purposes be avoided by adding in the certificate itself the alternative words, "or at such other place as the stockholders may determine." People ex rel. Edison Electric Light Co. v. Barker, 91 Hun, 594, 86 N. Y. Supp. 844.

Independently of some statute authorizing it so to do, a New York corporation cannot establish its principal office elsewhere than in the place named in its certificate of incorporation, so as to affect the situs of its personal property for the purposes of taxation. Oswego Starch Factory v. Dolloway, 21 N. Y. 449; People ex rel. Knickerbocker Press v. Barker, 87 Hun, 341, 34 N. Y. Supp. 269.

In Ohio, however, a domestic corporation may change its office from one to another part of the town named in its organization certificate as the place of its principal office, without express legislative sanction, and not affect thereby the situs of its personal property for taxation. This is because the statute requiring the corporation to designate in its certificate of incorporation the name of the county or place where the principal office of such corporation is situated, is sufficiently complied with by naming the town without specifying a building by street and number; hence, the corporation, by stockholders' vote at an annual meeting, may remove from the building where such principal office was established originally to another building in the same town, and the latter building will thereafter be to all intents and purposes, including taxation of the personal property of the corporation, its principal office. Pelton v. Northern Transp. Co. 37 Ohio St. 450.

In New York, too, when a corporation is created by a special act of the legislature, and its by-laws designate its principal place of business in a named city, and its manufacturing business is there carried on, although they also provide for a branch office in another city, and stockholders' meetings are always held where the manufacturing is done, while the general executive and financial business of the corporation is transacted, and all of the principal officers reside, without the state, the place of taxation of the personal property of the corporation is in the city where its manufacturing is done, and which its by-laws designate as its principal place of business, and it is not taxable in the city where it has a branch office. People ex rel. General Electric Co. v. Barker, 91 Hun, 590, 36 N. Y. Supp. 842.

The case of Oswego Starch Factory v. Dolloway, 21 N. Y. 449, was critically examined and explained by Finch, J., in the opinion of the court in People ex rel. Union Trust Co. v. Coleman, 126 N. Y. 433, 12 L. R. A. 762, 27 N. E. 818, and, although he carefully limited it and expressed his disagreement with the reasoning of Denio, J., he was at pains to pronounce the decision itself "entirely correct and sound."

Even in New York, however, a corporation whose certificate of organization has stated in due form the name and location of its principal office and place for transacting its financial concerns and carrying on its operations, in one county, may, nevertheless, under some circumstances, be subjected to taxation upon its personal estate in another and different county; as where, after being assessed in the latter county, where it does in fact transact business, its officers appear before the tax commissioners and apply for a reduction, filing a sworn statement that the corporate place of business and place of conducting the corpo-question was considered by the court. In Cooley on Taxation, after demonstrating the proposition that perfect uniformity and perfect equality in taxation are unattainable, it is said: "But when, for any reason, it becomes discriminative between individuals of the class taxed, and selects some for an exceptional burden, the tax is deprived of the necessary element of legal equality, and becomes inadmissible. It is immaterial on what ground the selection is made,—whether it be because of residence in a particular portion of the taxing district, or because the persons selected have been remiss in meeting a former tax for the same purpose, . . . for, if the principle of selection be once admitted, limits cannot be set to it, and it may be made use of for the purposes of oppression, or even of punishment." 1 Cooley, Taxn. 3d ed. p. 260. In the note to this text is the following quotation from the opinion of the court in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Clark, 60 Kan. 826, 47 L. R. A. 77, 58 Pac. 477: "Absolute equality in taxation is, of course, unattainable; but a law the manifest purpose and legitimate result of which is discrimination and inequality cannot be sustained." In Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. v. Board of Assessors, 95 Mich. 466, 55 N. W. 112, this court held that a law which subjected banks and insurance companies to a higher rate of taxation than that of other individuals and corporations was unconstitutional. In Pingree v. Auditor General, 120 Mich. 95, 44 L. R. A. 679, 78 N. W. 1025, and Detroit rate financial concerns that year was in their county, and by means thereof securing a reduction. Re McLean, 138 N. Y. 158, 20 L. R. A. 339, 33 N. E. 821.

In this case of the personal tax on the Wyandance Brick & Terra Cotta Company, which had filed its certificate of incorporation in Suffolk county, and designated a town therein as the place where its operations were to be carried on, the New York court of appeals sustained the validity of a personal tax assessed in the city of New York, but in doing so neither overruled nor criticized the earlier cases holding the statement in the certificate of incorporation conclusive as to the place for the taxation of personal property. The court grounded its decision, not upon the proposition that the corporation had acquired a legal residence for taxation in New York city,—it deemed consideration of that point unnecessary,—but upon the theory that, by appearing before the assessors and applying for a reduction of the tax, filing for that purpose a sworn statement that its principal office was then in the city of New York, and securing favorable action, the corporation had waived its right to object that its residence was in Suffolk county, and the New York officials consequently without jurisdiction to tax it, and had voluntarily submitted to the jurisdiction of such officials. Ibid.

But with great respect to the learned tribunal thus deciding, the reasoning leading to its conclusion is quite unconvincing. The difficulty is that New York city had no jurisdiction to tax the corporation at all,—the reduced amount no more than the original assessment. The liability to Suffolk county was unaffected by the proceedings in New York city. The latter municipality yielded nothing by lowering a tax it had no power to impose at all. No principle of estoppel can possibly come into play. It was open to the court to confess error in its early decisions and overrule them, or to hold that the corporation might acquire a taxable situs in another place than that named in its certificate of incorporation; but this it declined to do. The position of the Michigan supreme court upon this question is more commendable and logical.

A much more tenable ground was taken by the New York supreme court when it sustained a personal tax laid in New York city upon the Couper Milling Company, a domestic corporation whose certificate of organization located its principal office in Tarrytown in the adjoining county of Westchester. The corporation was assessed in New York city a tax upon its capital stock, and apparently was established there. It made its return to the city tax commissioners, and in it stated upon the oath of one of its executive officers that its principal office or place for transacting its financial business was in the city of New York at a named street address. And when afterwards the receiver of taxes began proceedings to enforce collection of the tax the affidavit in resistance was made by the same corporate officer, and attested the fact that the certificate of incorporation located the principal office in Tarrytown and outside the jurisdiction of the New York tax commissioners. And the court deemed the affidavit neutralized by the prior sworn return, and refused to credit its statements. McLean v. Couper Milling Co. 38 N. Y. S. R. 893, 14 N. Y. Supp. 609.

Although a New York corporation has designated, as required by law in its certificate of organization, the place within the state where its principal office is to be and its operations are to be carried on, still, if it actually removes its office to another state, and subsequently makes no sales, manufactures nothing, occupies no premises, pays no rent, employs no workmen, and does no business, in the home state, it will no longer be taxable therein under laws taxing corporate franchises according to the amount of capital stock employed within the state. People ex rel. Davis-Colby Ore Roaster Co. v. Campbell, 66 Hun, 146, 21 N. Y. Supp. 7. This case is only an apparent exception to the New York rule that a corporation cannot, without legislative permission, change its domicile. The tax in the case was laid only upon corporations which employed capital and did business in the state. The corporation did neither, and so escaped the tax in spite of having its legal domicile within the state.

In Michigan, notwithstanding the decision in Detroit Transp. Co. v. Board of Assessors, 91 Mich. 382, 51 N. W. 978,—that naming in the articles of association of a domestic corporation the town, city, and county in which its general office for business is located does not conclusively fix the place where its principal office in the state is situated, which the tax laws make the residence of the corporation for the purposes of taxation; but that the actual place where the corporation carries on the busi-

Citizens' Street R. Co. v. Detroit, 125 Mich., at page 694, 84 Am. St. Rep. 589, 85 N. W. 96, 86 N. W. 809, similar decisions were made. It follows from these decisions that, if the legislature had attempted to impose an onerous burden of taxation upon the property of corporations engaged in maritime commerce and navigation, such legislation would be void. But the act in question, instead of imposing an onerous burden upon such corporations, confers upon them a special privilege.

The question arises—and this is a question not argued by counsel, but which must necessarily be determined before we adjudge the law unconstitutional—whether the act can be sustained as a partial exemption from taxation. It cannot be supposed that the legislature enacted this law upon the ground that the property of corporations engaged in maritime commerce and navigation should be exempt. So far as that property consists of vessels engaged in commerce, it in no respect differs from vessels belonging to individuals engaged in commerce. So far as it consists of other tangible or intangible personal property, it in no manner differs from such property belonging to other individuals and corporations. This law cannot be sustained as a law partially exempting property from taxation unless the legislature has power to single out individuals or corporations from the class to which they belong, and capriciously exempt them from taxation. We are forced to say that the legislature has not that power. In 1

ness it was authorized to transact, and not the place named in the certificate, is decisive,—the contents of the certificate do influence the determination of the corporate domicile for the purposes of taxation,—probably sufficiently so to decide a doubtful case.

The character of the business and the purposes of a corporation are important elements in determining its situs for the purposes of taxation. If it can, and actually does, in good faith carry on a considerable part of its business at the office named in its articles of incorporation, it will be taxed there, and not elsewhere, upon its personal property, although it may have other offices in other places. Detroit v. Lothrop Estate Co. (Mich.) 99 N. W. 9, 11 Det. L. N. 6.

For a corporation to earn the exemption given by the laws of New Jersey to its domestic manufacturing corporations that carry on business in the state, it is not sufficient for it to make some sales, hold business meetings, maintain a business office, buy materials, and transport goods in that state; it must go further and not stop short of carrying on therein its principal business. American Glucose Co. v. State, 43 N. J. Eq. 280, 5 Atl. 803; Standard Underground Cable Co. v. Atty. Gen. 40 N. J. Eq. 270, 19 Am. St. Rep. 394, 19 Atl. 733; State v. Under Ground Cable Co. (N. J. Eq.) 18 Atl. 581.

VI. Legislative power to fix the situs of property for taxation.

While it is true that in general, and in the absence of an express provision of law to the contrary, personal property follows and has its situs for the purposes of taxation at its owner's domicile; and that the power of a state to tax is limited to persons and property within its jurisdiction,—nevertheless personal property may, by law, be severed for taxation from its owner, and lawfully taxed at the place where it is situated. Tappan v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 19 Wall. 490, 22 L. ed. 189.

A railroad corporation has not a constitutional right to have its intangible personal property taxed only at its place of domicile. It is entirely competent for the legislature to fix its situs for taxation anywhere along the line. Columbus Southern R. Co. v. Wright, 151 U. S. 470, 38 L. ed. 238, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 396.

It is within the legislative power, by suitable enactment, to establish a situs for personal property elsewhere than at the place where it is found, and this fact interprets several decisions of the United States Supreme Court. The place in which a vessel is registered is, by law, its home port. That is considered its situs. Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Twombly, 29 Fed. 658.

Personal property may be separated from the domicile of its owner, and have a situs elsewhere for the purposes of taxation. Mobile v. Baldwin, 57 Ala. 61, 29 Am. Rep. 712.

Under general laws, the legislature may fix the situs for taxation of personal property, tangible or intangible, provided its classification is not arbitrary. Walton County v. Morgan County, 120 Ga. 548, 48 S. E. 243.

Unless restrained by some constitutional provision, the legislature may fix the situs for taxation of all personal property at a place different from the owner's residence. Morgan County v. Walton County, 121 Ga. 659, 49 S. E. 776.

It is well settled that it is competent for the legislature to adopt different methods for ascertaining the value of personal property, and to fix the situs of such property for taxation. Layman v. Iowa Teleph. Co. 123 Iowa, 591, 99 N. W. 205.

The legislature has unquestionable authority to fix the situs of property for the purpose of taxation. Langdon-Creasey Co. v. Owenton Common School District, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 823, 76 S. W. 381.

The personal property of a corporation may be taxed where it is located if the legislature so enacts, although such may not be the domicile of the owner. Blackstone Mfg. Co. v. Blackstone, 13 Gray, 488.

It is competent for the legislature to treat railroad rolling stock for the purposes of taxation as real estate, and to make it taxable as such. Louisville & N. A. R. Co. v. State, 25 Ind. 177, 87 Am. Dec. 358.

That the situs for the purposes of taxation of personal property follows the domicile of its owner is a convenient legal fiction, but not an unbending and uncontrollable principle of law which the legislature, if it chooses, cannot modify or change. Columbus Southern R. Co. v. Wright, 151 U. S. 470, 38 L. ed. 238, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 396; State ex rel. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. v. Severance, 55 Mo. 378.

The provisions of the general tax law of Georgia (Acts 1900, § 8, p. 29) in requiring

Cooley on Taxation, 3d ed. pp. 381, 382, it is stated: "It is difficult to conceive of a justifiable exemption law which should select single individuals or corporations, or single articles of property, and, taking them out of the class to which they belong, make them the subject of capricious legislative favor. Such favoritism could make no pretense to equality. It would lack the semblance of legitimate tax legislation." See Hamilton v. Wilson, 61 Kan. 511, 48 L. R. A. 238, 59 Pac. 1069; Lexington v. McQuilian, 9 Dana, 513, 35 Am. Dec. 159. We are bound, therefore, to declare that the constitutional provision requiring uniformity of taxation prevents the legislature enacting a law which it must be presumed was intended to and does tax property at a rate different from that imposed on all property of precisely the same class. Tested by this principle, the law (the proviso) under consideration is unconstitutional, for, as we have already shown, it clearly taxes (and we must assume that the legislature intended that it should tax) the property of corporations engaged in maritime commerce and navigation at a rate different from all other property of the same class. But it is said that this result is brought about in an unusual manner, viz., by selecting the situs for taxation. And it is earnestly contended that the constitutional requirement of uniformity does not affect the legislative power to determine that situs. If this argument is sound, it leads us to some peculiar consequences. In the case before us manufacturing corporations whose factory properties are in more than one county to make their returns for taxation to the county in which is the greater value of their real estate and machinery, make final and conclusive the determination of corporate officers as to which county the tax return should be made in, and render void the assessment and levy of taxes in the other county or counties containing part of the manufacturing plant. Penick v. High Shoals Mfg. Co. 116 Ga. 819, 43 S. E. 254.

This statute is no longer in force. An act of 1902 required the return to be made to the county containing the main building of the corporation, and provided, in case of a dispute as to the fact, for a bill in the nature of an interpleader to which the corporation and the counties were parties. Walton County v. Morgan County, 120 Ga. 548, 48 S. E. 243.

The legislature may, if it so chooses, by statute make a foreign a domestic corporation also, and give to its stock and property a legal situs for all purposes within the state. Young v. South Tredegar Iron Co. 85 Tenn. 189, 2 S. W. 202.

While it is true that personal property having a situs within a state, if the legislature so provides, may be taxed in that state, and that the same rule applies between different counties in the same state, yet it is always a question of legislative provision and intent, and, unless some statute so provides, personal property is not taxable save at its owner's domicile. Com. v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1126, 77 S. W. 186.

VII. Personal property physically present in the taxing jurisdiction.

A state has undoubted power to tax private property having an actual situs within its territorial limits, and may require the person having possession of it to pay the taxes laid upon it. Carstairs v. Cochran, 193 U. S. 10, 48 L. ed. 596, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 318.

The general rule is that tangible personal property is taxable by the state in which it is, no matter where may be the domicile of the owner. Old Dominion S. S. Co. v. Virginia, 198 U. S. 299, 49 L. ed. 1059, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 686.

In the eye of the law personal property for most purposes has no locality. Mobilia sequuntur personam; immobilia situm. Mobilia non habent sequelam. In a qualified sense it accompanies the owner wherever he goes, and he may deal with it and dispose of it according to the law of his domicile. But this doctrine is not allowed to stand in the way of the taxing power in the locality where the property has its actual situs and the requisite legislative jurisdiction exists. Such property is undoubtedly liable to taxation as if the proprietor were a resident of the same locality. St. Louis v. Wiggins Ferry Co. 11 Wall. 425, 20 L. ed. 192.

The situs of a railroad corporation, and, upon general principles, the situs of all its personal property, is in the state which gave it life; but for the purposes of taxation that situs may be fixed in whatever locality the property may be brought and used by its owner by the law of the place where it is found. Marye v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 127 U. S. 117, 32 L. ed. 94, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1037.

Personal property may be separated from its owner, and he may be taxed on its account at the place where it is located, although that is not the owner's domicile, and even if he is neither a citizen nor a resident of the state which imposes the tax. Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 18, 35 L. ed. 613, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 595, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 876.

Tangible movable property, when made taxable by statute, may be assessed and taxed where it is permanently situated, without regard to its owner's domicile. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Board of Assessors, 44 La. Ann. 760, 16 L. R. A. 56, 11 So. 91.

The general rule that the domicile of the owner is the place of taxation of his personal property is in most states departed from as to chattels having a permanent situs else where. These are taxable where found. Herron v. Keeran, 59 Ind. 472, 26 Am. Rep. 87.

For many purposes the situs of personal property is the domicile of the owner, but for the purposes of taxation tangible property has a situs wherever it is found. Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Twombly, 29 Fed. 658.

Thus, railroad rolling stock continuously used in a state acquires a situs there for the purposes of taxation, and may, at the option of such state, be subjected to an equal property tax. Ibid.

For many purposes tangible personal property is deemed to have no situs apart from its owner; but this fiction is always made to yield where the purposes of justice require that the

it permits a particular class of corporations to have their property assessed for taxation at that place in the state where taxation is lowest. If relators' argument is sound, it would be competent for the legislature to declare that such property should be taxed at that municipality in the state whose rate of taxation was highest. If such a law were passed, would it not be clear that relators could successfully maintain that their property was taxed at a rate higher than that imposed on other property of the same class? In support of their argument that the requirement for uniformity does not affect the power of the legislature to determine the situs for taxation, relators cite State, Vanatta, Prosecutor, v. Runyon, 41 N. J. L. 98; Crawford v. Linn County, 11

Or. 482, 5 Pac. 738; Winston v. Salem, 131 N. C. 404, 42 S. E. 889. What is decided in State, Vanatta, Prosecutor, v. Runyon, 41 N. J. L. 98, is sufficiently shown by the following quotation from that opinion: "The framers of the constitutional amendments did not aim at the impossible. They contented themselves with the accomplishment of so much of good as was attainable under the single requirement that 'property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws, and by uniform rules, according to its true value.' In other respects the legislative power over taxation was left unimpaired. If property be such in its nature as, upon ordinary principles of taxation, to be capable of having a twofold situs for taxation, the legislature may select either actual status of the movable be regarded, as where dominion is asserted by the government of the place of actual situation of such property. Yost v. Lake Erie Transp. Co. 50 C. C. A. 511, 12 Fed. 746.

The power and right of a state to tax property of nonresidents, whether natural or artificial persons, having its situs within the state for the business, convenience, or pleasure of its owners or others, is too well settled to be seriously questioned. It rests upon the just ground that property having the protection, advantage, and benefit of the laws of a state ought to contribute its fair share to the support of the government. Bain v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 105 N. C. 363, 8 L. R. A. 299, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 149, 18 Am. St. Rep. 912, 11 S. E. 311.

The technical principle that the situs of personal property for the purposes of taxation is at the domicile of the owner is the rule as to intangible property, such as bonds, mortgages, and other evidences of debt; but the better opinion seems to be that, in respect of visible, tangible personal property, permanently located in another jurisdiction, this principle does not hold, because such property, goods, chattels, horses, cattle, and other movables are taxable where kept, irrespective of the owner's residence, for legal protection and liability to taxation are reciprocal. But if such property be kept in motion, so that it is impracticable to tax it anywhere except at the owner's domicile, it will have situs for taxation at that place. Com. v. American Dredging Co. 122 Pa. 386, 1 L. R. A. 237, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 221, 9 Am. St. Rep. 116, 15 Atl. 443.

The ancient rule indicated by the maxim, Mobilia sequuntur personam, that personal property is to be regarded as subject to the lex domicilii, has never been of universal application in this country. The origin of that doctrine dates from an ancient time when jewels and gold principally constituted the movable property, and that could be taken by the owner from one place to another: but such has not been the case in recent times, since in the continued progress of the world the accumulated wealth consists in large proportions of personal property, including, not only jewels and gold, but also a great variety of other personal property, much of which is intangible, and none of which is immediately connected with the person of the owner, yet over all of which it is incumbent upon government to extend its protection. The constantly increasing variety of such property, perceptible and imperceptible, tangible and intangible, has caused the ancient rule expressed in the maxim to yield more and more to the lex situs, and, while it is true that for many purposes personal property is subject to the law of the place of the owner's domicile, still the law is well settled that, for the purposes of taxation, such property has its actual situs where it has been brought and used by its owner, and is subject to the law of that place. Such property may be separated from its owner, and he may be taxed because of it at the place where it is found, although that is not the place of his domicile. Union Refrigerator Transit Co. v. Lynch, 18 Utah, 378, 48 L. R. A. 790, 55 Pac. 639.

VIII. Tangible property outside the state.

As to intangible personal property it is doubtless the rule that the maxim, Mobilia personam sequuntur, applies whenever the taxing power has dominion over the person of the owner.

The state, in taxing one of its own corporations upon its capital stock as representing all its property and assets including its franchises, is entitled to include purchase-money mortgages upon land without the state, which the company has conveyed, since such mortgages have their situs for taxation at the domicile of the corporation. Com. v. Pennsylvania Coal Co. 197 Pa. 551, 47 Atl. 740.

It was an open question in the United States Supreme Court, at least as late as 1871, whether the tangible personal property of a domestic corporation, when actually and permanently located in another state, was taxable to it at home. Whether the personal property of a resident of one state situate in another, said that tribunal at that time, can be taxed in the former, is a question which, in this case, we are not called upon to decide. St. Louis v. Wiggins Ferry Co. 11 Wall. 425, 20 L. ed. 192.

And in Walton County v. Morgan County, 120 Ga. 548, 48 S. E. 243, Lamar, J., as recently as last year (1904) declared that, "while the situs of choses in action for taxation has been several times considered, no case involving the situs of tangible personal property has ever been before this court."

The right of a state to tax its own citizens and domestic corporations on account of their

as the place where the tax shall be laid." Conclusive proof is furnished that the court did not intend by this statement to assert the proposition contended for by relators by other language in the opinion, which I quote: "The object of this constitutional provision was the equalization of taxation in its relation to the several parts of the state, and the prevention of unjust discriminations in the apportionment of the public burdens among its citizens liable to taxation." In Crawford v. Linn County, 11 Or. 482, 5 Pac. 738, it was held that the constitutional provision requiring uniformity was not violated by a law which taxed mortgages covering land in two or more counties at the place where the mortgagee resides, and which taxed other mortgages where the mortgaged land was situated. This decision proceeded upon the ground that the court could not say that this determination of situs was favorable or burdensome to either of these two classes of mortgagees. And it was said: "If the court could know judicially that the one or the other were hurt, it would be sufficient." It is true that it is said in this opinion: "A limitation on the power of the legislature to fix rates of assessment and taxation has nothing to do with the power of the legislature to fix the situs of personal property for purposes of taxation." If by this the court intended to assert the proposition contended for by relators, it has no more than stated a dictum. In Winston v. Salem, 131 N. C. 404, 42 S. E. 889, it was decided that tangible personal property situated abroad has in the past often been asserted. If such property is not actually subjected to taxation in situ, its owner may be taxed on its account at his home.

Inasmuch as it is a settled rule, whether regarded as one of necessity or convenience, that property must be taxed somewhere, coal mined by a domestic corporation in its own state is taxable therein, although it has been transported to places in other states where it is held for sale,—at least this is so when there is no proof of its taxation at the places where it is actually resting. Com. v. Pennsylvania Coal Co. 3 Dauphin Co. Rep. 142.

The situs of tangible personal property for taxing purposes is at the domicile of the owner if temporarily, and not permanently, located, and not taxed locally where it is found. Com. v. American Dredging Co. 122 Pa. 386, 1 L. R. A. 237, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 221, 9 Am. St. Rep. 110, 15 All. 443.

The taxing at the owners' domicils of ships and vessels which, because of their employment in trade and commerce, acquire no situs in foreign ports, as hereafter noted, afford examples of the exercise of power to tax absent property because of jurisdiction to tax those to whom it belongs.

But if tangible personal property not only be absent from its owner's domicile in another state, but actually subjected there to lawful taxation, then the modern view is, the owner is not to be taxed for it at his home.

This is the necessary corollary to the asserted right to tax tangible property where it is located regardless of the owner's domicile.

Taxing the tangible property of a domestic corporation after it has lost its situs in the state by being shipped away never to return, although in the guise of a tax upon the capital stock of the corporation, is depriving such corporation of its property without due process of law, in contravention of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 198 U. S. 341, 49 L. ed. 1077, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 669.

When a tax is laid upon the capital stock of a domestic corporation as a property tax upon the aggregate of all its property and assets, tangible and intangible, and a part of that property consists of coal which the corporation owns, has shipped to market in another state, where it rests awaiting sale, and is actually taxed at its resting place, the refusal to deduct the value of such coal from the aggregate capital stock when assessing such tax in the home state is taxing property beyond the jurisdiction of the state, and amounts to depriving the corporation of its property without due process of law in violation of its rights under the Federal Constitution. Ibid.

As a state cannot tax tangible property permanently outside its boundaries, even though it belongs to a domestic corporation, so it cannot attain the same end by taxing the enhanced value of the capital stock of such corporation which is beyond the jurisdiction of the state. Ibid.

The tangible personal property of a New York corporation which is actually permanently located and taxed in another state is not subject to taxation at the domicile of the company. People ex rel. Orinoka Mills v. Barker, 84 App. Div. 469, 83 N. Y. Supp. 33; Hatch and Patterson, J.J., dissenting.

The majority of the court relied upon and followed as controlling, the early decision in People ex rel. Hoyt v. Tax & A. Comrs. 23 N. Y. 224, decided when the tax law (1 Rev. Stat. 387, § 1) read, "All lands and personal estate within this state, whether owned by individuals or by corporations, shall be liable to taxation," although the present tax law (Laws 1896, chap. 908, § 3) now reads, "All personal property situated or owned within this state is taxable," and provides (§ 11) for the assessment of all the personal estate of every incorporated company in the tax district where its principal office or place for transacting its financial concerns is situated. The majority thought it difficult to see the object of adding the words "or owned" in reference to the property subject to taxation, and deemed it probably applicable to intangible property, such as credits that have no actual situs. A chattel with a defined situs actually located in a foreign state is not "owned" in New York. It is taxable where it is located. The intent which controlled in the Hoyt Case is not less obvious in the latter statute, and personal property that has an actual situs in another state, and is there subject to taxation, is not taxable in New York notwithstanding its owner actually resides there. The dissenting judges, starting with the assumption that the legislature has power to tax personal property owned by one of its citizens and residents and acta law which made personal property generally taxable at one's place of residence and the personal property of partnerships and corporations taxable at their places of business was constitutional. It may be said in this case, as was said in the case of Crawford v. Linn County, that the court could not judicially know that this method of taxation discriminated in favor of or against either of these classes of taxpayers. In saying in its opinion that the constitutional provision requiring uniformity left the legislature "free, as always heretofore, to prescribe regulations as to the situs of personal property," the court went far beyond the requirements of the case, and, like the Oregon case, has merely stated a dictum.

We are bound to say from this examination of authorities that there is nothing but dicta to sustain relators' contention. We are therefore free to determine on principle whether the constitutional requirement of uniformity affects the legislative authority to determine the situs for the taxation of personal property. This is not a difficult inquiry, especially if the proposition be stated in different, but in equivalent, language, viz., Can the legislature, in determining the situs for the taxation of personal property, disregard the constitutional provision requiring uniformity? The legislature derives its authority to determine the situs for the taxation of personal property,—and it certainly has that authority (see Detroit v. Board of Assessors [Detroit v. Rentz] 91 Mich. 78, 16 L. R. A. 59, 51 N.

usually having situs outside of the state, because personal property follows the owner's domicile, held that the change of verbiage meant a change of meaning, and was intended to change the rule established by the Hoyt decision.

At the time of writing, this case has not been reported as having been decided by the court of appeals if it was taken there for review.

In the early case of People ex rel. Hoyt v. Tax & A. Comrs. 23 N. Y. 224, it was held that the statute of New York (1 Rev. Stat. 387, § 1) making all lands and all personal estate within the state, whether owned by individuals or by corporations, liable to taxation subject to specified exemptions, did not authorize the assessment and taxation of either personal or real property actually located and taxed outside of the state belonging to one of its resident citizens. This holding was supported as follows: We have a system, apparently symmetrical and complete, said the court, according to which all personal estate having an actual situs in this state is brought within the sphere of taxation without regard to the domicile of the owner, with only special exceptions dictated by policy and justice. And if this be the rule of taxation where the situs of the thing to be taxed and the domicile of the owner are different, it is conceded that the opposite rule cannot and does not prevail. Proceeding on this rule, Louisiana and New Jersey very justly imposed a share of their public burdens on the property of the relator situated in those states. The state of New York will do the same thing in respect of citizens of those states having property here, but it is not so unjust to its own citizens as to load them with double burdens by proceeding also upon the opposite principle.

This case is said to have been uniformly followed in that state. People ex rel. Orlinoka Mills v. Barker, 84 App. Div. 469, 83 N. Y. Supp. 33.

The doctrine of the cases of Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 198 U. S. 341, 40 L. ed. 1077, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 609, and People ex rel. Hoyt v. Tax & A. Comrs. 23 N. Y. 224, has just been reaffirmed, and these cases followed in Union Refrigerator Transit Co. v. Kentucky, 199 U. S. 194, 50 L. ed.—26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 36.

IX. Particular classes of property.

a. Railroad rolling stock.

For taxing purposes, railroad rolling stock is personal property, and taxable only at the 69 L. R. A.

head office of the company when there is no statute fixing its situs elsewhere. Sangamon & M. R. Co. v. Morgan County, 14 Ill. 163, 56 Am. Dec. 497.

The rolling stock of a domestic railroad corporation, no statute prescribing otherwise, has its situs for taxation at the home office of the company. Appeal Tax Court v. Northern C. R. Co. 50 Md. 417.

The rolling stock of a domestic railroad corporation whose line is wholly within the state, whether considered to be personal property or movable fixtures partaking of the nature of real estate, is properly assessed for taxation at the principal office of the company, when the legislature has failed to prescribe some positive rule of distribution and apportionment. Appeal Tax Court v. Western Maryland R. Co. 50 Md. 274.

When the workshops and storage depots of a consolidated railroad corporation are without one of the states which its rolling stock regularly enters and leaves in the operation of its road, and the statutes of that state subject to taxation only property permanently located at the places where taxes are imposed, and there is no law for the apportionment and distribution for the purposes of taxation of railroad rolling stock, no valid tax can be laid thereon in such state, because its situs is at the head office of the corporation. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Appeal Tax Court, 50 Md. 397.

By the terms of the Maryland assessment act of 1876, railroad rolling stock is assessable for taxes only at the home office or principal place of business of the corporation which owns it, whether that be a domestic or a foreign one, and irrespective of the consideration whether, independent of such statute, railroad rolling stock is real or personal property. Appeal Tax Court v. Pullman Palace Car Co. 50 Md. 452.

The rolling stock of a railroad company, although continuously employed by it in operating leased lines in a state other than that which created it, is not taxable in the state where it is used, in the absence of any statute thereof fixing the situs of personal property for taxation elsewhere than at its owner's domicile, for such rolling stock has its situs at the principal office in the home state of the corporation to which it belongs. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Allen, 22 Fed. 376.

The rolling stock, tools, etc., of a street railroad are no part of the track, but are personal property to be assessed for taxation at the place

W. 787),—not from any express constitutional grant, but from the grant of general authority to legislate. The provision requiring uniformity of taxation is a constitutional limitation on that authority. To contend that in determining such situs the legislature may ignore the constitutional requirement of uniformity is to contend that in exercising its general authority the legislature may ignore the constitutional limitation on that authority. This argument nullifies all constitutional limitations on legislative authority, and is therefore unsound. We are therefore forced to conclude that the legislature, in determining the situs for the taxation of personal property, must regard the constitutional requirement of uniformity, and the disregard of that requirement makes the law under consideration unconstitutional and void. We do not, by our decision, negative relators' claim that it is unjust that their property (which, like much other property similarly located, receives no benefit from the expenditures of municipal tax in Detroit) should contribute toward their payment. Neither do we declare that it is beyond the power of the legislature to enact a law which will remedy this injustice. What we do say is that any such law—unlike that before us—must regard the constitutional requirement of uniformity.

It follows that the lower court was right in refusing a mandamus, and their decision is affirmed, with costs.

where the company's principal office is located. Detroit v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 127 Mich. 604, 86 N. W. 1032.

While railroad movable property has its situs for taxation in general at the principal office of its owner, yet it is competent for the legislature to change this, and to provide for the appraisal and assessment of all railroad property by a state commission, and for the apportionment of the taxable value thereof among the localities through which the line runs, according to the mileage in each. Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Alamance, 84 N. C. 504.

It is perfectly competent for the legislature to say that the rolling stock and machinery of a railroad corporation, which is constantly passing between the termini, shall become part of the road for taxable purposes, and be equally distributed along the line to the counties, cities, and towns according to the length of the road in the respective localities. State ex rel. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. v. Severance, 55 Mo. 378.

Notwithstanding a constitutional provision that the personal property of residents of the state shall be subject to taxation in the counties and cities where they reside for the greater part of the fiscal tax year, and not elsewhere, except goods and chattels permanently located in other places, the legislature may make taxable the rolling stock of domestic railroad corporations elsewhere than at the home or principal office of the railroad company, for the constitutional provision refers only to natural persons having power to change their residences at will, which corporations cannot do. Baltimore, C. & A. R. Co. v. Wicomico County, 93 Md. 113, 48 Atl. 853.

The legislation upon the subject of taxing railroad rolling stock in the state of Illinois has made such property an exception to the general rule that personal property is taxable only at the place where its owner resides, and has required taxes upon it to be paid pro rata in the several counties, towns, and cities through which the road may run. Kennedy v. St. Louis, V. & T. H. R. Co. 62 Ill. 395.

The difficulty of assessing railroad property in separate parcels located in distinct cities and townships is almost insuperable. A railroad cannot be regarded as mere land, like farms or building lots; its value depends upon the whole line as a unit used as a thoroughfare and means of transportation. A separate mile or two of its length is almost valueless by itself. And its rolling stock has no particular location, except a constructive one where the principal office of the railroad is situated, and it would manifestly be unequal to give that place the benefit of taxing the whole of it. Union P. R. Co. v. Cheyenne (Union P. R. Co. v. Ryan) 113 U. S. 516, 28 L. ed. 1098, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 601.

The situs, for the purposes of taxation, of railroad rolling stock, is where it is habitually used, and if its elements, though constantly shifting, be substantially maintained in equal number and value, the average amount used may be made the basis of the tax. Atlantic & P. R. Co. v. Lesueur, 2 Ariz. 428, 1 L. R. A. 244, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 189, 19 Pac. 157.

Vehicles of transportation used constantly and continuously upon a single run acquire a situs for purposes of taxation, independent and irrespective of the domicile of the owner. Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Twombly, 29 Fed. 658.

The Iowa supreme court decided in Davenport v. Mississippi & M. R. Co. 16 Iowa, 349, that railroad rolling stock was not subject to local taxation in the city where the railroad company had its principal office, but its members did not agree upon the reasons for this conclusion. Lowe, J., thought it a part of the road, and not separately taxable; Wright and Dillon, JJ., that it had no situs in the city; and Cole, J., that the legislature had given no authority to the municipality to tax railroad rolling stock.

Afterwards, in Dubuque v. Illinois C. R. Co. 39 Iowa, 56, Beck and Day, JJ., held railroad rolling stock to be personal property with a situs for taxation where the company had its principal office; but Miller, Ch. J., opined that it had no situs at any particular point along the line; while Cole, J., the other member of the court, dissented in toto from his colleagues.

When a state revenue law in one section provides that the personal property of every street railroad shall be listed and assessed in the political subdivision of the state in which is located its principal place of business, and that its track shall be deemed personal property and listed and assessed as such in the place where it is laid; and in other sections that the like property of railroads shall only be assessed by a state board of equalization,—elevated passenger railways organized under the general railroad act, built partly over streets and in part over private lands leased, purchased, or condemned,

b. Water craft.

The general rule is that seagoing vessels and boats navigating interstate waters are only taxable at the domicile of their owners when registered under the Federal navigation laws at the port in the district where that domicile is located, and when they visit other jurisdictions only in the course of trade or for temporary purposes.

A state has no jurisdiction over seagoing vessels for the purposes of taxation, where they are not abiding in the limits so as to become incorporated with other personal property in the state, but are there but temporarily in the course of trade, and where they have no situs at any of its ports by registration and the domicile of their owner. Hays v. Pacific Mail S. S. Co. 17 How. 596, 15 L. ed. 254.

It has no jurisdiction to tax as personal property a vessel which regularly visits its port while carrying on an interstate coasting trade, where it is registered in and owned by a resident of another state, since its situs for the purpose of taxation is in the latter state. Morgan v. Parham, 16 Wall. 471, 21 L. ed. 303.

When ferryboats passing between different states belong to a corporation chartered by one of them, and are registered at a port in that state, the other state cannot tax them. Their situs for taxation is at the domicile of their corporate owner, and the port where they are enrolled in the home state. Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 29 L. ed. 158, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 382, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 826.

For the purposes of taxation, vessels navigating the high seas have their situs at their home ports, where their owners are domiciled, and where they are registered under the laws of the United States, and never at the ports, or within the states, where incidentally and temporarily they touch to land or take aboard passengers and cargoes. Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 18, 35 L. ed. 613, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 595, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 876.

Such vessels are not taxable by states at whose ports they incidentally call to discharge and receive passengers and freight, because they are not in any proper sense abiding within 69 L. R. A.

1901, as existing prior to the revenue act of 1903 (Cobbe's Anno. Stat. 1903, chap. 49), it is made the duty of the tax commissioner or assessor of such city to accept the values of the fractional part of such railroad property situated in the municipality as the same is valued and assessed by the State Board of Equalization, and apportioned to such city in accordance with the provisions of said act.

2. The proportional share of railway property as valued and assessed by the State Board of Equalization belonging to and situated in such city and subject to taxation for municipal purposes may be equalized by the proper authorities of such city by lowering or raising the value of the same, as thus ascertained, so as to bring the limits of such states, and have no continuous presence or actual situs within their jurisdiction; and not at all because they are engaged in foreign or interstate commerce. Ibid.

The decisions of the United States Supreme Court distinctly recognize the right of a state to tax a ship owned by one of its citizens, and having a situs within such state. Wiggins Ferry Co. v. East St. Louis, 107 U. S. 365, 27 L. ed. 410, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 257.

Seagoing vessels are not subject to taxation in a state whose ports they regularly visit in the course of trade, when they are not permanently and continuously, but only temporarily and incidentally, employed in the waters of such state, if they are owned by persons domiciled elsewhere, and are registered at the ports where their owners are domiciled. Registration in a foreign port and nonresident ownership, together, render seagoing vessels primarily and presumptively taxable only at their home port. Johnson v. De Bary-Baya Merchants' Line, 37 Fla. 490, 37 L. R. A. 518, 19 So. 640.

Water craft owned by a Michigan corporation whose principal office has been located in that state pursuant to its incorporation laws, and thus made its domicile, which are registered conformably to the United States navigation laws at the port of Michigan where such domicile is situated, and are engaged in interstate commerce, and not permanently employed anywhere else, are not taxable as personal property in another state whose ports they visit in the course of trade. Yost v. Lake Erie Transp. Co. 50 C. C. A. 511, 112 Fed. 746.

A tugboat enrolled and licensed under the Federal navigation laws, belonging to a non-resident, and upon which he has been taxed at his domicile, is not liable to taxation in a state where it comes for the purposes of trade, Roberts v. Charlevoix, Twp. 60 Mich. 197, 26 N. W. 878. It does not appear from the report of this case where the port was at which the boat was registered,—it could hardly have been in Dakota, the state of the owner's residence; nor does it appear what was the nature and duration of the boat's business in Michigan waters.

A domestic corporation owning ocean-going ships registered at the port in the state of its origin, where it has its principal place of business, and consequently its legal domicile, is, about uniformity of valuation in respect of all property subject to taxation within the municipality.

3. It is competent for the legislature to provide for the valuation and assessment of the property of railway companies such as is required to be listed and scheduled with the auditor of public accounts by §§ 39, 40, chap. 77, art. 1, Comp. Stat. 1901, as heretofore existing, by one assessing body, and for ascertaining the value of the whole of such property of any one railway corporation subject to taxation in this state as a unit or as an entirety, and to distribute the value as thus found over the main line or track of such railway company and to the different taxing districts, municipalities, etc., on a mileage basis.
4. Such a scheme or plan of assessment and taxation of the property of railway companies as therein provided for state, county, and municipal purposes does not violate the provisions of the fundamental law commanding uniformity in the valuation and assessment of property for the purpose of raising needful revenues by the levying of a tax upon all property subject thereto according to its value.

5. The valuation and assessment of the property of a railway company, as therein provided, as an entirety, and the distribution of the value thus ascertained upon a mileage basis over the entire line of such railway, do not operate as a changing of the situs of the property assessed. Its effect is only to distribute the value of an organic whole to the fractional parts situated in the different subordinate taxing districts through which the line extends and in which the property is actually situated, which is a legitimate exercise of legislative power.

when taxed in its home state upon its capital stock at its actual value, subject to assessment upon the value of such ships, notwithstanding they are physically absent and constantly employed in foreign seas. In such a case the subject of taxation is at all times where the corporation is in law and in fact domiciled, and the legal situs for taxation of such ships is in the home port. People ex rel. Pacific Mail S. S. Co. v. Tax Comrs. 1 Hun, 143, Affirmed in 58 N. Y. 243.

The corporation is entitled to no deduction from its assessment of the value of such ships. People ex rel. Pacific Mail S. S. Co. v. Tax Comrs. 5 Hun, 200, Affirmed in 64 N. Y. 541.

A corporation organized to build, own, charter, and navigate ships, whose paid-in capital has been invested, one half in a steamboat, and the other half in transporting it to its permanent location in South America, is properly taxable in the city where it has its principal office, upon the value of its capital stock, without allowance for the permanently absent steamboat beyond the United States. People ex rel. Zulia Steam Nav. Co. v. Tax. & A. Comrs. 51 Hun, 312, 3 N. Y. Supp. 885.

The situs of steamboats navigating waters within and bordering upon different states is that of the home port, which is ascertained by the residence of the owners, and is the port of enrolment and registration. Pelton v. Northern Transp. Co. 37 Ohio St. 450.

Water craft not registered or enrolled, and only temporarily employed at places other than the domicile of their owner, have their situs for taxation as personal property at such domicile, even though never there, when they are not actually shown to be subjected to taxation at places where they are used. Com. v. American Dredging Co. 122 Pa. 380, 1 L. R. A. 237, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 221, 9 Am. St. Rep. 116, 15 Atl. 443.

The statute of the United States (Rev. Stat. § 4141, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 2808) requiring every vessel to be registered by the collector of the port to which she belongs at the time of her registry, and the one nearest the residence of her owner or husband, creates the home port of the enrolled vessel, and gives it an artificial situs which controls the place of taxation, but only when she has no actual situs elsewhere. Old Dominion S. S. Co. v. Virginia, 198 U. S. 299, 40 L. ed. 1059, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 686.

The most potent factor in determining the situs of ships and vessels is the owner's domicile rather than the port of registration, when the two are in different taxing districts.

Ferryboats plying between two states, owned by a corporation of one of them, moored in the home state when not in use, have no situs for taxation in the other state, even when registered at one of its ports because that happens to be the same collection district as the corporate owner's domicile and the nearest port thereto. St. Louis v. Wiggins Ferry Co. 11 Wall. 425, 20 L. ed. 192.

A ferry plying daily between a city and another place where its owner is domiciled, and whence it starts every morning and where it is moored every night, has no situs in such city so as to entitle the city to tax it, and this notwithstanding it is registered at such city as its home port because the owner's domicile is in the same collection district. Mobile v. Baldwin, 57 Ala. 61, 29 Am. Rep. 712.

When the local statute makes personal property having its situs in the county where its owner resides taxable only in the township or town of the owner's domicile, steamboats which ordinarily would be taxable at their home port are, when that port is in another tax district from their owner's domicile, but in the same county, taxable in the district where the domicile is, not that in which the home port is. Pelton v. Northern Transp. Co. 37 Ohio St. 450.

If, however, personal property by the local laws is made subject to taxation in the district of its actual situs, steamboats will be taxable in the districts containing their home ports. Ibid.

In holding boats and vessels belonging to a domestic corporation taxable at the place of the principal office or domicile of the company, in Pelton v. Northern Transp. Co. 37 Ohio St. 450, the Ohio supreme court felt the influence of the actual situs of such boats in Cleveland, but that city was in the same county, although in a different taxing district. The court leans to the opinion that the actual situs of tangible personal property is the controlling factor, as against the domicile of the owner, in determining the place of taxation, unless a statute directs otherwise. It said: In deciding this case we have been guided solely by the statute, without calling to our aid the familiar doctrine of the common law that the situs of personal property follows the domicile of the owner; for we

In the assessment of railway property for taxation as therein provided, it is competent for the legislature to classify such property, and provide for the assessment of the same as personalty, and to fix the situs of the property assessed by providing for the valuation of the property as an entirety and the distribution of the total value to each taxing district, according to the number of miles of main track located therein.

7. Said §§ 39 and 40, as existing prior to their repeal by the revenue act of 1903 (Cobbey's Anno.^o Stat. 1903, chap. 49), are not invalid as taking property by taxation without due process of law.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. T. J. Mahoney, for relators:

The constitutional limitations do not relate merely to state taxation, or to the rate of levy within taxing districts, but they require uniformity of both levy and assessment in each taxing district.

High School Dist. No. 137 v. Lancaster County, 60 Neb. 147, 49 L. R. A. 343, 83 Am. St. Rep. 525, 82 N. W. 380; State ex rel. Cornell v. Poynter, 59 Neb. 417, 81 N. W. 431; State ex rel. Shriver v. Karr, 64 Neb. 514, 90 N. W. 298; State ex rel. Young v. Osborn, 60 Neb. 415, 83 N. W. 357.

When the legislature assumes to make the apportionment according to the num-admit that, if the owner had not resided in Cuyahoga county, the result would have been different. And, on the other hand, if the situs of the property had been in another county, subject to be listed and taxed there under the statute, the residence of the owner in Cuyahoga county would not have given the latter county any right whatever to tax it.

Tugs and barges enrolled in a port of a foreign state in the name of the secretary of a domestic corporation, which is the owner of them and has its domicile in the state which created it, are subject to taxation in the home state of the corporation and in the county of their port of lading, where the corporate owner may be said to reside, and not at their port of enrolment,—especially when not assessed for taxes at the latter place or elsewhere outside of the home state. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Board of Public Works, 97 Va. 23, 32 S. E. 779.

But since the amendments of 1884 to the statutes of the United States, respecting the registration of vessels, shipowners have the option of selecting any one of three places as the home port of their boats, to wit, the port of registry, the port in the same district where the vessel was built, or the port where one or more of the owners reside; and when the home port has been selected and the statutes otherwise complied with, the vessel acquires a situs for the purpose of taxation at that port regardless of the owners' domicile. Com. v. Ayer & L. Tie Co. 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1068, 77 S. W. 686.

Water craft, however, like other tangible personal property, is capable, under some circumstances, of acquiring a situs for taxation in jurisdictions where neither their ports of registration nor their owners' domicils are located. If ships and vessels are so permanently and constantly used within the limits of a single state as to be fairly regarded as incorporated with the general property in that state, they may lawfully be taxed like other tangible property having a physical presence there, regardless of a foreign ownership and registration.

The physical presence within a state of a vessel engaged in coasting trade does not of itself entitle such state to tax it as personal property; neither does its character as a vehicle of commerce exempt it from taxation; but its taxability depends upon its situs, and this is decided by its port of registry and its owner's residence. Morgan v. Parham, 16 Wall. 471, 21 L. ed. 303.

But boats which have a physical situs at a given port, especially when that port is where they are registered under the Federal statutes, are taxable there irrespective of their owner's domicile. St. Louis v. Consolidated Coal Co. 113 Mo. 83, 20 S. W. 699.

And, although vessels belong to a foreign corporation, and are enrolled and registered under the United States statutes in a foreign state, and are also engaged in interstate commerce, yet, if they are permanently and continuously navigating the waters and between the ports of a single state, so that they actually have a situs in such state, they are subject to taxation in such state. Old Dominion S. S. Co. v. Virginia, 198 U. S. 299, 49 L. ed. 1059, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 686.

In Johnson v. De Bary-Baya Merchants' Line, 37 Fla. 499, 37 L. R. A. 518, 19 So. 640, Liddon, J., dissented, taking the ground that the actual situs of seagoing vessels was the controlling factor in determining their taxability, and would prevail over the port registry and domicile of the owner, and that the facts in the case at bar established an actual situs in Florida waters.

In the examination of the question as to whether movable property has acquired a situs at a place not the domicile of the owner, a very obvious distinction must be recognized between vessels engaged in navigating interstate waters and other tangible property having a permanent situs. Apart from the rule that personal property follows its owner, Congress has given vessel property a situs or home port by statutory provisions respecting registration and enrolment, painting the name of the port legibly on the stern, and requiring such port to be at or nearest the owner's domicile. And it is now settled in the Federal courts, and by the weight of opinion in the state courts, that such home port is the only place where registered water craft actually engaged in interstate or foreign commerce is taxable. Yost v. Lake Erie Transp. Co. 50 C. C. A. 511, 112 Fed. 746.

There is said to be an obvious and striking distinction between ships belonging to citizens of one state or to foreigners domiciled at home and which are registered at ports where their owners reside, and which, navigating the high seas or other common waters, only come at the ends of their voyages to the ports of another ber of miles of main line, it necessarily ignores value altogether.

The mandate of the Constitution is, that in every taxing district every owner shall pay a tax in proportion to the value, not the extent, of his property.

The complaints show that the assessments aggregate \$119,210, whereas, if the railroads were assessed upon the same basis as other property within the city of Omaha, they would aggregate \$25,195,410. In other words, while the other property in the city is assessed at its full value, this railroad property is assessed at less than $\frac{1}{4}$ of 1 per cent of its fair value. Such a discrepancy amounts to a release of the railroad companies from the payment of their municipal taxes altogether.

Cooley, Taxn. 3d ed. 259.

The legislature cannot transform a railroad company's real estate into personalty, and shift its location for purposes of taxation.

state to discharge or receive cargoes, in respect of taxation in the latter state; and cars or other vehicles of transportation by land which actually enter and go about in such state and have no registered place of ownership, although both ships and cars are alike engaged in interstate or foreign commerce. Their situs as property is different. Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 18, 35 L. ed. 613, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 596, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 876. But three of the members of the court, Bradley, Field, and Harlan, JJ., were wholly unable to perceive this obvious and striking distinction, and dissented from the judgment of the court sustaining the right of the state of Pennsylvania to tax the palace cars of a foreign corporation running upon the railroads of that state. To contend, said Bradley, J., that there is any difference is to lose sight of the essential qualities of things.

The court, with the same judges dissenting, reached the same conclusion in Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Hayward, 141 U. S. 36, 35 L. ed. 621, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 883.

X. Conclusion.

It is reasonably safe to conclude:

1. That a domestic corporation may be taxed in its home state upon its tangible personal property notwithstanding the physical absence of that property in another state, if the property itself has acquired no actual situs, and is not subject to taxation in the place where it is situated.

2. That a state may tax any and all tangible personal property which has an actual situs within its limits and is a part of the general permanent body of property within its jurisdiction, and not merely in transit through it or temporarily staying therein. And this rule is as applicable to vehicles of commerce, whether ships or railroad cars, as it is to any other species of personal property.

3. That, when a state has the right to tax tangible personal property, or the owner thereof, it may designate the place for the tax to be assessed, whether such be the owner's domicile or the resting place of the taxed property, or not. 69 L. R. A.

Chattanooga v. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. 7 Lea, 561; Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Franklin County, 12 Lea, 521; Davenport v. Mississippi & M. R. Co. 16 Iowa, 348; Dunlieth & D. Bridge Co. v. Dubuque, 32 Iowa, 427; Davenport v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 38 Iowa, 633.

Uniformity in taxing implies equality in the burden of taxation, and this equality of burden cannot exist without uniformity in the mode of assessment as well as in the rate of taxation.

Railroad Tax Cases, 13 Fed. 735; State ex rel. White House School Dist. No. 7 v. Readington Twp. 36 N. J. L. 70; Gilman v. Sheboygan, 2 Black, 510, 17 L. ed. 305; Chattanooga v. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. 7 Lea, 561; Bureau County v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 44 Ill. 229; Franklin County v. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. 12 Lea, 550.

The constitutional validity of the law is to be tested by the fairness of the assessment made under it.

4. That, if no statute fixes the situs of personal property at a particular place for the purpose of taxing it, the domicile of the owner, and that alone, will be the place where it is taxable; and the domicile of a corporation is where its principal office is located.

5. That the place named in the certificate of incorporation as the principal office of the corporation, if the incorporation act under which the company is organized requires such certificate to name the principal office, is always a powerful, and sometimes a determining, factor in fixing the domicile of the corporation for the purposes of taxation. Its potentiality in this respect largely depends upon the wording of the incorporation and taxing statutes, and the identity or synonymy of their language concerning the principal offices of corporations.

6. That, notwithstanding the legal domicile of a corporation is technically in one place, and by the laws of the state it can be lawfully taxed only in that place, a corporation may so conduct itself and its business as to render itself liable to taxation in another place. At least this is the rule in New York.

7. That in the case of steamship and navigation companies the Federal statutes and conformity thereto preponderate in deciding where the corporate domicile and taxable situs of water craft are.

8. That in other cases domicile and situs are determined like any other question of fact. And finally, accepting the latest reported utterances of the United States Supreme Court in the cases of Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 198 U. S. 341, 49 L. ed. 1077, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 689, and Union Refrigerator Transit Co. v. Kentucky, 199 U. S. 194, 50 L. ed.—, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 36, as conclusive authority, that a state has no more power to tax tangible personal property wholly and permanently beyond its boundaries than it has to tax real estate in a foreign state, notwithstanding such personal property belongs to one of its own corporations domiciled within its jurisdiction, provided always such property is subject to taxation locally where it lies.

A person owning a building in a city, worth $5,000, has to pay much more than 100 per cent more taxes to the city for the protection of that building than the railroad company would have to pay for the protection of its depot if valued at the same amount. This is fundamentally wrong.

Messrs. C. C. Wright, Charles J. Green, and John N. Baldwin for respondents.

Holcomb, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is begun in this court in the exercise of its original jurisdiction. The relators pray for a peremptory writ of mandamus to compel the respondents, the city council of Omaha, acting as a board of equalization, to reassemble and hear their complaint relative to the alleged low assessment of certain railroad properties situated within the corporate limits, and to equalize the assessment of such properties by raising the assessed value thereof to conform to the standard of value pertaining to all other property assessed for municipal purposes. The substance of the complaint is that the properties of the railroad companies mentioned in the alternative writ, situated within the city limits, are assessed at but a fraction of their true value, while all other property subject to municipal taxation is assessed at its commercial value. The return of the respondents to the alternative writ discloses that in the assessment for municipal taxation of the railroad properties complained of the assessing officer of the city accepted the valuations placed thereon by the State Board of Equalization and the distributive share thereof apportioned to the city of Omaha as the assessable value of such properties, and that in the equalization thereof the respondents, acting as a board of equalization, raised the assessments five times the value as fixed by the State Board of Equalization and returned by the city tax commissioner, which act of equalization, in the judgment of the board, brought the value of the railroad properties thus assessed to a uniform standard of value with other property assessed for municipal purposes, and exhausted their powers in the premises. Reduced to its narrowest limits, the question presented for consideration by the pleadings and in briefs of counsel is in respect of the method of procedure by the tax commissioner and the city council in the assessment of railroad properties situated in part in such municipality and subject to municipal taxes, and also whether the statute providing for the assessment of railroad property as a unit, and distributing the aggregate value to the different counties, townships, cities, and towns through which the lines run on a mileage basis, is in harmony with the fundamental law. The validity of such legislation is especially called in question when applied to the taxation of railway property in the city of Omaha for municipal purposes.

The legal questions presented, says counsel for relators, are, first, Have the respondents correctly interpreted the statutes and, second, Are the statutes in question valid? The answer to the first question must, we think, be in the affirmative. The old revenue act under which the assessment in question was made, provided for the assessment of railroad property of the character under consideration by one assessing body, viz., the State Board of Equalization, for all purposes of taxation,—state, county, township, school-district, and municipal. This assessing body, the statute declares, shall value and assess the property of railroad corporations at its actual value for each mile of said road or line, the value of each mile to be determined by dividing the sum of the whole valuation by the number of miles of such road or line. It is further provided that after the valuation and assessment is made as aforesaid the state auditor shall certify to the county clerks of the several counties in which the properties of such corporations are situated, or any part thereof, the assessment per mile so made on the property of such corporations, specifying the number of miles and the amount in each of said counties. Comp. Stat. 1901, chap. 77, art. 1, § 40. By § 98, chap. 12a, Comp. Stat. 1901 (Cobbey's Anno. Stat. § 7547), the same being the charter act of cities of the metropolitan class, to which the city of Omaha belongs, it is provided that "the tax commissioner shall take the valuation and assessment of railroad property within the city limits from the returns made by the State Board of Equalization to the county clerk." Assuming, as we do for present purposes, that the legislature may rightfully provide for the assessment of the property of a railway company by one assessing body, and as one property or as a unit, and apportion the value thereof on a mileage basis, then, as we view the subject, it is not only manifest that the legislature intended, but that it is quite appropriate, that the distributive share belonging to any one taxing district should be taken and accepted as the assessable value of that part of the whole property which is situated in such district, and which shall be subject to taxes as all other property therein. There appears to be no fundamental objection to such an assessment. The assessment thus made and returned would, doubtless, be subject to the authority and power of a board of equalization to raise or lower the value so as to comply with the rule of uniformity and conform to values generally obtaining in such taxing district. In all schemes of taxation there are generally recognized elements of inequality and the probability of erroneous valuations in the assessment of property by whatever mode the assessment may be made. The evil is usually remedied by the exercise of the authority of a board created for that purpose, whereby the assessment of different properties is brought to a common standard of value. Different precincts have different assessing officers, and these different officers, we know by common experience, widely differ in their valuation of property of approximately the same value. This difference of opinion and judgment necessitates the establishment of a tribunal having authority and jurisdiction to equalize values and bring all property to a common standard of valuation, to the end that each item and class may bear its just and equitable share of the burdens of taxation. A question somewhat akin to the one under consideration was raised in State ex rel. Prout v. Aitken, 62 Neb. 428, 87 N. W. 153, and the propriety of assessments of railroad properties by the State Board of Equalization and the acceptance of the valuation thus ascertained for purposes of municipal taxation was recognized and sanctioned. In upholding a law providing for such method of assessing railroad property situated in a municipality for municipal purposes, the court, among other things, in the opinion says: "The legislature, in its wisdom, has decided that the value of railroad property can be more accurately and justly estimated by the State Board of Equalization than by local assessors, and 60 L. R. A.

has exercised its constitutional prerogative by providing that railroad property shall be assessed in that manner. Whether or not it is reasonable to suppose that the State Board of Equalization would have more knowledge and a better opportunity to make a just valuation of such property than local assessors is quite unnecessary to be determined in deciding upon respondent's right to act as tax commissioner. Why may not several valuers constitutionally act upon different kinds of property, or upon the same property, for the purpose of different taxes? The real objection to this act on the ground of uniformity is, evidently, the idea that value is not such a fixed quantity that it is possible for two independent appraisers to agree. If values are fixed for purposes of municipal taxation by one body of assessors, and for county and state by another, it is practically certain that the two will disagree. Enough is said above to indicate an opinion that the only uniformity required as to any tax is that it should be uniform throughout the jurisdiction; i. e., that state taxes shall be uniform throughout the state, county taxes throughout the county, and city taxes throughout the city." The result produced by this method of assessment is only that there are different assessing authorities for different kinds of property, each exercising an independent judgment in arriving at the value of the property assessed, and making due return thereof to the proper authorities. The inequalities in values thus returned, if any there be, is a proper subject for consideration by a body or tribunal authorized to discharge the functions of a board of equalization. If it be proper to assess railroad property as a unit, and distribute the total value thereof on a mileage basis, it is obvious that the distributive share going to any one taxing district may be required to be taken as the assessable value and as the basis of valuation for equalization and taxing purposes. The value of such distributive share of the whole property may, it would seem, be raised or lowered by an equalizing board in order that it may be brought to a common standard and conform to the values placed on all other property. This, as we understand the record, is what was done by the respondents in the case at bar, and, if so, is, we think, in harmony with legislative intentment. It is the business of such boards, says this court in State ex rel. Breckenridge v. Fleming (Neb.) 97 N. W. 1063, "to fairly and impartially equalize the valuation of all personal property assessed in their respective jurisdictions, and to raise or lower the same as the justice and equity of the case may require. Whatever directions the law may give to the assessor in valuing the property in the first instance, and whatever result these directions may produce in the assessment of franchises or other property of the taxpayer, the work of the board of equalization is to equalize the valuations made so that everyone, as nearly as that may be attained, shall stand upon an equal footing, and pay an equal proportion of the tax laid according to the real value of his property.

. . . In this way equity is attained, and every interest protected." It is manifest that the legislative plan for the assessment of railroad property situated in a municipality, for municipal purposes, has been followed by the city authorities in the case at bar, and that the interpretation given to these several provisions of the statute by the respondents as to their authority and power is in harmony with the expressed will of the legislature.

The very able and helpful arguments and briefs of counsel on both sides of the controversy are devoted almost exclusively to the second question presented,—that is, the alleged invalidity of the statutes providing for the assessment of the property of a railroad company as a unit, and the distribution of the value of the whole on a mileage basis by one assessing body for all purposes of taxation,—and it is to this phase of the case that we have given the fullest consideration and most thorough research at our command. It is the contention of counsel for relators that the provisions of the fundamental law governing taxation are violated in the assessment of railroad property for municipal purposes by the plan adopted and prescribed by the legislature. It is argued that railroad properties of great value located within the corporate limits of the city of Omaha pay taxes on but an insignificant part of the true value; that these properties escape a large share of municipal taxes for which they should be justly burdened and made to contribute to the revenues of the city in return for the protection received in the administration of the affairs of the municipality in which they are situated. Counsel says that here are located costly depots and terminal facilities, including real estate of vast value occupied for such purposes, which ought to respond to municipal taxation according to such values, to be ascertained with reference to the actual location of such properties as if separate and independent properties, and without regard to their relation to and connection with the entire lines of railway of which they form a part. The right and power of the legislature to provide a scheme of taxation for municipal purposes by an assessment of railway property as an entirety and the distribution of the aggregate value on a mileage basis is boldly challenged, and we are asked to so construe the constitutional provisions relating to the subject as inhibiting such a plan and method of taxation of such properties for municipal purposes. "Our complaint," says counsel, "is not that the legislature has provided a different method of assessing railroad property from that provided for assessing other property, but rather that, under the statutes relied upon by respondents, a result is obtained which violates the constitutional requirement of uniformity." If, it is said, the legislature had provided for assessing the property of railroads extending into more than one county by determining the value of the railroad as a whole, and then apportioning such value to the several tax districts in proportion to the real values in the several districts, rather than in proportion to the number of miles of main line, such a method would at least be theoretically correct; but that, when the apportionment of the total value is according to the number of miles of main line in any one taxing district, there is an ignoring of the question of value altogether. The mandate of the Constitution, it is insisted, is imperative that in every taxing district every owner shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of the property in the district, and not the extent of it. The constitutional provisions principally relied on by relators in support of their contention are found in § 1 of article 9, which declares that revenues are to be raised by levying a tax by valuation so that every taxpayer shall pay in the proportion to the value of his, her, or its property subject to taxation, the value to be ascertained in such manner as the legislature shall direct. The necessity for uniformity and equality in taxation is emphatically expressed in State ex rel. Young v. Osborn, 60 Neb. 415, 83 N. W. 357, wherein it is said: "And this rule of uniformity applies not only to the rate of taxation, but as well to the valuation of property for the purposes of raising revenue. . . . The Constitution forbids any discrimination whatever among taxpayers. . . . Thus, if the property of one citizen is valued for taxation at one fourth its value, others within the taxing district have the right to demand that their property be assessed on the same basis. The rule of uniformity is satisfied if observed by each jurisdiction imposing the tax." To the same effect is High School Dist. No. 137 v. Lancaster County, 60 Neb. 147, 49 L. R. A. 343, 83 Am. St. Rep. 525, 82 N. W. 380. See also State ex rel. Cornell v. Poynter, 59 Neb. 417, 81 N. W. 431, and State ex rel. Shriver v. Karr, 64 Neb. 514, 90 N. W. 298.

By § 6 of article 9 of the Constitution it is provided that for corporate purposes all municipal corporations may be vested with authority to assess and collect taxes, but such taxes shall be uniform with respect to persons and property within the jurisdiction of the body imposing the same. The requirements of uniformity in the assessment of property for municipal purposes generally is doubtless the same, and as obligatory under the provisions of § 6 of article 9 as that required by the provisions of § 1 of the same article; and it is so held in State ex rel. Bee Bldg. Co. v. Savage, 65 Neb. 714, 91 N. W. 716. The construction given to the 1st section in the several decisions of this court which we have cited apply with equal pertinency and force to those of § 6. Uniformity with respect to person and property requires that the tax rate must be the same as to all persons affected, and the valuation of the property must be upon the same basis throughout the entire taxing jurisdiction. A departure either as to rate of levy or as to the standard of valuation of the different properties subject to taxation would violate the rule of uniformity demanded by the Constitution, and render ineffectual legislation authorizing such a method of procedure in the levying and collection of municipal taxes. It is equally clear that, if property within a municipality having a fixed legal situs therein was, by a scheme or plan of assessment, to escape in whole or in part municipal taxes upon a valuation in substantial conformity with all other property within the taxing district, this would be a violation of the provisions of said § 6. May the legislature, without infringing on these provisions of the fundamental law, provide for the assessment of the property of railway companies such as is required to be included in the schedules to be returned to the state assessing board upon the unit plan or system, and distribute the value of the whole property along the line of the road thus assessed, and to the different tax districts, on a mileage basis? It is earnestly contended by the relators that the several railroad companies having lines in the city of Omaha have valuable terminal facilities, depots, and other properties on their right of way and side tracks which have a fixed and actual physical situs, and as such are subject to local taxation upon such values, and that the distribution of the total value of any one road over the entire line on a mileage basis is to withdraw from taxation for municipal purposes property situated within the municipality, thereby resulting in a violation of the provision of the Constitution that all property shall bear its just share of tax burdens of 69 L. R. A.

the taxing jurisdiction in which it is situated. In a sense it is no doubt true that the properties of the large railway corporations doing business in this state with extensive terminal facilities, switching yards, depot grounds, and costly structures in the large cities and towns are much more valuable, mile for mile, than a corresponding length of the roadbed and right of way situated outside of such municipalities, consisting usually of but a single track and roadbed and the right of way of from 100 to 200 feet in width. In a legal sense, however, must it be said that the property thus situated is so localized that its situs for the purpose of taxation must be the same as where physically situated, and that any attempt to throw it with the whole mass of property with which it is connected, and of which it forms a part, and assess it as an entirety, and distribute the value on a mileage basis, contravenes the fundamental law?

We may assume that all the lines of railway in this state have been by the State Board of Equalization assessed at a valuation uniform with the values placed on all other property assessed for revenue purposes, and that the total value of each of such lines of railway has been distributed to the different counties, townships, school and road districts, cities, and towns through which such lines extend according to the length of the line in each division for whose benefit taxes are levied. If those portions of the road lying in the city of Omaha are to be valued at a larger sum per mile than other portions of the same line, then it follows that there must be a corresponding reduction of the amount apportioned to the remainder of the line, or else an overvaluation and double taxation would be the result, and this would violate the rule of uniformity the same as does undervaluation. The legislative plan contemplates a full valuation of all property of a railway line subject to taxation in this state, and the distribution of that value equally over each mile of the line, and with equal benefit to every taxing district through which it extends. The relators contend for a method of taxation that recognizes differences of value of different parts of the same line, a localization of such property for taxation, and an apportionment of values accordingly as necessary to meet the demands of the constitutional requirement of uniformity. It is not for us to say that the method adopted by the legislature is the most approved, and comes nearest reaching an ideal state in the levying and collection of the public revenues. Yet it is quite true that this plan has been warmly commended by courts of last resort of many of the states and of the United States as best calculated to more nearly approach perfect uniformity than any other plan that has heretofore been devised. It may be, and possibly is, true that legislative provisions might be enacted in the interest of more just and equitable taxation that would allow some latitude on the part of an assessing body clothed with the power to value and assess railway property to vary the value of different parts of a railway line in the distribution of the value of the whole to conform to the improvements made and character of the property assessed in the different localities through which the right of way and roadbed extends. It is, however, for us to determine only as best we may whether the plan of valuing and assessing railway property as adopted by the legislature is in conflict with fundamental law. The courts have generally recognized that upon legal principles and as a practical question the properties of a railroad company, because of their peculiar character, can best be assessed by one assessing body, and cannot with any degree of satisfaction be left with local assessing officers. The wisdom and necessity for a taxing body having authority and jurisdiction over the territory covered by all the property of a railroad company, and with power to assess the whole of such property, and to fix values which would be uniform over the different lines of railroads to be assessed, seems so apparent that argument can scarcely add anything. At least, the wisdom and experience of those having to do with the subject of taxation have in very many of the states of the Union brought about plans for the assessment of properties of this character by one assessing body, and this method is now quite generally resorted to as the best solution of a difficult problem of railroad taxation. As to those properties which have no fixed situs, such as the rolling stock, franchises, and other intangible property, it is difficult to conceive of any more just or equitable scheme or plan than to find the value of the whole and distribute the same throughout the different taxing jurisdictions according to the distance of the line of road situated in each district for whose benefit taxes are levied. In a measure, this same principle, it is manifest, obtains in respect of the line of a railroad, including all properties necessary and used in its operation in the accomplishment of the objects of its incorporation. Carried to its logical conclusion, the contention of the relators would require the assessment of every fractional part of a railroad within any taxing district as separate and independent property, the aggregate of these several values representing the value of the entire property within the state. No two miles of a railway system, if regard be had solely to the real estate composing the roadbed and right of way, the cost of construction, and the value of the superstructures and buildings thereon necessary for the operation of the road, would be exactly the same. Each taxing district would have located therein property of a value peculiar to itself and to no other, and, if the rule of uniformity be observed, an assessment must be made of such property according to its value as thus localized. Must all railway property be thus localized for the purposes of taxation? The assessment of the property, which is the subject of the present controversy, and the validity of which is challenged, was made by the State Board of Equalization under the old revenue act (Comp. Stat. 1901, chap. 77, art. 1). The provisions assailed are found in §§ 39 and 40 of the act. The provisions of the new revenue act (Cobbe's Anno. Stat. 1903, §§ 10,484, 10,485, and 10,486) in regard to the questions herein being considered are believed to be in all material respects the same as the provisions of the old law. By § 39, art. 1, chap. 77, Comp. Stat. 1901, it is made the duty of certain officers of every railroad company doing business in this state and having property therein subject to taxation to file schedules under oath of the property of such company with the state auditor at a time as therein stated. The schedule is required to disclose the number of miles of such railroad in each organized county, and the total number of miles in the state, including the roadbed, right of way, superstructures thereon main and side tracks, depot buildings and depot grounds, section and tool houses, rolling stock, and personal property necessary for the construction, repairs, or successful operation of such railroad lines; "provided, however," says the statute, "that all machine and repair shops, general office buildings, store houses, and also all real and personal property, outside of said right of way and depot grounds as aforesaid, of and belonging to any such railroad and telegraph companies, shall be listed for purposes of taxation by the principal officers or agents of such companies, with the precinct assessors of any precinct of the county where such real or personal property may be situated, in the manner provided by law for the listing and valuation of real and personal property." By the succeeding section authority is given to the State Board of Equalization to value and assess all property required to be listed and returned to the auditor of public accounts at its actual value for each mile of said road or line, the value of each mile to be determined by dividing the sum of the whole valuation by the number of miles of such road or line. It is also made the duty of the auditor to certify to the county clerks of the several counties in which the property of the corporation or any part thereof may be situated the assessment per mile so made on the property of such corporation, specifying the number of miles and amount in each of such counties. The value of the whole, when ascertained, is by this method apportioned to the several counties, townships, cities, and villages and other subdivisions through which such railway line extends according to the number of miles of railroad situated in such subdivision. It is further declared that all such property shall, for the purpose of taxation, be deemed "personal property," and placed on the tax lists as thereafter provided. It will be observed that in the assessment of railroad property under this statute no property located off the right of way is assessed by the state board, and that there are certain exceptions as to property, which is specified, which is situated on the right of way. It is only the lines of railways, including superstructures, appurtenances, and property on the right of way necessary to the successful operation of the road, and the rolling stock and franchises, that are required to be assessed by the state board as a unit.

In Adams County v. Kansas City & O. R. Co. (Neb.) 99 N. W. 245, this court had occasion to construe the language of the proviso found in § 39, and it is there held that the phrase "outside of said right of way," etc., qualifies only the word "property" immediately preceding it, and not the specific terms used in the enumeration of other property therein. Accepting this as a correct construction, as we do, and keeping in view the entire act relating to the subject, it becomes obvious that the legislative intentment was to enlarge the situs of the property of a railway company necessary for and used in the construction of its lines and the prosecution of its business so as to cover the entire line of its roadbed and right of way. All of this property is so intimately related to each of the different parts, and so connected together, that it is, it seems, appropriate and legal to so treat and regard it when fixing its value for assessment purposes and apportioning the value to the different tax districts through which the road extends. A clear understanding of the character of the property of a railway company, which the statute requires to be valued and assessed as a unit and the value distributed on a mileage basis, is necessary to an intelligent understanding and application of the principles underlying the taxation of this species of property and of the decisions of the courts of other states relating to the subject. The supreme court of Tennessee, in the cases of Chattanooga v. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. 7 Lea, 561, and Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Franklin County, 12 Lea, 521, by its opinions therein comes nearest supporting the contention of counsel for relators, and yet these cases are, we think, clearly distinguishable, and are not authority of a decisive character in the determination of the questions as presented in the case at bar. In the first case cited all the property of whatever description, and wherever situated, was, for the purpose of taxation under the statute, being considered to be thrown together as a unit or as one property, valued as a whole, and the value distributed on a mileage basis. In the latter decision of that court judicial sanction is given to the validity of an assessing statute very similar to the one under consideration, except that it was held that depots have a local situs, and should be assessed accordingly. But the reasoning by which this conclusion is reached, as counsel well says, is somewhat bewildering. In a discussion of the character of railroad property required to be assessed by the State Board of Equalization and the reasons for legislation providing for the assessment of such property as a unit, the total value thereof to be distributed on a mileage basis, this court has expressed itself in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Richardson County, 61 Neb. 519, 85 N. W. 532, as follows: "The common-sense view of the subject would seem to be that such purpose was to enable the proper authorities to distribute the avails of such taxation equitably among all the municipal subdivisions through which a road may pass in the ratio which the number of miles within each subdivision bears to the total number of miles of road within the state, treating each mile as equal in value to every other mile, and regardless of whence came the power under which any particular portion of the road is constructed. A railroad might have vast terminals at one point, worth as much as the remainder of the line, though it extended through a dozen counties. The subdivision in which these terminals are located is not, under this law, permitted to reap an advantage over other localities, by reason of the mere accident of location, but must share its advantages with these others pro rata. That evidently is the reason behind and under this legislation. How a franchise has been acquired, or whether a particular portion of a line is more expensive to construct than others, is unimportant in determining whether the property should be taxed locally or otherwise. As a matter of fact, this inequality of value was the principal motive for the legislation, which sought to obviate the evils attendant upon such a state of facts. Without such inequality, no legislation would have been necessary, the general laws being in that event adequate for the purpose." While the constitutionality of the statute was not directly involved, the discussion of the subject is valuable as showing the reasons for treating and assessing railroad property as a unit, and the difficulty of separating it into fractional parts, each piece, for the purpose of assessment, to be localized, and treated as a specific item of property having a value independent of the other portions of the whole. In Cooley on Taxation, 3d ed. vol. 1, p. 693, it is observed by the eminent author: "The property of railroad and canal companies constitutes a legitimate class of property for the purposes of taxation; a class which, in order to treat it fairly in the matter of taxation, must be treated separately. Indeed, the difficulties of assessing, in the same way that property in general is assessed, lines of railroad extending through many municipalities, are so great and so obvious that in many states it is not attempted, and a franchise tax is imposed as a substitute for all other taxation. But in other states a railroad is listed, assessed, and valued as an entirety, and the value is then apportioned for taxation among the several municipalities by some standard prescribed by law, which generally is the length of line within the municipalities respectively. There is no constitutional objection to that method of taxing this species of property, and it is perhaps more just than any other."

The supreme court of Colorado, in the case of Ames v. People, 26 Colo. 83, 56 Pac. 656, in passing upon a controversy identical in principle with one in the case at bar, upholds the validity of statutory enactments providing for one body to value and assess all the property of a railway company as a unit, and to distribute the value upon a mileage basis. The constitutional provisions as to uniformity in that state, while not the same, are substantially so in principle, and the necessity for equality of taxation is recognized in the decision rendered. In the opinion it is said: "In the method of laying a tax, either as to the assessment or the apportionment, the general assembly is not restricted by the Constitution; and, unless the legislation is palpably unjust, oppressive, or inadequate, courts will not substitute their judgment for that of the legislature. Many tribunals of final resort, including the Supreme Court of the United States and our own court, as will be seen from the cases already cited, have held that the method of ascertaining and distributing values of railroad property like that prescribed in the statute under consideration, if not the only rational one, is at least the best and fairest thus far invented." And further on in the same opinion the court treats the subject in the following manner: "It follows that, in order to secure a just valuation for taxation of this class of property, all of it that is used for the convenient and proper operation of the railway may be assessed as a unit, and the valuation thus ascertained may be apportioned to the various taxing districts upon a mileage basis. Indeed, construing, as we should, §§ 3 and 10 together, such of the property of a railroad company, real and personal, as is used for the convenient and proper operation of its railway, can properly only be assessed and apportioned for taxation as a unit; and the apportionment upon a mileage basis, as this act prescribes, will come as near to doing exact justice as it is possible to do. . . . This method of apportionment, in our judgment, gives to each local taxing district its just proportion of tax; that is to say, each taxing district gets for purposes of taxation the just valuation of the property physically situate within its territorial limits, for the value of property situate therein cannot be made to depend upon its so-called natural situs, entirely disassociated from the use made of it. But that value in great measure depends upon its connection with every other part of the corporation property so used, and situate in every other taxing district in which any part of its railroad lies, considered always in connection with the character of the use made of it. Thus the command of the Constitution is obeyed, and in fact to each taxing district is given a fair valuation of the railroad property within its territorial limits; and that is all the section requires." Says the supreme court of Michigan: "The propriety of treating aggregations of property as a unit is as natural and proper for the purposes of assessment as for sale, and this is especially so, where the various articles are so essential to the purpose for which they are combined that the withdrawal of one or any class would destroy, or substantially impair, the use of all for the purposes to which in their new form they are adapted." Detroit Citizens' Street R. Co. v. Detroit, 125 Mich. 673, 84 Am. St. Rep. 589, 85 N. W. 96, 86 N. W. 809. In People ex rel. Chicago v. State Board, 205 Ill. 296, 68 N. E. 943, it is said: "The right of way of a railroad company cannot be cut up, for the purposes of assessment, into parts, either by dividing it into sections by the lines of the different taxing bodies which it crosses, or by severing from its main track the portions that lie outside of some arbitrary line drawn through the center of the right of way. A railroad is a unit, and for the purposes of assessment its right of way must be treated as a whole. The switch or side track at which it receives coal, grain, stock, or freight in a country village is as essential to the successful operation of the road as is the switch or side track in the city at which the articles which it handles as a common carrier are discharged; and the land upon which its side or second track and turnouts, and its station, machine shops, roundhouses, etc., stand, is as necessary to the successful operation of the road and as much a part of its right of way as the land upon which its main track is laid; and the value of each piece of its right of way must be determined by taking into consideration the value of the entire right of way, rather than the value of each piece for commercial purposes wholly disconnected from the use to which it has been applied, as compared with contiguous property used for purposes other than right of way." Many other authorities could be cited, but the foregoing give a very accurate idea of the trend of judicial opinions regarding the propriety and legality of this method of assessing the property of railway companies. The principles justifying the assessment of railroad properties as a unit, and distributing the value on a mileage basis to the different tax districts through which the railway line or track extends, seem to be that in fact and in legal contemplation for the purpose of assessment, use, and sale such property may rightfully be regarded as a physical whole or one entire property extending over the whole line of the railway, the value of which depends not on any separate or fractional part, but upon the whole of the property as an entirety.

The fundamental idea underlying the relators' contention as to the proper method of local taxation of these properties is that the fractional parts of the different railway companies located in the city of Omaha consisting of the depot grounds, main track, and side tracks, and the structures thereon, have a fixed and natural situs, and that they are of themselves of special value greatly in excess of other portions of equal length of the lines of which they are parts, and that such values are separable from the remainder; and therefore, to meet the requirements of the Constitution as to uniformity, and to the end that all property shall bear its just proportion of the burdens of taxation in the district where it is situated, these properties should be localized in the taxing district in which they are physically situated, and assessed upon their separate values for municipal purposes. Of course, if we assume that such properties have a legal situs and an ascertainable value of themselves within the limits of the municipality, separate and apart from the remainder of the line, and are possessed of a greatly enhanced value over other portions of the main track of equal extent, the contention of relators is conceded, and there is left no room for discussion or argument.

The principle underlying the legislation complained of undoubtedly is that every portion of the property of a railway company going to make up the whole is interdependent, and that the situs must be determined with respect to the entire property, and not any fractional portion of it. The legislature has fixed, or undertaken to fix, the legal situs of a railroad where the organic structure is, in all the counties and subordinate districts through which the road is constructed, and has provided for the apportionment of a share of the total value to each taxing district in proportion to the length of the main track in such district, upon which taxes are to be levied for all purposes. It is the fractional proportion of the whole distributed to any one taxing district that represents the taxable property of such railway line in such district, rather than the physical property found therein. This method does not effectuate a moving about of property having a fixed place of location,—a change of situs,—but amounts only to the valuing of the whole as a unit, and the distribution of the total value along the line and throughout the extent of the physical property on what is regarded as a fair, just, and equitable basis. The nature and characteristics of the property are such as to render it incapable of division into fragmentary parts and the valuing of each of such parts for assessment purposes as though it were a separate and distinct item of property having a location in a particular taxing jurisdiction. These properties have no market value when considered in fractional parts. Railroad properties are bought and sold as an entirety. The real estate on which the right of way is located cannot be valued in a commercial sense as so many acres, or as lots and blocks, since its value in such cases is determined in a large measure by reason of the use to which it is put, and the improvements thereon, and then only in connection with the other property of which it forms a part. The legislature has declared that the property of railroad companies required to be valued and assessed by the State Board of Equalization should, for the purposes of levying and collecting taxes, be regarded as personal property. If this legislative declaration is to be given force, then the right to enact and the validity of the enactment providing for a distributive valuation on a mileage basis would necessarily follow. There will, we apprehend, be no serious contention against the power of the legislature to, by rule of law, fix the situs of all such property (if it may be regarded as personality) for purposes of taxation. In Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Labette County, 9 Kan. App. 545, 59 Pac. 383, the Kansas court of appeals says: "Under § 6873, Gen. Stat. 1889, . . . all property used or held by a railway company for the purpose of operating its railroad, including its roadbed, right of way, etc., is to be appraised and assessed as personal property. The statute declaring such property personal property for the purposes of assessing a tax against it, it follows that such tax must be collected as a tax upon personal property. . . . The legislature had the power to enact the statute declaring the right of way, roadbed, and other property held or used in the operation of the railroad to be personal property for the purposes of taxation." In Ames v. People, 26 Colo. 83, 56 Pac. 656, the court says: "The whole argument, however, is based upon the proposition that the property is assessed not where it is physically situated, but all along the main track, each municipal corporation being given for taxation a value dependent, not upon the actual value of the property therein physically located, but only such value of the entire property of the corporation as the length of the main track in the municipality bears to the total length of the line. This method of distribution is said to be contrary to the rule that property must be taxed at its actual situs. But it is settled by a long line of decisions that this rule is merely the law of the state that recognizes it; hence, being a matter of legislation, it is entirely competent for the legislature, unless restrained by the Constitution, to fix, for the purposes of taxation, the situs of both real and personal property." The Arkansas supreme court, regarding a similar question, states the principle as follows: "The nature of the property justifies classification and separation from the body of the real estate upon the grounds that justify the separate classification of realty and personality. The requirement of an annual assessment of railways affords, therefore, no greater cause for complaint than does the like requirement for personal property, 49 L. R. A.

and the complaint of discrimination is groundless." St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Worthen, 52 Ark. 529, 7 L. R. A. 374, 13 S. W. 254. The Supreme Court of the United States, in Columbus Southern R. Co. v. Wright, 151 U. S. 470, 38 L. ed. 238, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 396, has said: "The roadway itself of a railroad depends for its value upon the traffic of the company, and not merely upon the narrow strip of land appropriated for the use of the road and the bars and cross-ties thereon. The value of the roadway at any given time is not the original cost, nor, a fortiori, its ultimate cost after years of expenditure in repairs and improvements. On the other hand, its value cannot be determined by ascertaining the value of the land included in the roadway assessed at the market price of adjacent lands and adding the value of the cross-ties, rails, and spikes. The value of land depends largely upon the use to which it can be put and the character of the improvements upon it. The assessable value, for taxation, of a railroad track, can only be determined by looking at the elements on which the financial condition of the company depends, its traffic, as evidenced by the rolling stock and gross earnings, in connection with its capital stock. No local estimate of the fraction in one county of a railroad track running through several counties can be based upon sufficient data to make it at all reliable, unless, indeed, the local assessors are furnished with the means of estimating the whole road." Again, it is said by the supreme court of Wisconsin in State ex rel. Milwaukee Street R. Co. v. Anderson, 90 Wis. 550, 63 N. W. 746: "The utter impracticability, not to say impossibility, of treating it as real estate for the purposes of taxation, is illustrated not only from the results that might follow tax sales, but in attempting to assess it as such under the provision that 'all real property not expressly exempt from taxation shall be entered upon the assessment roll in the assessment district where it lies,' . . . and is well illustrated by the present case, where the property claimed to be real estate has a physical location in twenty-one assessment districts. How could it be entered on the rolls by lots and blocks, or by reference to plat or deed, or how, otherwise, under §§1045 and 1046 [Rev. Stat. 1878]? It is part on and part in the soil and part in the air. How are the twenty-one assessors to assess and value the tracks, ties, poles, trolley wires, etc., with certainty, and in an intelligible manner, in so many parcels? And are the twenty-one assessments to be followed by as many separate taxes and tax sales in case of nonpayment? It seems to us entirely clear that this property cannot be regarded as real estate for the purposes of taxation, and that it is not the 'land' and 'real property' described in these sections for assessment and taxation; and, as already stated, it seems perfectly plain from the statute . . . that this property is required by law to be assessed and taxed. . . . In view of the use made of the specific lots upon which the power houses are situated, and upon a fair construction of the statute, and with a view to carry out its evident meaning, we hold that such real estate, thus devoted to such uses, is not the real property required by § 1039 [Rev. Stat. 1878] to be 'entered upon the assessment roll in the assessment district where it lies;' it having acquired a peculiar character in the law by reason of having become a part of the entirety of a property, subject only to assessment and taxation as an entirety in the assessment district where the corporation owning it has its principal office and place of business." We are satisfied upon principle and authorities cited that the legislature has not exceeded its powers in providing, as it has done, for the assessment of the property of a railway company as a unit, and the distribution of the value thus ascertained over the entire line of the railway assessed, and to the different tax districts and municipalities in to which the roadbed or right of way extends on a mileage basis; that when the values are thus ascertained and apportioned, and the distributive share assigned to any one district or municipality, such proportionate share legally represents the value of the fractional part of the entire property situated in such district or municipality for the purposes of municipal taxation, and that the fundamental law as to uniformity is not violated by such a scheme of assessment and distribution of values of the entire property.

It is also contended that the sections of the statute providing for an assessment of railway property by the State Board of Equalization is void because of the alleged deprivation of property by taxation without due process of law, in that no sufficient notice is given of the meeting of the State Board of Equalization when assessing such property. This question has been under consideration for some time, and is disposed of in an opinion in the case of Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Richardson County (Neb.) 100 N. W. 950. On the authority of that decision these sections in respect of the objection urged against them, of which we have just made mention, must be held valid. The constitutionality of these sections is also upheld in that opinion as to other objections herein discussed.

The application for a peremptory writ of mandamus should be denied, which is accordingly done.

R. D. FRY.

(.....Okla.....)

When surface waters by natural drainage collect in a natural basin or depression upon the premises of a dominant tenement, and escape therefrom only by percolation or evaporation, forming thereby a lake or pond, permanent in its character, the waters so collected and coming to rest lose the character of surface water, and may not by artificial means, other than that incident to the cultivation of the soil, be drained to the damage of a servient tenement, without liability in damages for such act.

ERROR to the District Court for Blaine County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged unlawful casting of surface water upon plaintiff's property. Affirmed.

Statement by Gillette, J.:

This action was originally commenced in the probate court of Blaine county, and, after trial and judgment therein, appealed to the district court. It appears from the pleadings in the case that at the time of commencing the action the plaintiff was the lessee of the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 17, township 16, range 11, Blaine county, Okl. T., and at the time of the injury complained of had growing thereon a crop of corn. The defendant, Alice Davis, was the owner of the southwest quarter of section 8, township 16, range 11, upon which there was a depression which at various times in the year contained more or less water as the result of drainage of surrounding lands, making a lake or pond of some 10 or 15 acres, which was retained there by the natural conformation of the land until absorbed or evaporated; that the defendant caused a ditch to be excavated of such depth and extent as to drain said depression and cause the water accumulating there to immediately flow off through such drain, which it did at the time complained of, and over and onto the premises of plaintiff, destroying his crop there growing, and for which he asked judgment in damages. The case was tried to the court without a jury, at the conclusion of which trial the defendant requested special findings of fact by the court, which were accordingly made as follows:

"In the District Court of Blaine County, Oklahoma Territory, November Term, 1902. R. D. Fry, Plaintiff, v. Alice Davis, Defendant. Findings of the Court.

"Now on this 4th day of December, 1902, the court, after hearing the evidence, argument of counsel, and being fully advised in the premises, and after a personal inspection of the premises by the judge, as per request of parties, finds the following facts:

"(1) That the plaintiff, R. D. Fry, as the renter, was in possession of the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 17, township 16, range 11, Blaine county, Oklahoma Territory, and in the lawful and peaceable possession thereof.

"(2) That in the spring of 1901 plaintiff plowed, prepared, and planted said land to corn.

"(3) That until and on the 12th day of May, 1901, said crop was in a good and prosperous condition.

"(4) That plaintiff, under his lease, was to pay as rent for said land one third of said crop, and that plaintiff had a two-thirds interest in said crop.

"(5) That on the 12th day of May, 1901, prior thereto, and ever since, the defendant, Alice Davis, was and is the owner of the southwest quarter of section 8, township 16, range 11, in said county.

"(6) That in the spring of 1901, and while the defendant was the owner and in possession of said southwest quarter of section 8, township 16, range 11, the defendant caused to be dug a ditch from a large pond located on her land, across and over her said lands, and into the public highway between the land of defendant and the land of plaintiff, upon which plaintiff's crop was growing.

"(7) That said pond on defendant's land had and has no natural outlet, and at various times of the year is filled with water from a large area of surrounding country, leaving a large body of water in said lake, from one to two and a half feet deep, and covering about fifteen acres.

"(8) That said ditch was cut by the defendant for the purpose of draining the water from said pond.

"(9) That the defendant, by the cutting of said ditch, turned all the water in said pond into and through said ditch, over and across the highway, and upon the land leased by plaintiff, and upon which his crop of corn was cultivated and growing, caused the same to be inundated and covered with water to the depth of several inches, and thereby destroyed a portion of plaintiff's crop of corn, to the amount of about fifteen acres.

"(10) That the water remained on said land, and continued to run through said ditch from said pond, until stopped by the order of injunction of this court.

"(11) That said ditch is about fifty rods long, commencing upon defendant's land from said pond, over and across defendant's line, and across the south line thereof, and to within forty-eight feet of plaintiff's corn ground.

"(12) That said ditch was cut through a hill from two and a half to three feet higher than the bottom of said pond.

"(13) That said ditch was not cut over a natural outlet from said pond.

"(14) That said pond is filled from the drainage of the surface water from the surrounding lands, and the water stands and remains until the same evaporates and sinks away in the ground.

"(15) That there was no considerable body of water in said pond when said defendant caused the ditch to be dug.

"(16) That said ditch did not fill with water until May 12, 1901, and that the same filled at that time as the result of a heavy rain and hail storm.

"(17) There were no ditches or other artificial means used to control or collect the water that was gathered in the pond thereon by defendant.

"(18) That said pond was not fed or supplied by any spring, streams, swamps, or lakes, but only by rain, hail, and snow falling on the surrounding lands, which was conducted into the said pond by the natural surface of the country surrounding it.

"(19) The grass growing in said pond is what is commonly known as 'pond grass,' of no value for pasturage, and the land covered thereby is what is commonly known as 'gumbo' or 'hardpan,' and of no value for cultivation of crops or tillage.

"(20) The said ditch was from two and a half to three feet wide at the top, and from eighteen inches to two feet at the bottom, and was filled with water flowing from said pond from the evening of May 12th until stopped by the order of injunction of this court.

"(21) That plaintiff, while said ditch was being constructed, warned the defendant of the danger of damage to him, and on the 17th day of May, 1901, secured an order of injunction from this court, preventing defendant from maintaining said ditch, causing the same to be closed.

"(22) That said ditch has not been open since.

"(23) That the hail and rains of May 17, 1901, and subsequent thereto, fell upon plaintiff's corn crop to about the same degree as that which fell upon defendant's land, and that said rain and hail was damaging to vegetation, and that at said time plaintiff's corn, being very young, and where not drowned by the water flowing from said ditch, soon recovered, and yielded about 26 bushels of corn per acre.

"(24) That the tract of land upon which plaintiff's corn was growing is smooth, slightly sloping to the east, and not subject to overflow from natural causes, and the crops thereon had not been damaged in years previous and subsequent to that of 1901, except, possibly, in a small buffalo wallow thereon.

"(25) That water that collected on plaintiff's corn had only partially run off and sunk down by Sunday, May 19, 1901, and after the ditch was dammed on May 17, 1901.

"(26) The rains of Sunday evening and Monday, May 19 and 20, 1901, by reason of the water then standing in plaintiff's corn land, again caused plaintiff's corn to be covered and flooded with water.

"(27) The damage to plaintiff's corn was caused by the flow of water from said ditch, and as a result thereof, and not from any other water thereon from other directions, as a natural result of downfall of rain and hail, had not said ditch been constructed.

"(28) Plaintiff had a two-thirds interest in said corn crop, as tenant.

"(29) That the land upon which plaintiff's crop was growing is now occupied by Sisto Seschetti, who now has a crop of wheat growing thereon.

"(30) There was evidence of the value of plaintiff's corn crop during the month of May, 1901, adduced to show the value at that time by comparison with the remainder of the crop produced.

"(31) This action was originally brought against Frank Krahn, Will Davis, and Alice Davis as defendants. Frank Krahn and Will Davis were wholly discharged by this court at the April term, 1902.

"(32) The plaintiff could have replanted his corn after May 25, 1901, but it would not have been ordinarily prudent, or with the expectation of realizing for his efforts.

"(33) The court finds that the plaintiff, by reason of the construction of said ditch by defendant and the drainage of water from said pond, has sustained damage in the sum of $100.

"Conclusion: The court therefore concludes that the issues are with the plaintiff herein against the defendant herein, Alice Davis, and that plaintiff is entitled to judgment against the defendant, Alice Davis, for the sum of $100 as damages sustained, and costs of suit."

Upon the facts so found the court rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $100 for damages sustained, and costs. Defendant brings the cause to this court, alleging error of law.

Gillette, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes to this court upon a question of law applicable to the facts found and determined by the court below.

It is contended by the plaintiff in error that the injury complained of does not constitute a legal injury under the law. The statutes of this territory contain no provision which assists in the analysis of the proposition here submitted. Wilson's Rev. & Anno. Stat. 1903, §§ 4052-4062, defining easements and servitudes, their creation and abolishment, contain no provisions which throw any light upon the subject here under investigation. The whole subject-matter is therefore left to be determined by the rules of the common law.

While the defendant in error is shown to have no estate in the land upon which his crop was growing, other than that of a lessee, he, nevertheless, to the extent of his lease, had the right to the use and occupation thereof, with no greater servitude from the dominant or upper landowner than the owner of the fee would be compelled to recognize; and we think it will be conceded that, if the lessee should suffer damage by the act of the lessor in granting to the dominant tenement a right of servitude with reference to surface water which did not exist at the time of the creation of the lease, the lessor would be liable to the lessee for the damages sustained by reason of the creation of such servitude; and we think, therefore, that he may have such right of action, against one who creates such servitude wrongfully, for any damages he has sustained in the enjoyment of his leasehold estate. Counsel for both plaintiff and defendant in error have been commendably diligent in briefing the authorities governing injuries by flowing water. Many cases have been cited, however, which have little, if any, application to the issues framed in this case. The plaintiff in error is the owner of the dominant tenement, upon which is a natural depression which receives and holds during a rainy season surface water which collects there from the natural drainage of quite a large scope of adjacent territory, and from which there is no natural outlet, and beyond which there is no ravine or surface indication of a natural water course, when such depression is full to overflowing. The depression contains 15 to 20 acres of ground flooded in times of heavy rainfall. The plaintiff in error caused a ditch to be dug so as to drain this depression and discharge the water therefrom over and onto defendant's crop on the adjoining premises, destroying the same. The right of such drainage by the plaintiff in error is the point in issue.

The cases are numerous which hold that the dominant or upper owner of land has a natural easement or servitude upon the lower or servient one, to discharge all waters flowing or accumulating on his land, which is higher, upon or over the land of the servient owner as in a state of nature, and such natural flow or passage water cannot be interrupted or prevented by the servient owner to the detriment or injury of the dominant owner. In each case, however, where such proposition is laid down, the case itself presents peculiar features easily distinguished from this case. We will notice some of them.

The case of McDaniel v. Cummings, 83 Cal. 515, 8 L. R. A. 575, 23 Pac. 795, was an action concerning land in the Sacramento River Valley. The land next to the river is highest, and when, in a rainy season, that river overflows, the valley beyond is inundated, to prevent which a landowner proceeded to erect an embankment to prevent such overflow, which caused such overflow water to set back upon the plaintiff's lands, causing it to cover a larger area thereof for a longer period than it otherwise would. The court, in determining that case, held that the landowner had a right to protect himself against water overflowing from the river, following the English case of King v. Sewer Comrs. 8 Barn. & C. 355, with respect to waters of the sea, viz., that they are a "common enemy" against which every man has a right to defend himself, regardless of the fact that the barriers he erects may cause the flood to rise higher or flow with greater force upon his neighbor. The court, in the course of its opinion, says: "If the owner of the land next to the river will not, either by himself or in combination with those behind him, erect a levee on the bank, he ought not to be allowed to prevent them from protecting themselves merely because by so doing they prevent his higher land from being drained of the flood waters as rapidly as it otherwise would be." 69 L. R. A.

The court in that case distinguish such conditions from inundations by rainfall, which in Ogburn v. Connor, 46 Cal. 340, 13 Am. Rep. 213, was defined as follows: "When two parcels of land belonging to different owners are adjacent to each other, and one is lower than the other, and the surface water from the higher tract has been accustomed by natural flow to pass off over the lower tract, the owner of the lower tract cannot obstruct this flow. The owner of the upper tract has an easement to have the water flow over the land below, and the land below is charged with a corresponding servitude." And this, the court says, is intended as a statement of the common-law rule, but it is probably a better statement of the civil law.

Neither the cases of Ogburn v. Connor, 46 Cal. 346, 13 Am. Rep. 213, nor McDaniel v. Cummings, 83 Cal. 515, 8 L. R. A. 575, 23 Pac. 795, relied upon by the plaintiff in error, are authorities in point in this case. In Ogburn v. Connor the language of the court, in stating the rule, bases it upon surface water from the higher tract, which has been accustomed by a natural flow to pass off over the lower tract. The words "natural flow," here used, clearly distinguish that case from the one under consideration. And the facts in McDaniel v. Cummings are clearly distinguishable from the case under consideration, because in this we have only to consider surface water descending from the clouds. These questions were again brought before the supreme court of California in Gray v. McWilliams, 98 Cal. 157, 21 L. R. A. 593, 35 Am. St. Rep. 163, 32 Pac. 976, in which the rule in each of the cases of Ogburn v. Connor and McDaniel v. Cummings is by that court reaffirmed. In the opinion of the court, however, speaking by Searls, J., they say: "In the case of surface waters having no defined channel of escape, and the owner of the land upon which they are found being impotent to rid himself of their presence, the law wisely provides that the laws of nature shall be left untrammelled in their disposition." The last statement of the California court brings us very close to the case under consideration, for here we have a case in which the accumulating surface water has no defined channel of escape, and, if one is made, it must be in addition to what nature has provided.

Counsel for plaintiff in error has called this court's special attention to the case of Sheehan v. Flynn, 59 Minn. 436, 26 L. R. A. 632, 61 N. W. 462, as being a case closely in point, and say that the court held in that case that the drainage of surface water to and upon the premises of another does not constitute a tort or an actionable wrong. We are unable to get such meaning from the language used in that case. The facts were that the dominant owner had a depression in his land which filled with surface water, and in 1871, some 20 years before the case was tried, he dug a ditch 96 rods long upon his own land, to the head of a ravine, which conveyed the water across an adjoining 40-acre tract, and thence across the land of defendant into a lake. This ditch was permitted to fill up in the course of four or five years. The overseers of highways caused condemnation proceedings to be instituted in 1893 for the purpose of opening this ditch, which resulted in an order directing the same to be opened, which act was enjoined. A trial followed, in which the court found that the opening of the ditch would raise the waters of the lake in the spring of the year higher than it otherwise would be, to the extent of submerging $1\frac{1}{2}$ or 2 acres of land, to his damage in the sum of about \$50. Judgment was entered for this sum, which judgment was reversed upon appeal. The court in its opinion modified and criticised several prior decisions of that court, and finally concluded: "We hold that one has a right to drain his land for any legitimate use, whether for a railroad track, a wheat field, or a pasture, and whether the improvement is directly and wholly for the purpose of drainage, or whether it is for some other purpose and such drainage is a mere incidental result. But, if he collect and convey the surface water off his own land, he shall do what is reasonable, under all the circumstances, to turn it into some natural drain, or into some course in which it will do the least injury to his neighbor; and, if he would prevent it from coming upon his land, he must not do so by obstructing some natural drain, and thereby hold back the water and flood the land of his neighbor, at least if such natural drain is an important one. Applying these principles to the present case, we are of the opinion that these limitations on the common-law right of the owner to improve his land so as to rid it of surface water do not prohibit this defendant from draining this depression in the manner proposed. As before stated, it fairly appears that this is the only . . . natural drain reasonably accessible, and the consequent injury to others is not so great, as compared to the benefit to be derived from the improvement as to make it unreasonable on that account. The judgment appealed from is reversed, and judgment ordered for defendant." This is the strongest case presented by the plaintiff in error in support of his contention, and is distinguishable from the case under consideration in this: That there the water was discharged through a ravine into the lake below, while here the water by means of the ditch was discharged upon and permitted to spread out over the land of defendant in error. In 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 236, the author says: "The upper proprietor cannot collect the waters from his estate and discharge them by artificial channels in a new direction, or in increased volume, upon the lands of the lower proprietor to his injury."

In the case of Butler v. Peck, 16 Ohio St. 336, 88 Am. Dec. 452, we have a case closely analogous to the one under consideration. In that case the defendant, Peck, is shown to have been the owner of a tract of land having thereon a low, wet, and swampy marsh or basin covering some five or six acres of land, upon which at certain seasons water stood to a great depth, and at other times to a depth of from one to six inches, until it passed off through a natural outlet, or by evaporation, or passed off by percolation through the soil. The natural outlet would not take all the water off. From one to six inches would remain and pass off by evaporation and percolation. The defendant dug a ditch within 25 rods of defendant's north line, where it terminated, where the water was discharged upon the surface of defendant's land, and from thence onto the land of an adjoining owner, and thence to the land of the plaintiff. In the trial of the case the court instructed the jury as follows: "If you find that, after natural outlets had ceased to carry off the water, there still remained a basin covering several acres, on which water stood to the depth of one, two, or three inches or more, which would not have passed upon the land of the plaintiff but for this improved channel, the plaintiff is entitled to recover." This charge of the trial court was excepted to, and the question brought to the supreme court of that state, and, in passing upon the question thus presented, the court said: "The sole question made by that part of the charge to the jury which is complained of is this: Whether an owner of land having upon it a marshy sink or basin of water, which basin, as to a considerable portion of the water which collects within it, has no natural outlet, may lawfully throw such water by artificial drains upon the lands of an adjacent proprietor? We are clear that no such right exists. It would sanction the creation by artificial means of a servitude which nature has denied. The natural easement arises out of the relative altitudes of adjacent surfaces as nature made them, and these altitudes may not be artificially changed to the damage of an adjacent proprietor. And it makes no difference that, in the hypothetical case on which the charge of the court below complained of is based, in times of high water a portion of the waters of the basin would overflow . . . along a natural swale to and upon the lands of the plaintiff below; for as to those waters which naturally could not surmount nor penetrate the rim of the basin, but were compelled to pass off by evaporation or remain where they were, the case is the same as if the basin had no outlet."

In Livingston v. McDonald, 21 Iowa, 160, 89 Am. Dec. 564 (second syllabus), the court says: "Where the owner of higher lands constructed a ditch to drain the surface water therefrom, which increased the flow of water upon a lower proprietor, or which threw the water upon his land in a manner different from that in which it would have naturally flowed, to the latter's injury, the former is liable for the injury thus occasioned, even though the ditch was constructed by him in the course of the ordinary use and improvement of his farm." And again: "Injuries by flowing surface water, done to a neighbor as the result of ordinary farming operations, such as plow furrows, are not actionable; but where ditches which caused an increased flow of water on the lands of an adjoining owner were dug to reclaim or improve the land, the higher owner is liable." In the course of the opinion in this case, the court cites approvingly the language of Lewis, Ch. J., in Wheatley v. Baugh, 25 Pa. 528, 64 Am. Dec. 721: "Accordingly, the law has never gone so far as to recognize in one man a right to convert another's farm to his own use for the purposes of a filter."

In the course of his opinion in Livingston v. McDonald, Mr. Justice Dillon, in commenting upon the trial in the court below, said: "The court, in substance, laid down the law to the jury to be that, if the ditch in question increased the quantity of water upon the plaintiff's land to his injury, or, without increasing the quantity, threw it upon the plaintiff's lands in a different manner from what the same would naturally have flowed upon it, to his injury, the defendant was liable for the damage thus occasioned, even though the ditch was constructed by the defendant in the course of the ordinary use and improvement of his farm. . . . We recognize the fact (to use Lord Tenterden's expression) that surface water or slough water is a common enemy which each landowner may reasonably get rid of in the best manner possible, but in relieving himself he must respect the rights of his neighbor, and cannot be justified by an act having the direct tendency and effect to make that enemy less dangerous to himself and more dangerous to his neighbor."

This language of the court in that case is directly applicable to the case under consideration, and would seem to lay down a reasonable and correct rule governing causes arising under circumstances of like import. In this case it is shown that the surface water collecting in large quantities in the depression or basin upon plaintiff in error's land had no natural outlet, and seldom, if ever, overflowed the banks or rim of the depression, and disappeared only by evaporation and percolation. If its presence there was a detriment to that tract of land, such detriment could not, by the act of the plaintiff in error, be inflicted upon the servient tenement. The land of plaintiff in error might rightfully be cultivated to the very brink of the depression, in fact to the water's edge, and whatever of drainage was incident to a proper cultivation of the land, the servient tenement was bound to receive; but a matter of drainage of the depression in question, constructed for the purpose of drainage and consequent increased valuation, followed by a corresponding detriment to an adjoining owner, is in violation of the general rule as now established by American authorities, and we hold that where surface waters reach and become a settled body of water, retained in a natural body or receptacle, forming a lake or pond which is emptied only by evaporation or percolation, they lose their character as surface waters, and may not be drained by artificial means, to the damage of a lower or servient tenement, without the person so artificially draining becoming liable for damages thus inflicted.

It follows that the judgment of the District Court must be affirmed, with costs.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Oregon, Respt.,
v.

Frank GUGLIELMO, Appt.

(.....Or.....)

1. Indictment by a grand jury is not necessary to due process of law, so as to preclude the institution of a criminal prosecution by information.

2. Under a constitutional provision for the constitution of a grand jury, which empowers the legislature to modify or abolish it, provision may be made for the institution of criminal proceedings by information without the entire abolition of the grand jury.

NOTE.—As to sufficiency of prosecution upon information, instead of upon indictment of a grand jury, see also, in this series, Re Wright, 69 L. R. A.

3. The official oath of the officer filing an information charging one with crime is sufficient to comply with a constitutional provision that no warrant shall issue but upon probable cause supported by oath, without the necessity of verifying each particular information filed.
4. The regularity of the appointment of the deputy district attorney who signed an information cannot be challenged by merely alleging that the information was not found, indorsed, or presented as required by law.
5. Proof of the appointment of a deputy district attorney who signed an information is not necessary to render it valid, since the court is presumed to be cognizant of such appointment and of the powers of the appointee.
6. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, a deputy district attorney who signs the name of the district attorney to the information will be presumed to have possessed plenary power in the premises, and to have been authorized to examine witnesses to enable him intelligently to charge persons with the commission of crimes, to prepare informations, sign the name of the district attorney thereto, and file them in court.
7. A district attorney who insists that one accused of crime shall plead to the information thereby ratifies the subscription of his name to the information by his deputy.

On Rehearing.

8. Leave of court is not necessary to the filing of an information by the district attorney charging the commission of crime.
9. The fact that the record shows that a warrant was ordered to be issued upon an information filed by the deputy district attorney in the absence of his chief does not show that it was in fact issued without the support of the oath required by the Constitution, where it further appears that the district attorney was present in court when accused first appeared, and ratified the information, so that his oath of office supported the warrant if it was not actually issued until after he had appeared and assumed control of the proceedings.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant, Frank Guglielmo, was informed against, tried, and convicted of the crime of murder in the first degree, alleged to have been committed in Multnomah county June 14, 1904, by killing one Freda Guarsascia, and from the judgment which followed he appeals.

It is insisted by his counsel that the court erred in denying their motion to set aside the information on the ground that it violated the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and was also repugnant to § 18 of article 7 of that of this state. It is argued that these sections of organic law guarantee to every suspected person the right to be charged by indictment found and returned by a grand jury, before he can be required to plead; that, though our state Constitution authorizes the legislature to "modify or abolish" grand juries, it must do so either by increasing or diminishing the number of "the most competent of the prominent citizens of the county" of which that body is composed (State v. Lawrence, 12 Or. 297, 7 Pac. 116; Zabriskie v. Hackensack & N. Y. R. Co. 18 N. J. Eq. 178, 90 Am. Dec. 617), or by totally abrogating the system; that the act of February 17, 1899 (Bellinger & C. Codes & Statutes, §§ 1258-1264), empowering the trial court to convene a grand jury, demonstrates that such inquisitorial body has not been abolished, nor has it been modified, for the authority attempted to be conferred by that act upon the district attorney to charge the commission of crimes by information only is the substitution of a single person, not chosen in the manner prescribed by the fundamental law of this state for the selection of grand jurors. This question was duly considered in the case of State v. Tucker, 36 Or. 291, 51 L. R. A. 246, 61 Pac. 894, and decided adversely to the defendant's contention; and, believing that the conclusion there reached is supported by reason and authority, we adhere to and reaffirm the legal principles thus announced. Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 28 L. ed. 232, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 111, 292; Bolln v. Nebraska, 176 U. S. 83, 44 L. ed. 382, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 287. In Re Boulter, 5 Wyo. 329, 40 Pac. 520, Mr. Chief Justice Groesbeck, in a very able opinion, answers the questions presented by defendant's counsel on this branch of the case, and shows that the doctrine contended for herein is without merit.

The defendant, never having had or waived a preliminary examination, was charged with the commission of the alleged crime by an information not sworn to by any person, upon filing which the court ordered a bench warrant to be issued for his arrest, though he was then in custody; having been apprehended for the crime with the commission of which he was charged. It is maintained by his counsel that this warrant was issued without probable cause, because it was not supported by oath or affirmation, and that an error was committed in overruling the motion to set aside the information, based on the ground that it violated § 9 of article 1 of the Constitution of this state, prohibiting the issuing of warrants for the arrest of any person, except upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation. At common law the commission of crimes was charged either by indictment or information, depending in most instances upon the grade of the offense. An indictment was an accusation at the suit of the sovereign based on the oath of twelve men of the county wherein the offense was committed. 2 Hawk. P. C. 287. The form usually prescribed for the commencement of an indictment was, after stating the venue, as follows: "The jurors for our lady the Queen upon their oath present," etc. 1 Archbold, Crim. Pr. & Pl. *76. Sir Matthew Hale, in speaking of the caption of a written accusation, and of the necessity of stating therein the oath of the jurors, says: "It must return that the indictment was made per sacramentum." 2 Hale, P. C. 167. The form of indictment prescribed by the legislative assembly of this state omits a recital of the oath of the grand jurors. Bellinger & C. Codes & Statutes, § 1304. Before the grand jury can enter upon the discharge of their duties, however, an oath is required to be administered to them, the form of which is also ordained. Id. § 1271. It has been repeatedly held in this state that the form of indictment given in the statute was sufficient. State v. Dodson, 4 Or. 64; State v. Spencer, 6 Or. 152; State v. Brown, 7 Or. 186; State v. Lee Yan Yan, 10 Or. 365; State v. Ah Lee, 18 Or. 540, 23 Pac. 424. In civil actions it is unnecessary to allege a fact which the law will presume. Bliss, Code Pl. 3d ed. § 175. It will be presumed that official duty has been regularly performed (Bellinger & C. Codes & Statutes, § 788, subd. 15); and hence, arguendo, it would seem that an indictment complying with the form recommended by the legislative assembly, though omitting a recital therein of the oath of the grand jurors, was sufficient.

At common law an information was a surmise or suggestion upon record, made on behalf of the sovereign to a court of criminal jurisdiction, charging a person with the commission of a misdemeanor. Wilkes v. King, 4 Bro. P. C. 360; United States v. Tureaud, 20 Fed. 621. "Informations," says a text writer, referring to such accusations made under the ancient rule, "are of two kinds: First, such as are merely at the suit of the King; secondly, such as are partly at the suit of the King, and partly at the suit of the party." 2 Hawk. P. C. 356. Blackstone, speaking of criminal informations, in distinguishing the two kinds, exhibited in the name of the King, says: "First, those which are truly and properly his own suits, and filed ex officio by his own immediate officer, the attorney general; secondly, those in which, though the King is the nominal prosecutor, yet it is at the relation of some private person or common informer; and they are filed by the King's coroner and attorney in the court of King's bench, usually called the master of the Crown office, who is for this purpose the standing officer of the public. The objects of the King's own prosecutions, filed ex officio by his own attorney general, are properly such enormous misdeanors as peculiarly tend to disturb or endanger his government, or to molest or affront him in the regular discharge of his royal functions. For offenses so high and dangerous, in the punishment or prevention of which a moment's delay would be fatal, the law has given to the Crown the power of an immediate prosecution, without waiting for any previous application to any other tribunal, which power, thus necessary, not only to the ease and safety, but even to the very existence, of the executive magistrate, was originally reserved in the great plan of the English Constitution wherein provision is wisely made for the due preservation of all its parts. The objects of the other species of informations filed by the master of the Crown office upon the complaint or relation of a private subject are any gross and notorious misdemeanors, riots, batteries, libels, and other immoralities of an atrocious kind, not peculiarly tending to disturb the government (for those are left to the care of the attorney general), but which, on account of their magnitude or pernicious example, deserve the most public animadversion." 4 Bl. Com. *308. In the reign of Henry VII. the remedy by information, exhibited on leave of court by the master of the Crown office, became the means of great oppression to the subjects of England, and so continued with little abatement until 4 & 5 Wm. & Mary, chap. 11, and chap. 18, which provided, in effect, that the clerk of the Crown, in the court of the King's bench, should not, without express authority, to be given by the court when in session, exhibit, receive, or file any information for any of the causes for which it was allowable, nor issue any process thereon, without taking a recognizance from the person procuring such information to be exhibited, but that the act should not extend to any other information than such as should be exhibited in the court of King's bench by the master of the Crown office. 2 Hawk. P. C. 358. This learned author, after quoting the acts, the substance of which is here given, makes the following declaration: "From whence it follows that informations exhibited by the attorney general remain as they were at the common law." In King v. Jolliffe, 4 T. R. 285, Lord Chief Justice Kenyon, referring to the act regulating the exhibition of informations by the master of the Crown office, says: "Before the statute 4 & 5 Wm. & Mary, chap. 18, it was in the power of any individual to file an information, without disclosing to the court the grounds on which it was exhibited. But that practice being attended with the inconveniences recited in the preamble to that statute, it was enacted that no information should be filed without the express order of the court, publicly given. That statute does not enumerate the grounds which are sufficient to enable us to grant the information, but the legislature left it to our discretion, trusting that we should not so far transgress our duty as to go beyond the rules of sound discretion. In ordinary cases affidavits are sworn in the court for the express purpose of praying an information upon them, but that does not preclude us from granting an information on affidavits equally authentic, although not made for that purpose." Sir James Fitzjames Stephen, in his History of the Criminal Law of England (vol. 1, p. 296), in referring to the act of 1692, regulating informations exhibited by the master of the Crown office, also observes: "The practical result of this statute has been to make a motion for a criminal information practically equivalent to a proceeding before magistrates in order to the committal of the accused." This distinguished jurist, on the page of his valuable work preceding that from which the foregoing excerpt is taken, in referring to the statute of 1494 (11 Hen. VII. chap. 3), remarks: "This act was the one under which Empson and Dudley earned their obscure infamy." Blackstone, alluding to the act last referred to, and also to another ordained in the reign of the same sovereign, makes the following statement: "But when the statute 3 Hen. VII. chap. 1, had extended the jurisdiction of the court of star chamber, the members of which were the sole judges of the law, the fact, and the penalty, and when the statute 11 Hen. VII. chap. 3, had permitted informations to be brought by any informer upon any penal statute, not extending to life or member, at the assizes or before the justices of the peace, who were to hear and determine the same according to their own discretion, then it was that the legal and orderly jurisdiction of the court of King's bench fell into disuse and oblivion, and Empson and Dudley (the wicked instruments of King Henry VII.), by hunting out obsolete penalties, and this tyrannical mode of prosecution, with other oppressive devices, continually harassed the subject and shamefully enriched the Crown." 4 Bl. Com. *310. It was the fear, undoubtedly entertained by the citizens of this country, that a violation of the rights of personal liberty, as practised in England in the reign of King Henry VII., might possibly be repeated to their injury, that prompted Congress to propose and secure the adoption of the 4th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. As this amendment was never intended to limit the powers of the states in respect to their own people, but was designed to operate on the national government only (Spies v. Illinois [Ex parte Spies] 123 U. S. 131, 31 L. ed. 80, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 21, 22; Bolln v. Nebraska, 176 U. S. 83, 44 L. ed. 382, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 287), the framers of the Constitution of this state embodied the substance thereof in the Bill of Rights, which declares: "No law shall violate the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable search or seizure; and no warrant shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the person or thing to be seized," Or. Const. art. 1, § 9. This restrictive clause has been incorporated into the statute of this state, which, so far as deemed involved herein, is as follows: An information is the allegation or statement made before a magistrate, and verified by the oath of the party making it, that a person has been guilty of some designated crime. Beltinger & C. Codes & Statutes, § 1581. When complaint is made to a magistrate of the commission of a crime, he must examine the informant on oath, and reduce his statement to writing, and cause the same to be subscribed by him, and also take the depositions of any witnesses that the informant may produce in support thereof. Id. § 1584. Thereupon, if the magistrate be satisfied that the crime complained of has been committed, and that there is probable cause to believe that the person charged has committed it, he must issue a warrant of arrest. Id. § 1585. The necessity of satisfying the magistrate that the crime complained of has been perpetrated, and that there is probable cause to believe that the person charged has committed it, as a condition precedent to the issuing of a warrant of arrest, is analogous to the leave of court which the master of the Crown office in England was obliged to secure before he was permitted to exhibit an information in the name of his sovereign.

At common law the attorney general, ex officio, was invested with a discretionary power of filing informations charging the commission of misdemeanors, and hence he was not obliged to ask for or obtain leave of court before exercising the responsibility that devolved upon him by virtue of his office. 4 Bl. Com. *309. Thus, in Rex v. Philipps, 3 Burr. 1564, it was ruled that the attorney general had a right himself, ex officio, to exhibit an information without leave of court; Lord Mansfield saying: "This is not a case within the act of 4 Wm. & Mary, chap. 18." To the same effect is Rex v. Davis, 4 Burr. 2089, in which case the same learned justice also remarked: "If it appears to the King's attorney general to be right to grant an information, he may do it himself. If he does not think it so, he cannot expect us to do it." The discretionary power vested in and exercised by the attorney general at common law devolves, in this country, in the absence of any statutory regulations, on the district attorneys (State v. Douglas County Road Co. 10 Or. 198; State ex rel. Taylor v. Lord, 28 Or. 498, 31 L. R. A. 473, 43 Pac. 471), who are entitled to prosecute persons for the commission of crimes by information, as a right pertaining to their office, and without leave of court (1 Bishop, New Crim. Proc. § 144; State v. Kyle, 166 Mo. 287, 56 L. R. A. 115, 65 S. W. 763). "Therefore," says Mr. Justice Thomas in State v. Ransberger, 106 Mo. 135, 17 S. W. 290, "when the prosecuting attorney files an information, it is always official; it is his accusation, and for it he is responsible." In Territory v. Outinola, 4 N. M. 305, 14 Pac. 809, it was held, notwithstanding the 4th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States was in force in the territory of New Mexico, that, under the rules of the common law, as adopted in this country, it was not essential that an information filed ex officio by a prosecuting attorney, charging the commission of a misdemeanor, should be supported by affidavit. In that case the court criticizes the decision of Billings, J., in United States v. Tureaud, 20 Fed. 621, cited by defendant's counsel, and states that the part of the opinion relied upon "is the mere dictum of the judge, and cannot be regarded as authority." Section 11 of article 2 of the Constitution of Missouri, adopted October 30, 1875, declares that no warrant to seize any person shall issue without probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation reduced to writing. Section 12 of article 2 of the organic law of that state, which originally provided for the prosecution of felonies by indictment only, was amended by resolution of the legislature, which, having been adopted by a vote of the people, took effect December 19, 1900, substituting the following in lieu of the former clause, to wit: "No person shall be prosecuted criminally for felony or misdemeanor otherwise than by indictment or information, which shall be concurrent remedies; but this shall not be construed to apply to cases arising in the land or naval forces or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger." Mo. Laws 1899, p. 382. After this amendment was adopted, it was held, notwithstanding the Constitution of that state required the oath or affirmation supporting the probable cause to be reduced to writing, that a prose-

The Bill of Rights of this state does not demand that the oath or affirmation sustaining the probable cause shall be reduced to writing, nor does our statute require an information charging the commission of a crime to be verified; and, in the absence of any enactment on the subject, the rules of the common law in relation to informations exhibited by the attorney general are applicable and controlling. The district attorney of the proper judicial district in this state is responsible for all informations filed and is not obliged to obtain leave of court to discharge his duty in this particular before he is permitted to exercise the discretion with which the law invests him. As the circuit court is authorized to convene a grand jury when deemed advisable (Bellinger & C. Codes & Statutes, § 1264), indictments and informations are therefore concurrent remedies, and, as the former means of charging the commission of a crime is based on and supported by the oath of the grand jurors, which fact, in this state, need not be recited in the written accusation, so an information, under our statute, need not be verified, for the official oath of the person whose duty it is to prosecute the formal charge complies with the requirement of the organic act, and supplies the necessary oath or affirmation, thereby supporting the probable cause.

It is contended by defendant's counsel that the district attorney for the fourth judicial district did not prepare or file the information herein, and hence the court erred in denying their motion to set it aside. John Manning, the officer mentioned, having been called as a witness by defendant's counsel, testified that his signature to the information was not affixed by him, and that he was not in Portland the day the information was filed. L. C. Hartman and J. P. Fones, whose names are indorsed on the information, appearing as defendant's witnesses, severally testified that, in furnishing evidence as a basis for the information, they were sworn and examined in the office of the district attorney by a deputy. That part of the statute authorizing a prosecuting officer to nominate representatives is as follows: "A district attorney, during his continuance in office, shall be entitled to appoint as many deputies in each county as he may deem necessary, and may, by a written appointment filed with the clerk of the circuit court of the county, authorize such deputies, or any of them, to attend upon the sittings of the grand jury, and attend to and transact all business pertaining to the district attorney's office." Bellinger & C. Codes & Statutes, § 2927, as amended by act of December 28, 1903 (Sp. Laws Or. 1903, p. 32). No evidence was offered at the trial tending to show that the appointment of the deputy who signed the name of the district attorney to the information was in writing, or the extent of the power delegated to him. At common law, though the attorney general was authorized to exhibit informations, without leave of court, charging the commission of misdemeanors, if that office was vacant the solicitor general was empowered to discharge that duty. In Wilkes v. King, 4 Bro. P. C. 360, it was ruled that notice of the right of the solicitor general to exhibit an information would be taken, without proof of the vacancy in the office of attorney general. In that case it is said: "That the attorney and solicitor general are invested by their offices with general authority to commence and prosecute the suits of the Crown. It is true, the attorney general, as the superior officer, has the direction and control of His Majesty's prosecutions, in which the solicitor general seldom interferes; but it is equally true that during the vacancy of the office of attorney general all the suits of the Crown both criminal and civil, are commenced, prosecuted, and carried on by the solicitor general. That at the time when these informations were filed against Mr. Wilkes the office of attorney general was vacant, and consequently the solicitor general was the proper officer to exhibit them. But it is said that the fact of the vacancy ought to appear upon the record. The only pretense for such an averment is to inform the court of the vacancy, as an inducement to receive the information from the solicitor general, but there is no necessity for that intelligence. The attorney general is, in truth, an officer of, and has a place in, the court of King's bench, and the court will take notice of the vacancy of the office; and there are multitudes of instances of suits commenced and prosecuted by the solicitor general on behalf of the Crown, without any averment or notice taken of the vacancy of the office of attorney general." In Choen v. State, 85 Ind. 209, it was held that an indictment signed by a person as "special prosecuting attorney" was not subject to a motion to quash, or vulnerable to a plea in abatement, which did not deny the due appointment of such special prosecuting officer. In deciding that case, Mr. Justice Woods says: "A court takes cognizance of its own officers and of

In the case at bar the motion to set aside the information is based on the ground that it was not found, indorsed, or presented as required by law. This objection was insufficient to challenge the appointment of the deputy district attorney, and, as the trial court is presumed to be cognizant of its own officers and of the measure of their powers, no proof of the appointment of the deputy was necessary. There being no issue on this question, it must be assumed that the deputy district attorney possessed plenary power, and was authorized to examine witnesses to enable him intelligently to charge persons with the commission of crimes, to prepare informations, sign the name of the district attorney thereto, and to file them in the circuit court. People v. Etting, 99 Cal. 577, 34 Pac. 237; United States v. Nagle, 17 Blatchf. 258, Fed. Cas. No. 15,852. In State v. Belding, 43 Or. 95, 71 Pac. 330, it was held that the district attorney having filed an information containing his name, printed under the indorsement, "A true information," thereby adopted such printed name as his own signature, which bound him as effectually as if he had personally subscribed it to the accusation. So, too, in the case at bar, when the district attorney insisted on the defendant's pleading to the information, he thereby ratified the subscription of his name by his deputy. The district attorney, by virtue of his election and oath of office, was authorized formally to charge persons with the commission of crimes perpetrated or consummated in the judicial district in which he was chosen, and, invoking the maxim, Qui facit per alium facit per se, when he caused the defendant to go to trial on the information filed by his deputy he thereby verified under his official oath the facts constituting the gravamen of the charge.

The office of deputy district attorney was not created by the organic law of this state, so as to require the appointee to swear to support the Constitutions of the United States and of this state (Or. Const. art. 15, § 3), nor have we been able to find any statutory provision demanding that he shall take an oath of office; but as the deputy, in the case at bar, did not subscribe his own name to the information, but signed that of the prosecuting attorney, who is a constitutional officer (Or. Const. art. 7, § 17), and specially required to take an oath of office (Bellinger & C. Codes & Statutes, § 2502), the information, which states the facts constituting the probable cause (Jones v. Robbins, 8 Gray, 329), is supported by an oath.

Believing that the defendant had a fair and impartial trial in the manner prescribed 69 L. R. A.

by law, and that no prejudicial error was committed, the judgment is affirmed.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Moore, J., on March 27, 1905, handed down the following additional opinion:

It is contended by defendant's counsel in their petition for a rehearing, that if it be conceded, as stated in the former opinion herein, that a district attorney in this state possesses the power, formerly exercised ex officio by the attorney general in England, of exhibiting informations for misdemeanors only, a district attorney in Oregon has no authority in that manner to charge a felony. The legal principle insisted upon challenges the power of the legislative assembly to confer upon the district attorney such authority. The only reason that can be assigned to support this point is that such a procedure is violative of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in that it may result in the deprivation of life or liberty without due process of law. The Supreme Court of the United States, in construing this clause, has settled all controversy on the subject by holding that the prosecution of a person for a felony by an information only constitutes due process of law. Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 28 L. ed. 232, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 111, 292; Bolln v. Nebraska, 176 U. S. 83, 44 L. ed. 382, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 287.

The similarity of power exercised ex officio under the rules of the common law by the attorney general of England, and that employed by a district attorney in this state, lies in the fact that the former was, and the latter, in the absence of legislation on the subject, is, authorized to perform the duties devolving upon him without leave of court. A district attorney may therefore, in his own discretion, file an information charging the commission of any crime committed or triable in the county for which he is elected or appointed. An examination of the rules of the common law, and an investigation of the mode of practice pursued by the attorney general of England thereunder, necessarily lead to the conclusion that a district attorney in this state, in the absence of any enactment on the subject, possesses the same measure of power exercised by him, and hence is not, like the master of the Crown office, obliged to secure leave of court before he can exercise his discretion, but, like such attorney general, he has authority to file informations charging the commission of misdemeanors. This is the limit to the analogy between the powers of these officers, but, to the extent of the similarity indicated, the ancient law is germane and governs, demonstrating that a district attorney in this state possesses plenary power.

His authority, however, so far as it relates to the filing of informations charging the commission of felonies, is not derived from the common law, but directly from the legislative assembly. Bellinger & C. Codes & Statutes, § 1258. The organic law of this state, in commanding the method to be pursued in securing jurors, is as follows: "The legislative assembly shall so provide that the most competent of the permanent citizens of the county shall be chosen for jurors; and out of the whole number in attendance at the court, seven shall be chosen by lot as grand jurors, five of whom must concur to find an indictment. But the legislative assembly may modify or abolish grand jurors." Or. Const. art. 7, § 18. The legislative assembly, exercising the power thus reserved, passed an act, which was approved February 17, 1899 (Laws 1899, p. 99), authorizing the district attorney of any judicial district in this state to file informations charging persons with the commission of any crimes, defined and made punishable by the laws of Oregon, that have been committed in the county where the information is filed. Bellinger & C. Codes & Statutes, § 1258. The information specified shall be substantially in the form prescribed for an indictment (Id. § 1304), except that the words "district attorney" shall be used instead of the words "grand jury" wherever the same occur. Id. § 1259. The information, when filed, shall be construed like, and deemed to be in all respects the same as, an indictment, and the same proceedings shall be had, and with like effect, as in cases where indictments are returned by a grand jury. Id. § 1260. Any person within this state can be compelled by subpoena to appear before a district attorney to testify concerning any crime inquired of by him. Id. § 1261. The name of each witness thus examined by the district attorney shall be inserted at the foot of or indorsed upon the information before it is filed. Id. § 1262.

A perusal of the act in question, the substance of which is hereinbefore stated, will show that it is in effect a modification of the grand jury system, whereby that inquisitorial body has, except when in the opinion of the court deemed advisable (Id. § 1264), been superseded by the district attorney, who can find informations only on the testimony of witnesses taken before him, which tends to show that a crime has been committed in the county, and that there is reasonable cause to believe that the person to be charged is connected therewith and can upon a trial therefor be convicted thereof. The change in the manner of initiating criminal actions is a reasonable exercise by the legislative assembly of the power reserved by the people in the fundamental law, and because their representatives, when assembled, considered it appropriate to designate the district attorney as the proper person formally to charge the commission of crimes, his right to employ the authority conferred is as well founded as if the control in such matters had been delegated to any other person or number of persons.

"An information," as defined by the legislative assembly in 1864, "is the allegation or statement made before a magistrate, and verified by the oath of the party making it, that a person has been guilty of some designated crime." Id. § 1581. In modifying the grand jury system, the legislative assembly in 1899 designated the formal charge of the commission of a crime, made by the district attorney as an "information," but the accusation in writing might have been indicated as well by any other name. The word "information," as defined in the statute first enacted, refers to the charge made before a magistrate, and in the last act to the complaint made by a district attorney. We do not think the legislative assembly, by designating the formal charge last referred to as an "information," thereby intended that the word used should be understood as meaning a verified statement, and for this reason resort must be had to § 9 of the Bill of Rights of this state, and not to the statute defining the word, to determine whether or not the information filed by the district attorney should be verified by an oath indorsed thereon or specially made with reference thereto. The affidavits required to support the probable cause were originally sworn in the court for the express purpose of praying an information upon them. King v. Jolliffe, 4 T. R. 285. As at common law the attorney general in England ex officio exhibited informations for misdemeanors without leave of court, no necessity existed for the making of an affidavit to support the probable cause, except by the master of the Crown office. This was the rule of the common law, as announced in King v. Jolliffe, 4 T. R. 285, when the 4th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States was ratified, and also when § 9 of the Bill of Rights of this state was adopted, commanding that no warrant should be issued but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation. A reasonable interpretation of the clause of the organic law of this state, to which attention is called, when read in connection with the rules of the common law, leads to the conclusion that an indictment found and returned by a grand jury need not be specially verified by an oath of any person, and that the same rule also applies to informations exhibited without leave of court, which are in effect indictments found and returned by the district attorney. Where, however, leave of court is required as a condition precedent to the filing of an information, it would seem that the probable cause must be supported by an oath or affirmation before any warrant can be issued, unless the accused has had or waived a preliminary examination. Ratcliff v. People, 22 Colo. 75, 43 Pac. 553; Holt v. People, 23 Colo. 1, 45 Pac. 374; Noble v. People, 23 Colo. 9, 45 Pac. 376. As a district attorney in this state is not required to secure leave of court before he can file an information charging the commission of a crime, and as he has in effect been subrogated in lieu of the grand jurors in this respect, so that an information filed by him is tantamount to an indictment returned by the grand jury, we think his oath of office, though promissory, is equivalent to the oaths of the grand jurors which are assertory, and each sufficiently supports the probable cause, though not indorsed thereon or specially connected therewith.

It is insisted by defendant's counsel that the bill of exceptions fails to disclose the person who subscribed the district attorney's name to the information. We think this question is unimportant, for the district attorney, having assisted in prosecuting the defendant, and being present when he was arraigned and secured an extension of time within which to plead, thereby adopted the signature appended to the written accusation, and ratified the act of the person who subscribed his name thereto. State v. Belding, 43 Or. 95, 71 Pac. 330.

The bill of exceptions shows that the district attorney was absent from Multnomah county June 15, 1904, the day the information was filed, at which time it also appears that a bench warrant for the arrest of the defendant was "ordered" to be issued on the motion of a deputy of the district attorney. Based on this condition of the transcript, it is contended by defendant's counsel that if ratification by the district attorney gave validity to the information, which they deny, such confirmation did not occur until after the bench warrant was executed, and hence is issued without authority. The court's order that a bench warrant be issued is in effect a judgment awarding the relief demanded by the deputy district attorney when the information was filed. The issuance of the warrant in pursuance of such judgment is a ministerial act performed by the clerk of the court, usually upon the request of the officer entitled thereto. The bill of exceptions shows that on June 16, 1904, the district attorney was in the court when the defendant first appeared 69 L. R. A.

therein, but, no copy of the warrant being set out in the record, it does not affirmatively appear that the capias was not "issued" at the request of the district attorney himself before he took any part in the action in open court, thereby ratifying the finding of the information, and verifying it with his official oath, prior to the issuance of the bench warrant. The defendant had been arrested for the commission of the crime of which he was convicted, and was confined in jail therefor when the information was filed. His incarceration, therefore, rendered the immediate issuance of a bench warrant unnecessary, and the reasonable probabilities strengthen the conclusion reached, that the capias was not issued by the clerk until June 16, 1904, and then, possibly, upon the præcipe of the district attorney.

It follows from these considerations that the petition for a rehearing is denied.

OREGON RAILROAD & NAVIGATION COMPANY, Resp't.

1. After a memorandum book has been introduced in evidence without objection no objection will lie to its use as evidence, or to a witness using it as a basis for the facts to which he testifies, on the ground that he did not make the entries.
2. If the memoranda of inspection of engines prepared by the men in charge of that work and filed in the office of the railroad company have been lost, and the facts with regard to the inspection forgotten by them, such facts may be proved by the introduction in evidence of a transcript of such memoranda, entered by the proper clerk in a book kept for that purpose, accompanied by his testimony and that of the inspectors, showing that inspections were made and properly entered in the book.
3. If the particular engine which caused a fire near a railroad track is not identified, the jury may, in determining the question of the negligence of the railroad company, consider evidence that fires were set out at about the time the loss occurred, by engines belonging to the defendant, which are not claimed to have started the fire in question.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John J. Balleray and John McCourt, for appellants:

A witness is allowed to refresh his memory respecting a fact, by anything written by himself or under his direction at the time when the fact occurred, or immediately thereafter, or at any other time when the fact was fresh in his memory, and he knew that the same was correctly stated in the writing; but in either case the writing must be produced, and may be inspected by the adverse party, who may, if he chooses, cross-examine the witness upon it, and may read it to the jury. A witness may testify from such writing, though he retains no recollection of the particular fact.

1 Bellinger & C. Anno. Codes & Statutes, § 848, p. 407.

A witness cannot be allowed to testify or refresh his memory from something not written by himself, or under his direction; nor can a private writing of a witness, not written by himself, or under his direction, be read in evidence where the witness has no recollection of the fact.

When the witness Whitby saw the book, examined the entries, knew them to be correct, and signed them shortly after the fact of the inspection, the book became an original, and was therefore admissible.

Wolverton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant, to show that it had observed proper care and precaution in keeping its engines and the smokestacks thereof in suitable repair, to prevent the escape of sparks and fire, and the consequent injury to the property of others along the line of its railroad, called one Whitby as a witness, who testified that his occupation was that of a boilermaker; that he was and had been in the employ of the defendant; that he inspected locomotives at times, but that he could not testify from memory regarding any inspection of engine No. 400,—the one supposed to have done the damage. A book was then placed in his hands, and his attention called to a page purporting to show the examination, condition, and repair of the smokestack and ash pan of such engine at La Grande from time to time during the month of December, 1902. This book is ruled in columns headed, respectively: "Date of examination;" "Condition of smokestack and Netting;" "Repaired, State Nature of Repairs;" "Condition of Ash Pan and Netting;" "Repairs, State Nature of Repairs;" "Signature of Inspector;" and "Occupation." Within the column headed "Condition of Smokestack and Netting" is written the word "Good," opposite the figure "2" in the column headed "Date of Examination." The word "Good" is also written under the heading "Condition of Ash Pan and Netting;" the name of C. W. Ellsworth under the heading "Signature of Inspector," and the word "Inspector" under that of "Occupation." The same thing appears as of dates December 3d and 5th. So of the 7th, 11th, 13th, 15th, 23d, 30th, and 31st, except that the name of J. A. Whitby appears under "Signature of Inspector," and "Boilermaker" under "Occupation." The witness then further testified that the signatures on the page were those of the witness, except the first three, and that the word "Boilermaker" was written by him, but that the word "Good," wherever appearing, was written by a clerk in the division foreman's office; that it was entered from reports that the witness turned in in writing; that when he signed the page he knew the entries as indicated by the clerk opposite his signature to be correct.

On cross-examination the inquiry proceeded as follows:

Q. Do you know those entries there to correctly report the examinations made on those dates?

A. They do.

Q. What do you recall about the inspections except from this memoranda?

A. When the book is given to me to sign, we have the memoranda right there, and look them over when we sign the book, to make sure it is right when we sign it.

Q. You make those memoranda on what,—a book?

A. Yes, sir; a shopbook. . . .

Q. The book is still there, which you made the original entries in?

69 L. R. A.

A. I guess it is.

Q. It is not here, is it?

A. No, sir.

Q. The clerk makes this, and you sign them?

A. He keeps them, and copies them off of these reports.

Q. Who told you he copied it off?

A. I frequently see him.

It is further shown that this book is signed by the inspector from the 1st to the 5th of every month following. The page alluded to had previously been offered and received in evidence without objection while Ellsworth, the inspector signing as of dates December 2d, 3d, and 5th, was on the stand, and likewise the entire book had been offered and admitted, which shows the inspection of many other engines during the same month; but at this time there was an objection interposed both to the memorandum, and to the witness's using it, because it appears from the witness's statement that he did not make the entries, nor were they made under his supervision. Ellsworth, while a witness, testified that he made his reports sometimes on stubs, requisition stub books,—anything to get them on,—during the month, which he sent into the office, but that he had them before him when he signed up the exhibit. The objection to the memorandum itself is manifestly without merit, as at this time it had already been admitted in evidence without objection; and, as to the objection to the witness's using it, we are of the opinion that it is also without merit, for the reason that the exhibit was already a matter in evidence, and, being so, there existed no good reason why the witness should not have been examined concerning it, nor why he should not have made such statements touching the real facts as he was enabled to with its aid. However, as this case must go back for a new trial on another point, we will state briefly the result of our investigation as to the admissibility and use of this memorandum for any purpose in the case.

Under the testimony of Whitby, the result of the inspections were first noted in a shopbook, and the memorandum in question was subsequently made up from these notations by the division foreman's clerk, and verified by the witness, who appended his signature in testimony thereof. The original entries are those made in the shopbook. Memoranda made up therefrom are but secondary evidence, and are not per se competent evidence of what was done; nor are they competent for use by the witness under any conditions, unless they so refresh his memory that he would thereby be enabled to testify independently of them, or except the originals be lost, or their absence legally excused. State v. Magers, 36 Or. 38, 42, 58 Pac. 892; Haines v. Cadwell, 40 Or. 229, 66 Pac. 910. By the old law a witness might have refreshed his memory from the memorandum or writing made by himself or under his direction, if made at or near the time, and while the fact or facts of which it speaks were fresh in his mind; and so he might have refreshed his memory from a memorandum or record made by another, if read by or to him when the matter was fresh in his memory, so that he was enabled to depose that the writing correctly represented his recollection at the time. 1 Greenl. Ev. 16th ed. § 439b, Abbott, Trial Brief, 2d ed. 395; Stephen's Digest of Ev. art. 136; 2 Philipps, Ev. *916; Com. v. Ford, 130 Mass. 64, 39 Am. Rep. 426. The statute has changed this rule, so that now a memorandum must have been made by the witness himself, or under his direction. 1 Bellinger & C. Anno. Codes & Statutes, § 848. This statute, in the light of the law as it formerly stood, was probably designed to apply more particularly, if not exclusively, to those memoranda where, after consultation by the witness, his memory is not so refreshed that he can speak from his own recollection independently of the writing, because, if wholly refreshed, so that he can speak without it, it is not always necessary that he produce it in court; but, if reference is made to it while testifying, it is proper for the opposite counsel to cross-examine concerning it, to determine whether he is using it as evidence aside from his recollection. Friendly v. Lee, 20 Or. 202, 25 Pac. 396; State v. Magers, 36 Or. 38, 42, 58 Pac. 892; Haines v. Cadwell, 40 Or. 229, 66 Pac. 910; Hill v. State, 17 Wis. 675, 86 Am. Dec. 736; Folsom v. Apple River Log-Driving Co. 41 Wis. 602. The theory of the law deducible from the books seems to be that a memorandum is but secondary evidence of the facts of which it speaks, the primary evidence being the knowledge of the witness, if he is able to testify truly as to the facts mentioned, or if he is enabled to testify from present recollection after having had his mind quickened by the memorandum,—that is to say, of his own knowledge, independent of the memorandum; and it is only when this primary proof is not available that resort may be had to the secondary, so that it becomes necessary to show that the witness cannot speak from knowledge of the facts, or from present recollection thereof, after having consulted the memorandum, before it can become of evidentiary value, either as auxiliary, or an aid to the mind in speaking from it. Bradner, Ev. 2d ed. 472; Abbott, Trial Ev. 2d ed. 395, 396; Friendly v. Lee, 20 Or. 202, 25 Pac. 396; Howard v. McDonough, 77 N. Y. 592; Peck 69 L. R. A.

v. Valentine, 94 N. Y. 569, 571; National Ulster County Bank v. Madden, 114 N. Y. 280, 284, 11 Am. St. Rep. 633, 21 N. E. 408; Krom v. Levy, 1 Hun, 171; People v. McLaughlin, 150 N. Y. 365, 44 N. E. 1017; Acklen v. Hickman, 63 Ala. 494, 35 Am. Rep. 54; Hayden v. Howie, 27 Ill. App. 533. But to enable a witness to testify from the memorandum, under the conditions stated, it must be the original, unless it be lost, or its absence excused. Davis v. Field, 56 Vt. 426; Caldwell v. Bowen, 80 Mich. 382, 45 N. W. 185; Harrison v. Middleton, 11 Gratt. 527, 547. If the original be produced, and it appears that it was made in the usual course of business, it may be introduced and received in evidence along with the testimony of the witness who made it, and is enabled to say that the facts stated in it were correctly minuted at the time; but this is because he has forgotten, so that he is unable to speak concerning such facts without the aid of the memorandum. Abbott, Trial Ev. 2d ed. 395, 396; National Ulster County Bank v. Madden, 114 N. Y. 280, 284, 11 Am. St. Rep. 633, 21 N. E. 408; Peck v. Valentine, 94 N. Y. 569, 571; Krom v. Levy, 1 Hun, 171; Merrill v. Ithaca & O. R. Co. 16 Wend. 586, 30 Am. Dec. 130; Moots v. State, 21 Ohio St. 653; Burton v. Plummer, 2 Ad. & El. 341; Doe ex dem. Church v. Perkins, 3 T. R. 749; Tanner v. Taylor, referred to by Mr. Justice Buller in the latter case. Memoranda made in the usual course of business, when made up from reports of subordinates, are admissible, under the rule, when accompanied by the testimony of such subordinates that they represent truly what had transpired, combined with that of the person minuting the transactions that they were also truly noted; but not so with merely private memoranda, not made in pursuance of any duty owed by the person making them. New York v. Second Ave. R. Co. 102 N. Y. 581, 55 Am. Rep. 839, 7 N. E. 905. To the same purpose, see Harwood v. Mulry, 8 Gray, 250; Miller v. Shay, 145 Mass. 162, 1 Am. St. Rep. 449, 16 N. E. 468. So the court in the case of The Norma, 15 C. C. A. 553, 35 U. S. App. 421, 68 Fed. 509, where entries were made in the usual way from memoranda furnished by foremen of the time of their workmen, the memoranda being lost, held that the proofs were sufficient as to certain items pertaining to the yacht; the foremen having been called in conjunction with the bookkeeper who made up the account. Citing New York v. Second Ave. R. Co. 102 N. Y. 581, 55 Am. Rep. 839, 7 N. E. 905. Another phase of the question was presented in Peck v. Valentine, 94 N. Y. 569, 571, where the plaintiff, for the purpose of proving that defendant had not entered in his cashbook all the moneys received by him for the sales of lumber, called one Leggett, who testified that he kept on a loose piece of paper an account of moneys received by defendant, which he gave to the plaintiff. This the plaintiff supplemented by his own testimony that he received the memorandum from Leggett and had lost it, but that he had correctly copied the figures into a memorandum book, and that the entries had not been altered; and it was held error to receive the book in evidence, because the memorandum of Leggett was not produced, and he was not called upon to verify its contents. Of a kindred nature is Hematite Min. Co. v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 92 Ga. 268, 18 S. E. 24. In the light of these rules and legal principles, we are of the opinion that the original memoranda of Ellsworth and Whitby, showing the dates of their inspections, should have been produced, if they were unable to testify to the facts thereby recorded without and independently of them. If produced, however, it would have been competent to submit them to the jury, as well as for the witnesses to speak from them. If, on the other hand, they have been lost, and the fact is satisfactorily shown, then the fact of the inspection could be proved by calling the inspectors in conjunction with the clerk in the division foreman's office who made up the present book in the usual course of business, and the book would then become competent evidence to go to the jury. Neither the inspector nor the clerk being able to testify as to the fact of the inspection and the result, with the attendant dates, from present recollection, the necessity for resort to the secondary evidence would thus be shown; otherwise the book could not be introduced. The book is not a memorandum made by the inspectors or under their direction, but it is a reproduction of the original memoranda made by them. It is a memorandum made by the clerk, however, and, when his testimony concerning it is conjoined with that of the inspectors, showing that inspections were made, and that their memoranda have been lost, or that their production is excusable, and they are able at the same time to verify this as being a correct transcript therefrom, there exists no good reason why the book should not go to the jury.

According to the bill of exceptions, the plaintiffs introduced evidence tending to prove that the fire occurred on the 3d day of December, 1902; that it started in a warehouse close to the railroad; that a passenger train passed, and that about fifteen minutes afterwards the fire was discovered; that when first seen it was a "little fire,—looked like a headlight of an engine at a short distance;" and that it started on the roof of a warehouse. This was about 6 o'clock in the morning. Plaintiffs also introduced other evidence tending to show that other trains were seen passing there on previous mornings, and shortly after the fire, and that the engines were frequently seen to throw out sparks sufficient at times to set fire to grass along the way; that the engine hauling the same passenger train was at other times seen to emit sparks, some of them of large size; that the passenger train in question was No. 6, but it was not known what engine was attached to it. Under this record, plaintiffs requested the following instruction: "You are the judges of all the facts in the case, and should the defendant offer proof to establish the fact that the engines and the particular engine claimed to have caused the fire was equipped with the best modern appliances generally used, and that it was in good repair, and operated by careful and skilled mechanics, who were careful at the time, you will nevertheless take all the evidence into consideration, and determine from the whole evidence whether this is true or not; and, in doing this, you will take into consideration any evidence tending to show that other fires were caused by engines of the defendant at other times shortly prior or subsequent to the fire alleged in the complaint, or whether engines of the defendant, or this particular engine, scattered coals or sparks or cinders at the time of this particular fire, or shortly prior or subsequent thereto, in determining whether the defendant has been guilty of negligence or not." This the court modified so as to confine its application to the particular engine which it is claimed caused the fire, and its action in that regard is assigned as error. The particular engine that did the damage not having been identified by plaintiffs' pleadings or proof, plaintiffs were entitled to the instruction requested. 2 Thomp. Neg. 2371-2374; Koontz v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 20 Or. 3, 23 Pac. 820. The one given had the effect of saying to the jury at the last that, although evidence had been admitted tending to show that other engines than the one claimed by the defendant to have set the fire had shortly previous, and subsequent thereto, in passing in proximity to the place, scattered and communicated fire, they need not consider such evidence, but only such of the kind as related to the particular engine in question, in arriving at their verdict in the case.

This was error, for which the judgment of the Circuit Court will be reversed, and the cause remanded for such further proceedings as may seem proper.

1. A decree for defendant in an action to compel the surrender of corporate bonds to a corporation which had succeeded to the rights of the one which issued them, on the ground that they had been wrongfully transferred by one in whose hands they had been placed for negotiation for the benefit of the corporation, will estop the corporation plaintiff, in a subsequent suit to foreclose the mortgage by which the bonds are secured, from setting up that they had been paid, or that the present plaintiff's grantor was present when the corporation that issued the bonds transferred its property to the present defendant, and knew that the latter understood that it was acquiring the property free from the lien of the mortgage, since these were matters which should have been tried in the former suit.
2. A decree denying the right of a corporation to have bonds secured by mortgage on its property surrendered by a pledgee who was seeking to foreclose its lien on the bonds against the pledgee, on the ground that the bonds had been wrongfully put upon the market and had never been rightfully negotiated, is no bar to a subsequent suit against the corporation to foreclose the mortgage by which they are secured, since the latter question could not have been determined in the former action.

(December 12, 1904.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Union County in favor of defendants in an action brought to foreclose a mortgage. Reversed.

Statement by Bean, J.:

In January, 1893, the Union Railway Company issued and delivered to J. W. Shelton twenty bonds, of the par value of $1,000 each, secured by mortgage on its property. Shelton sold four of the bonds, and they came into the hands of F. L. Richmond and W. T. Wright. Wright and Richmond borrowed $1,500 of the First National Bank of Union on their promissory note, and deposited the four bonds as collateral security therefor, under an agreement that in case the note was not paid at maturity the bank might, at its option as to time and manner, and without notice to the pledgees, sell the bonds at public or private sale to pay the amount due on the note, together with accruing interest and costs. Default was made in payment of the note, and the bank elected and undertook to foreclose its lien upon the bonds in the manner provided in the agreement, whereupon the defendant the Union Street Railway Company, which had purchased the mortgaged property after the bonds had been transferred to the bank, brought a suit in equity to compel the bank to surrender up such bonds for cancellation, on the ground that they were issued in trust to Shelton, in order that he might negotiate them to intending purchasers for the use and benefit of the company, and had been delivered to the bank by Shelton for safe-keeping until so sold and disposed of; that no sale had been made, and therefore, in equity, they belonged to the plaintiff, as the purchaser of the property covered by the mortgage given to secure the payment thereof. Issue was joined, and the suit tried and determined on the merits, resulting in a decree in favor of the defendants. Union Street R. Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 42 Or. 606, 72 Pac. 586, 73 Pac. 341. The bank thereafter foreclosed its lien upon the bonds, and sold them to the present plaintiff, who brings this suit to enforce the mortgage given by the railway company to secure the payment thereof. For a defense to the present suit, the defendants allege, in brief, (1) that the bonds were paid in full to the bank out of the money paid by the promoters of the Union Street Railway Company for the mortgaged property; and (2) that W. T. Wright, the president of the bank, was present at, and participated in, the negotiations for the purchase, and knew that such promoters understood and believed at the time that such purchase would be free of all liens and encumbrances, notwithstanding which he failed and neglected to disclose to them the lien of the bank on the four bonds in suit, but permitted them to pay over the money and take a conveyance of the property in ignorance thereof, and therefore the bank and its successor with knowledge should now be estopped from asserting that such bonds are a lien upon the property. The plaintiff pleaded the decree in the former suit as a bar, and averred that all the matters and things now alleged as a defense to the present suit were known to the defendants at the time the former suit was commenced, and should have been alleged therein as a ground of recovery. The court below held the former decree not a bar or estoppel, found the facts in favor of the defendants, and dismissed plaintiff's complaint.

The issues in Union Street R. Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 42 Or. 606, 72 Pac. 586, 73 Pac. 341, were: First. Plaintiff's right to have the bonds and mortgage securing the same surrendered up and canceled, and the defendant's corresponding primary duty so to do; and second, the delict or wrongful act or omission of defendant by which primary right and duty have been violated.

The issues in the case at bar presented by the defendants are identical with those presented and tried in the former case, for the reason that the same evidence supports both the present defense and the former suit.

The essential qualities of res judicata are: "There must be a suit, actor, reus, judex, and the judgment must be final; that is, it must settle the matter which it purports to conclude."

Wells, Res Adjudicata, p. 8.

Bean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon the record, we have substantially this state of facts: A party commenced a suit against another to compel the surrendering up for cancelation of negotiable instruments on the ground that they were never issued for value. Issue was joined, the suit tried on the merits, and a decree rendered in favor of the defendant. At the time the suit was commenced, the plaintiff therein had two other grounds upon which he might have recovered, neither of which, however, he set up or alleged in the complaint. Thereafter, when the defendant in the former suit, or the party who had succeeded to his interest with knowledge, brought an action to enforce the payment of the instruments, and to foreclose the lien given as security therefor, the defendant therein and the plaintiff in the former suit pleads as a defense the two matters which he might have relied upon for relief in his first suit. The question for decision is whether he is estopped by the former decree against him from pleading such defenses.

It is settled law in this state, as elsewhere, that a judgment or decree rendered upon the merits is a final and conclusive determination of the rights of the parties, and a bar to a subsequent proceeding between them upon the same claim or cause of suit, not only as to the matter actually determined, but as to every other matter which the parties might have litigated and had decided as incident to or essentially connected therewith, either as a matter of claim or defense (Neil v. Tolman, 12 Or. 289, 7 Pac. 103; Morrill v. Morrill, 20 Or. 96, 11 L. R. A. 155, 23 Am. St. Rep. 95, 25 Pac. 362; Belle v. Brown, 37 Or. 588, 61 Pac. 1024; White v. Ladd, 41 Or. 324, 93 Am. St. Rep. 732, 68 Pac. 739); but that when the action is upon a different claim or demand the former judgment can only operate as a bar or an estoppel as against matters actually litigated or questions directly in issue in the former action (Barrett v. Failing, 8 Or. 152; Applegate v. Doucell, 15 Or. 513, 16 Pac. 651; LaFollett v. Mitchell, 42 Or. 465, 95 Am. St. Rep. 780, 69 Pac. 916; Caseday v. Lindstrom, 44 Or. 309, 75 Pac. 222; Gentry v. Pacific Live Stock Co. (Or.) 77 Pac. 115). This distinction should always be kept in mind in considering the effect of a former judgment or decree. If the second action or defense is upon the same claim or demand, the former judgment is a bar, not only as to matters actually determined, but such as could have been litigated; but, if it is upon another claim or demand, the former judgment is not a bar, except as to questions actually determined or directly in issue. This case comes within the principle first stated. It is a suit between the same parties and upon the same claim or demand as the former suit. The claim or demand in the first suit brought by the defendant Union Street Railway against the bank was the validity of the bonds, and the right of the bank to enforce them as against it. This is the same identical question presented, and the only one for adjudication, in the present suit. It was determined in the former suit, and the decree therein is a bar to further litigation thereof between the same parties, although the plaintiff therein did not allege or urge all the reasons entitling it to relief as demanded. The law requires a party to try his whole suit or action at one time, and he cannot separate his claim or divide his grounds of recovery or defense. The application of this principle is illustrated by two Federal cases. In Patterson v. Wold, 33 Fed. 791, the plaintiff, a receiver of an insolvent estate, brought a suit to set aside a deed from the insolvent to his son, and a mortgage given by the son to certain creditors of the insolvent; alleging the deed to be without consideration, and the mortgage a fraudulent preference. Judgment was rendered for the defendants. Thereafter the plaintiff brought another suit to avoid the same deed, alleging that the son was a creditor of the father to the amount of $1,200, and that the land was conveyed to him in payment of this debt, and was a fraudulent preference under the statute, and therefore void. The court (Mr. Justice Brewer presiding) held that the first judgment was a bar to the second, although the grounds of recovery were different. After quoting Mr. Pomeroy's analysis of the elements which constitute "a cause of action" (Pom. Rem. & Rem. Rights. § 519), he says: "Now, what is the plaintiff's primary right, as alleged in these cases? Obviously, in each the same,—the right to have the land; and the defendant's corresponding primary duty is to let him have the land; and the defendant's delict or wrongful act is the failure to let him have the land. These exist in each case, and in each case alike. It is true, the basis of complainant's primary right is, as alleged, different in one case from that in the other, but this is mere difference, in the language of the Supreme Court, in 'the grounds of recovery.' The mere fact that different testimony would be necessary to sustain the different allegations in the two bills does not of itself necessarily make two distinct causes of action. Take this illustration: Suppose a party bring suit to recover possession of real estate, and alleges in his complaint that he is owner by virtue of a patent from the government. After a judgment against him, would he be permitted to maintain a second action, alleging that he was the owner by virtue of certain tax proceedings or by virtue of a judicial sale? Yet different testimony would be required to sustain his allegations in the two actions. In both of such actions plaintiff's primary right—that of possession based on ownership—would be the same, the only difference being in the grounds of recovery. All the grounds of recovery, all the basis of plaintiff's title, must be presented in the first action, or they are lost to him forever, exactly the same as when a party sued upon a note, and having several defenses, pleads only one,—the balance are as though they never existed. The party who has his day in court must make his entire showing. He cannot support a claim or a defense in different actions on different grounds." The recent case of United States v. California & O. Land Co. 192 U. S. 355, 48 L. ed. 476, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 266, was a suit by the government for the purpose of having a certain patent of land declared void on the ground that the land was in Klamath Indian reservation, and therefore not within the provisions of the grant to the company. One plea of the land company was that the plaintiff had filed an earlier bill against it to avoid the same patent, that it had pleaded matter showing the patent to be valid, and that it was an innocent purchaser, and that a final decree on the merits had been rendered in its favor. The circuit court held the plea to be bad, but upon an appeal the Supreme Court reversed the case, holding that the former decree was a bar, although the grounds of recovery were essentially different, and it was urged that the plaintiff was suing in a different capacity from that in which it brought the first suit. The court, by Mr. Justice Holmes, said: "On the general principles of our law, it is tolerably plain that the decree in the suit, under the foregoing statute, would be a bar. The parties, the subject-matter, and the relief sought all were the same. . . . Here the plaintiff is the same person that brought the former bill, whatever the difference of the interest intended to be asserted. . . . The best that can be said, apart from the act just quoted, to distinguish the two suits, is that now the United States puts forward a new ground for its prayer. Formerly it sought to avoid the patents by way of forfeiture. Now it seeks the same conclusion by a different means; that is to say, by evidence that the lands originally were excepted from the grant. But in this as in the former suit it seeks to establish its own title to the fee. It may be the law in Scotland that a judgment is not a bar to a second attempt to reach the same result by a different medium concludendi. . . . But the whole tendency of our decisions is to require a plaintiff to try his whole cause of action and his whole case at one time. He cannot even split up his claim . . . and a fortiori he cannot divide the grounds of recovery. Unless the statute of 1889 put the former suit upon a peculiar footing, the United States was bound then to bring forward all the grounds it had for declaring the patents void, and, when the bill was dismissed, was barred as to all by the decree." These two cases and the principles applied are decisive of the present suit. The claim or demand of the defendant Union Street Railway Company in the suit brought by it was that the bank had no interest in the bonds, and they should be surrendered up for cancellation. The reasons why this should be done were not the cause of action or primary subject of inquiry. There may have been many reasons why the bonds should have been surrendered up and canceled, and why the bank could not enforce them as against the property of the railway company; but, if the plaintiff in that suit was content to rely upon only one of such reasons as a ground for recovery, the others are lost to it as completely as if they never existed.

The position that the decree in the former suit is a bar to the right of the plaintiff to foreclose the mortgage given to secure the payment of the bonds is untenable, because that matter was not germane to or connected with the cause of action or suit, and did not in any way affect the merits of the controversy then before the court for determination. The bank was not the owner of the bonds, but held them as collateral security for the debt of persons not parties to the suit. It was bound by the terms of the contract between it and the pledgeors, and no decree of foreclosure could have been made in the former suit, because the proper parties were not before the court. Union Street R. Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 42 Or. 606, 72 Pac. 586, 73 Pac. 341.

The decree of the court below will, therefore, be reversed, and one entered here as prayed for in the complaint.

sustain the plea by showing that the particular matter in controversy was necessarily or actually determined in the former litigation; and if it appear, from the record introduced in support of the plea, that several issues were involved in such litigation, and the verdict and judgment do not clearly show that this particular issue was then decided, before such plea can be sustained this uncertainty must be removed by extrinsic evidence showing that such matter was then decided in accordance with the contention of the party relying upon the plea.

2. Evidence offered in opposition to such plea, which shows that in the former litigation the parties alleged to be estopped by the judgment therein sought to so amend their pleading as to have the question in controversy in the subsequent litigation determined, and that the court disallowed such amendment, is admissible.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Gwinnett County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce defendant's liability as indorser of a promissory note. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Messrs. N. L. Hutchins and O. H. Brand for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. T. M. Peeples, N. L. Hutchins, Jr., and Atkinson & Barn for defendant in error.

Fish, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plea of res judicata in the present case is more properly a plea of estoppel by judgment, as the decree relied on in support of the plea was not rendered in a case involving the same cause of action. Medlock's equitable action against Moore, Marsh, & Co., in which this decree was rendered, was brought for the purpose of setting up his defenses to the suit which they had instituted against him in the city court of Lawrenceville upon the three promissory notes which he individually had executed to them, and obtaining certain equitable relief, such as the cancelation of a security deed, etc., which he could not obtain in the city court. This action by Medlock was not an independent suit, but was merely in the nature of an equitable answer to the suit against him in the city court. It is evident that the cause of action in the suit brought by Moore, Marsh, & Co. against Medlock in the city court, which was tried under his equitable action in the superior court, was entirely different and distinct from the cause of action in the present case. In the suit in the city court the action was based upon three promissory notes given by Medlock to Moore, Marsh, & Co., payable to their order, and signed by him alone as maker. In the case in hand the suit is based upon Medlock's indorsements of two promissory notes, each payable to his own order, signed by Zachry and Richmond as makers, indorsed in blank by Medlock, and transferred to Moore, Marsh, & Co. It is clear that the two suits were upon different instruments or obligations, and the liability upon which the plaintiffs in the suit in the city court sought to recover against Medlock was different from that upon which the plaintiffs in the present case seek to recover against him. Hill v. Freeman, 7 Ga. 211, 220; Worth v. Carmichael, 114 Ga. 699, 40 S. E. 797. In the case last cited it was held: "A judgment rendered in litigation between the same parties is not conclusive in a subsequent suit between them on a different cause of action, except as to issues actually made and determined in the former litigation. Accordingly, where two notes were given upon a consideration arising in one and the same transaction, a judgment rendered in favor of the payee against the maker upon one of such notes did not operate to estop the latter from setting up in a subsequent action brought by the former against him on the other note a defense which was not in issue when the judgment was rendered." If two notes given by the same maker to the same payee upon a consideration arising in one and the same transaction, when sued upon separately, represent different causes of action, then it is perfectly obvious that the suit against Medlock in the city court of Lawrenceville upon the three promissory notes payable to the order of Moore, Marsh, & Co., signed by him as maker, was upon a different cause of action from that involved in the present suit in the superior court of Gwinnett county against him upon his indorsements of two notes payable to his own order, and executed by Zachry and Richmond as makers. Even if, in comparing the causes of action, we look merely to the present case, and to whatever cause of action Medlock may be said to have had in his equitable action against Moore, Marsh, & Co., ignoring the fact that that was merely in the nature of an equitable answer to their suit against him, it seems hardly necessary to say that his cause of action in that proceeding was different from the cause of action of the plaintiffs in the present case against him. Whatever cause of action he had and set up then is obliged to be different and distinct from the cause of action set up against him now.

As "a judgment rendered in litigation between the same parties is not conclusive in a subsequent suit between them on a different cause of action, except as to issues actually made and determined in the former litigation," the question arises whether, in the case under consideration, Medlock showed that in the former litigation, upon the result of which he relied to support his plea of res judicata, the issue as to his liability to Moore, Marsh, & Co. upon his indorsements of the two Zachry and Richmond notes now sued on was both made and determined. For him to sustain his defense of estoppel by judgment, it was necessary for him to show not only that this issue was raised in the former litigation, but also that it was then determined in his favor. The defenses which he then set up were contradictory and inconsistent. One of them was that the two notes of Zachry and Richmond, payable to the order of Medlock, upon the indorsement of which he is sued in the present case, had been accepted by Moore, Marsh, & Co. as payment pro tanto of his indebtedness to them, for which he was entitled to a credit upon the notes on which they were then suing him, and that he had subsequently paid to them the balance left due thereon in cash. It is obvious that, if this defense was found by the jury to be sustained by the evidence, their verdict, finding generally in his favor, and that his three individual notes and the deed which he had given to secure them be surrendered and canceled, and Moore, Marsh, & Co. be required to execute a deed reconveying the property described in the security deed to him, naturally followed; and it was wholly unnecessary for them to pass upon the merits of his other defenses. It is impossible to tell, from the record introduced in support of the plea of estoppel by judgment, upon which of the defenses set up by Medlock in his equitable proceeding against Moore, Marsh, & Co. the verdict therein was rendered, as the verdict was general. It is evident that, if that verdict was based upon the above-stated defense, the decree founded thereon is no bar to the present action against him, for the verdict would then mean no more than that Medlock, after paying his three individual notes which he had given to Moore, Marsh, & Co., with the two notes of Zachry and Richmond, indorsed by him, and a certain sum in cash to cover the balance, was entitled to have these individual notes surrendered to him, and the deed which he had given to secure them canceled, and the property therein described reconveyed to him.

A case decided by this court which is directly in point is Hunter v. Davis, 19 Ga. 413, where it was held: "A judgment is not a technical estoppel as to any matter, if the matter is not such that it had, of necessity, to be determined by the court and jury before the court could give the judgment." In that case the original trustee named in a deed which conveyed certain negroes and other property in trust for specified purposes and beneficiaries had been removed for cause, and another trustee appointed in his stead; and the new trustee had brought an action of trover for the recovery of four of these negroes, against the person who had them in possession, who was the husband of one of the beneficiaries. Upon the trial of this action the defendant introduced in evidence a transcript of the record of a suit in equity against him and his wife and the original trustee, brought by the other beneficiaries of the trust, and relied upon the decree therein rendered as an estoppel upon the plaintiff in the trover suit. Upon the trial of the trover case, the judge, in effect, charged the jury that the plaintiff, being a party to the decree, was estopped from denying the right of the defendant to hold the negroes during the lifetime of his wife. This court held such charge to be erroneous, upon the ground that, in order for the decree in the equity cause to be rendered, "it was not a matter of necessity that the court should first determine the question" which was involved in the trover suit. Benning, J., who delivered the opinion, said: "Was the right asserted in the action of trover such that it had, of necessity, to be determined by the court in the equity suit before it could render the decree which it did render in that suit?" Then, after discussing this question, he concluded that "it was at least not a matter of necessity that the court, before making the decree, . . . should have determined" this question, and that therefore the decree could be no bar to the action of trover.

Another case which is equally in point is Bradley v. Johnson, 49 Ga. 412. In that case the complainant, as the widow and heir at law of Bradley, filed a bill against the defendant, as the administrator of Bradley, for an accounting and distribution of Bradley's estate, with a prayer for injunction. On the trial of the case, Johnson, the defendant administrator, introduced in evidence an exemplification from the court of ordinary of the county, from which it appeared that he had made application to that court for letters of administration upon such estate, to which the complainant had entered a caveat, claiming that she, as the widow of Bradley, was entitled to the administration; that the ordinary had granted letters of administration to her; that an appeal had been entered to the superior court; and that the trial in that court resulted in a judgment that the appellant, Johnson, was entitled to administration upon Bradley's estate, which judgment had been certified to the court of ordinary and made the judgment of that court. The administrator relied upon this evidence as showing that the question whether the complainant was the widow of Bradley had been made in the case in the court of ordinary, and there determined against her; and, upon such evidence, under the charge of the court, he obtained a verdict and judgment in his favor. This court, in reversing the judgment, held that the judgment in the court of ordinary "was conclusive as to the fact that letters of administration had been granted to Johnson on Bradley's estate, when offered in evidence on the trial of the equity cause, but it was not conclusive on that trial upon the point as to whether the complainant was the widow of Bradley;"

that it was not an adjudication directly upon that point, and did not purport to decide that question. In the opinion of the court, Chief Justice Warner, after saying this much, continued as follows: "Moreover, it does not affirmatively appear from the verdict and judgment thereon that the fact of her being the widow of Bradley was the only question made and decided by the judgment of the court of ordinary. . . .

The judgment itself is not directly upon that point, and, unless the judgment of the court of ordinary was rendered directly upon that point, as shown by the record, the complainant was not estopped by that judgment from proving that she was the widow of Bradley, on the trial of the equity cause." Upon a subsequent trial of the case in the superior court, the trial judge held that the complainant was estopped by the judgment in the court of ordinary, and the jury, under his charge, found in favor of the administrator; and, upon writ of error to this court, the judgment was again reversed. This court then held: "A judgment in the court of ordinary, on an issue as to the grant of administration on an estate, that the letters do issue to one Johnson, does not estop a woman claiming to be the widow of the deceased from the assertion of her right to the estate by bill in equity, though she was a party to the suit in the ordinary's court, and the question there was as to her marriage to deceased, and though Johnson was contesting with her at the instance of the heirs at law of deceased." [55 Ga. 354.] Judge Jackson, delivering the opinion, said that the facts in the record did not affect the principle ruled in 49 Ga., and that it was "immaterial for what reason the ordinary granted Johnson the administration; he was not bound to pass upon the question of the marriage,"—and quoted the headnote in Hunter v. Davis, 19 Ga. 413. To the same effect, see Henderson v. Fox, 80 Ga. 479, 6 S. E. 164.

A leading case in this country, which has been often approvingly cited and followed, is Russell v. Place, 94 U. S. 606, 608, 24 L. ed. 214, 215, in which it was held: "It is undoubtedly settled law that a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction upon a question directly involved in one suit is conclusive as to that question in another suit between the same parties. But to this operation of the judgment it must appear, either upon the face of the record, or be shown by extrinsic evidence, that the precise question was raised and determined in the former suit. If there be any uncertainty on this head in the record,—as, for example, if it appear that several distinct matters may have been litigated, upon one or more of which the judgment may have passed, without indicating which of them was thus litigated and upon which the judgment was rendered,—the whole subject-matter of the action will be at large and open to a new contention, unless this uncertainty be removed by extrinsic evidence showing the precise point involved and determined." This case was followed in De Sollar v. Hanscome, 158 U. S. 221, 39 L. ed. 959, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 816, the facts of which case make the decision there rendered peculiarly in point in the case with which we are dealing. In that case De Sollar filed a bill against Hanscome for the specific performance of an agreement for the sale of certain real estate, made with him by an agent of the defendant. The defendant claimed that the agent had exceeded his authority, but the plaintiff contended that the defendant, after full knowledge of the agreement made by his agent, had ratified it. De Sollar also contended that, by a judgment which had been rendered in his favor in a common-law action which Hanscome had instituted against him to recover damages alleged to have been sustained in consequence of his having placed this agreement and a certain letter written by Hanscome to his agent upon record, Hanscome was estopped to deny that he had ratified the act of his agent in making the contract in dispute. Mr. Justice Brewer, in delivering the opinion, said: "The plaintiff insists—and that is the burden of his contention—that the judgment in the law action is conclusive as to the fact of defendant's assent to the contract as executed by his agent, while the defendant claims that it settles only that this plaintiff, acting under the advice of counsel in placing the papers on record, was guilty of no wilful or malicious wrong, and therefore not liable in damages." Then, after showing from the charge of the court in the action for damages that the jury trying that case "were at liberty to find for the defendant if they thought that in fact the plaintiff had suffered no damages by the filing for record of the letter and agreement," notwithstanding the judge had charged them that "the chief question" was whether the plaintiff had ratified what had been done in his name by his agent, he said: "There is in this case no extrinsic testimony tending to show upon what the verdict of the jury was based. We have simply the record of the former judgment, including therein the testimony and the charge of the court, from which to determine that fact; and, in the light of the charge, it is obviously a matter of doubt whether the jury found that the agreement made by the agent was ratified by the principal, or that no damage had in fact been sustained by placing the papers upon record. We are not now concerned with the inquiry whether the instructions of the court were correct or not. We look to them simply to see what questions were submitted to the jury, and, if they left it open to the jury to find for the defendant upon either of the two propositions, and the verdict does not specify upon which the jury acted, there can be no certainty that they found upon one rather than the other. The principal contention therefore, of the plaintiff, fails." The principle ruled was stated both in the opinion and the headnote as follows: "It is of the essence of estoppel by judgment that it is certain that the precise fact was determined by the former judgment."

Another case directly in point is Greene v. Merchants, & Planters' Bank, 73 Miss. 542, 19 So. 350, where it was held: "Where one has been sued as acceptor of a lost bill of exchange alleged to have been drawn by a certain firm to its own order, and indorsed by the firm and one of the members thereof, and on his pleas of non est factum and payment, and the evidence in support of the same, the defendant has defeated a recovery, he cannot, in a second suit against him as acceptor of a lost bill in all respects similar to the preceding bill, save that it was alleged to have been drawn not by the firm, but by said member thereof, maintain a plea of res judicata, since it is impossible to say on which of his pleas the jury found for him in the prior suit, and, if not on that of payment, the only matter determined was that he did not accept the particular bill then sued on, which would not preclude an action on the bill that he did accept."

Still another is Augir v. Ryan, 63 Minn. 373, 65 N. W. 640, where it was held: "In order that a former judgment should bind parties in a subsequent action by way of estoppel as to any question of fact, it must appear, from the judgment or by extrinsic evidence, that such question was within the issues of the former action, and actually litigated and determined therein. If such judgment and extrinsic evidence leave it a matter of conjecture as to what questions of fact were litigated and determined in the former action, the judgment is not an estoppel." It appeared in that case, as it does in this, that several defenses had been interposed in the former action, but it did not appear upon what issue the verdict in favor of the defendant was founded.

In Hearn v. Boston & M. R. Co. 67 N. H. 320, 29 Atl. 970, it was held: "A town having been sued for damages caused by an obstruction in a highway, and the person who placed the obstruction there having been notified of the suit and having conducted the defense, a general verdict for the defendant is not a bar to a subsequent suit against such person for the same injuries, since it might have been based upon the lack of notice to the town of the existence of the obstruction; and the testimony of jurors . . . is not competent for the purpose of showing that their verdict was in fact based solely on issues material in the second action." In the opinion, Chase, J., said: "As the record does not show upon which of the issues the former judgment was founded, it was incumbent upon the defendants, in order to establish an estoppel by that judgment, to prove by extrinsic evidence that it was founded upon the matters that are in issue in this action."

The principle is briefly and succinctly stated in Thompson v. N. T. Bushnell Co. 80 Fed. 332, as follows: "Unless it appears from the record or consistent extrinsic evidence that the particular matter sought to be concluded was necessarily tried and determined, so that the judgment could not have been rendered without deciding it, there is no estoppel."

It follows that the trial judge erred when, at the close of the evidence, he withdrew the case from the jury, sustained the plea of res judicata, and dismissed the plaintiffs' action.

2. The plaintiffs offered in evidence a paper which purported to be an amendment which had been offered by Moore, Marsh, & Co. to their answer to the equitable petition of Medlock against them, and which had been disallowed by the court. The court refused to allow this paper to be introduced in evidence, upon the ground that it was no part of the record in the case of Medlock v. Moore, Marsh, & Co. It does not appear that when this paper was offered in evidence any question was raised as to the necessity for proving that it really was what it purported to be. The title and description of the case which appeared at its head was: "R. O. Medlock v. Moore, Marsh, & Co. In Equity, in Gwinnett Superior Court, March Term, 1900." What purported to be the order of the judge disallowing the amendment appeared at the end of the document, in the following language: "This amendment disallowed by the court, the makers of the notes (against whom Medlock, as a surety, would have the right to proceed) not being legally in court." This was signed officially in the name of the judge of the western circuit,—the same judge who was presiding in the trial in the present case. The paper was, as we have seen, excluded simply upon the ground that it was no part of the record in the case to which it purported to relate.

This proposed and rejected amendment prayed that, in the event it should be determined that Moore, Marsh, & Co. had, as alleged by Medlock, accepted the two notes of Zachry and Richmond, payable to the order of Medlock, and indorsed by him, in part payment of the three individual notes of Medlock, upon which they were suing him in the city court of Lawrenceville, then they should have judgment against him for the amount of the Zachry and Richmond notes. While this paper could not be introduced as a part of the record in the case of Medlock v. Moore, Marsh, & Co., yet it showed upon its face that in that case Moore, Marsh, & Co. had sought to have the question as to their right to recover against Medlock as indorser upon the very two notes now sued on determined, in the event the jury should find that they, as alleged by him, had accepted these notes as payment pro tanto of his three individual notes upon which they were then suing him, and that they were not allowed to do so because Zachry and Richmond were not parties to that case. This was a circumstance tending to show that the court did not then consider that the question of Medlock's liability as indorser on the Zachry and Richmond notes was involved in that case, and that it was not determined by the judgment which is relied upon in the present case as an estoppel. We are clearly of opinion that the mere fact that this paper was no part of the record in the case of Medlock v. Moore, Marsh, & Co. did not render it inadmissible in evidence. Butler v. Tifton, T. & G. R. Co. 121 Ga. 817, 49 S. E. 763.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

City of NEW CASTLE, Appt.,

v.

Julia Maria KURTZ et al.

(210 Pa. 183.)

1. A municipal corporation which has imposed the duty upon property owners of keeping the sidewalks in front of their property free from ice under penalty, and has provided that, in case of their neglect to remove the ice, it will be removed by the city at their expense, assumes the duty of keeping the walks clear; and, in case it is held liable for injury to one falling upon the walk, it cannot recover over against the property owner on the theory that he was primarily liable for the injury.

2. Owners of property in possession of tenants are not bound to keep watch to see that ice dangerous to travel does not form on the walks in front of it which are properly constructed and in proper repair, where their negligent construction of their buildings does not contribute to its formation; and therefore they cannot be held liable for injuries to a traveler by falling upon ice of the existence of which they have no notice.

3. Placing a conductor pipe so as to lead water from the roof of a building adjoining a sidewalk and empty it upon the walk in the manner customary in the community is not a nuisance per se, where it does not ordinarily interfere with travel; and the property owner cannot be held liable to one who is injured by ice formed upon the walk many years after the construction of the pipe, as the result of a severe and unusual storm.

(December 31, 1904.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Lawrence County in favor of defendants in an action brought to hold them liable for damages which plaintiff had been compelled to pay because of an injury to a traveler who fell upon the sidewalk in front of their property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James A. Gardner and Robert K. Aiken, for appellant:

Defendants created and maintained a public nuisance,—an obstruction upon the sidewalk, a hindrance and a danger to public travel.

The primary duty of keeping the sidewalk in repair is upon the abutting property owner.

The nuisance in this case was occasioned by the construction of the conductors without any provision being made to carry the water across or under the sidewalk, and was a continual nuisance of which the defendants had notice.

The casting of the water from the roofs of the buildings, through a large conductor, out upon the sidewalk, there to freeze in a ridge of ice, without making any provision to carry the same away, was clearly a nuisance.

The provision in the sidewalk ordinance introduced by the defendants under objections, which required the street commissioner to see that "the work is done, or caused to be done, according to the provisions of this ordinance," or like provisions, imposed no duty or liability on the city.

The only defenses open to a defendant in cases involving defects in the sidewalk are, (1) that he did not own the property, (2) that he was not under any duty or obligation to keep the sidewalk in good repair, (3) that the accident did not happen through any neglect of duty on his part.

Fowler v. Jersey Shore, 17 Pa. Super. Ct. 372.

While the city may be primarily liable to a person injured, by reason of its duty to see that the sidewalk is reasonably safe, yet the primary duty of keeping a sidewalk in order is upon the property owner, and that of the city is secondary. The negligence of the city consisted in not compelling the property owners to remove the defect or nuisance.

The city is not liable for a defect or nuisance not occasioned by its own act, unless it had actual or constructive notice of the nuisance; and it was just because of this notice that the city became liable to Dean.

Duncan v. Philadelphia, 173 Pa. 550, 51 Am. St. Rep. 780, 34 Atl. 235; Dean v. New Castle, 201 Pa. 51, 50 Atl. 310.

Messrs. S. W. Dana, D. B. Kurtz, Aaron L. Hazen, Oscar L. Jackson, and Richard F. Dana, for appellees:

By ordinances for many years the city recognized these conductors by providing that there should be gutters across the sidewalk sufficient to carry the water coming from them. Such conductors were a usual and common means of bringing water from roofs, and were reasonably necessary.

Even though Dean might have recovered against the owners, the city, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, should not be subrogated to Dean's action against them, and is without remedy.

Dill. Mun. Corp. § 795.

When a charter imposes upon lot owners the duty of keeping the sidewalk in repair, and free from snow or ice or other obstructions; and also provides that the superintendent of streets shall repair any sidewalk where the owner of the property neglects to repair the same for a fixed number of days after the service upon him of a written notice so to do, and that the superintendent shall collect the expense of such repair from the owner of the property,—it only imposes upon the owner a statutory liability for the expense of such repairs. It does not directly and specifically make him liable for any damages in case of personal injury to persons from a failure to keep such sidewalks in repair; and the municipality, though it may in an action be held liable to the person injured, and pay the same, cannot maintain the action against the lot owner for indemnity.

Dean could not have recovered against the owners if he had sued them instead of the city. They are liable, under the ordinance, to the penalty, and to reimburse the expense of clearing, but are under no new liability to persons injured through the non-observance of the same.

The owners being out of possession, the premises being in the possession of their respective tenants, and the landlords being under no obligation by contract to keep the sidewalk in repair, the owners would not be liable to persons who might be injured by defects arising in the sidewalk for want of repairs while so in possession of the tenants.

Bears v. Ambler, 9 Pa. 193; Early v. Ashworth, 15 W. N. C. 142; Tout v. Philadelphia, 173 Pa. 314, 33 Atl. 1034; Grier v. Sampson, 27 Pa. 183.

Abutting owners are not liable to passengers for personal injuries, caused by defects in, or want of repairs of, a sidewalk, arising while the owners are not in possession, but the premises are in possession of their tenants, and the owners are under no contract to repair. The liability is by virtue of city ordinances; and, if there was no liability by the common law, none would result from the ordinances.

Lowell v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 23 Pick. 24, 34 Am. Dec. 33; Rochester v. Campbell, 123 N. Y. 405, 10 L. R. A. 393, 20 Am. St. Rep. 760, 25 N. E. 937; Wilhelm v. Defiance, 58 Ohio St. 56, 40 L. R. A. 294, 65 Am. St. Rep. 745, 50 N. E. 18.

The right of the city to recover at all is one existing in pure equity. In order to have any right in equity to be subrogated to the right of Dean against the owners, the city must itself have done equity.

The street commissioner had express notice of the ice ridge and its very dangerous character, and also was personally present and viewed it, and could easily have removed it, or notified the tenants, while the owners were not in possession, and could and did know nothing of it. It was his duty, as between the city and the owners, to have done one or the other; and still he did nothing.

Such neglect would be criminal. Both officer and the city would be indictable for it.

2 Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 745-747; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 1761, note; Wharton, Crimes, §§ 1594a, 1591-1593.

Against such criminal neglect the city can get no indemnity.

Weckerly v. German Lutheran Congregation, 3 Rawle, 172.

Certainly what the city cannot get in law, equity will not decree.

Further, the persons against whom the indemnity is claimed are entirely ignorant of wrong, and, if negligent at all, are so merely by intentment of law.

Weekerly v. German Lutheran Congregation, 3 Rawle, 172; Coventry v. Barton, 17 Johns. 144, 7 Am. Dec. 376; Doe ex dem. Cheny v. Batten, 1 Cowp. 243.

If the city, knowing of the ridge of ice, and knowing, also, the necessary want of knowledge on part of the owners, had done its duty, there could have been no accident. It is therefore in the same situation as a plaintiff seeking to recover when his own neglect contributed to the injury.

Armstrong County v. Clarion County, 66 Pa. 218, 5 Am. Rep. 368; Horbach v. Elder, 18 Pa. 33.

Thompson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action by the appellant to recover from the appellees the amount of a verdict that it was by suit compelled to pay to a person who had been injured by a fall caused by a ridge of ice formed in front of, and upon the pavement of, the properties owned by the appellees, and occupied by tenants. The liability of the appellant in that action sprang from the actual notice to it of the dangerous condition of the ice upon the pavement, and, after such notice, its neglect to remove it. The proof there was that its street commissioner had express notice of the ridge of ice that caused the accident, and its dangerous character. Having such notice, and having failed to perform its duty, and having been mulcted in damages for such failure of duty, appellant now seeks to recover the amount of such damages from appellees, who had no notice or knowledge of the condition of the ice on the pavement, and whose properties were in the occupancy of tenants.

The principle underlying the right to be reimbursed for damages paid by a municipality in cases of accident is that the owner or occupier of the property, as the case may be, is primarily liable to the person injured. The right of subrogation springs from that liability. The primary liability in that case was upon the appellant. It assumed the duty of removing the ice. By its ordinance it required owners, tenants, or occupiers of properties to remove the ice in front of the same before 10 o'clock of the next day after its accumulation, and, failing to do so, to be liable to a fine; and, in case the owner or occupier did not remove when so required, it undertook to do so. The appellant, having undertaken that duty, had express notice of the condition of the ice and the necessity for its removal. Thus its negligence arose directly from its failure to perform it. It now practically seeks to have a right of subrogation for the repayment of the damages which were the direct consequence of its own negligence. It is an attempt, therefore, to make a wrong, and not a right, the basis of such subrogation. In 2 Smith's Municipal Corporations, § 1305, it is said: "But where a charter imposes upon lot owners the duty of keeping the sidewalk . . . in repair, and free from snow or ice or other obstruction, and also provides that the superintendent of streets should repair any sidewalk when the owner of the property neglected to repair the same for a fixed number of days after the service upon him of a written notice to do so, and that the superintendent should collect the expense of such repair from the owner of the property, it only imposes upon the lot owner a statutory liability for the expense of such repairs. It does not directly and specifically make him liable for any damages in case of personal injury to persons from a failure to keep such sidewalks in repair, and the municipality, though it may in an action be held liable to the person injured, and pay the same, cannot maintain the action against the lot owner for indemnity." He there cites numerous authorities to sustain the above.

The failure of the appellant to remove the ice ridge in question, with notice of its dangerous condition, or to give notice to the tenants to remove it promptly, or, in case of their failure, to do so at their expense, negatives an equal liability basis upon which to build a right in equity for subrogation against the appellees, the owners of the property, not in occupancy, and without the slightest knowledge or information in regard to the condition of the pavement; but, in any contingency, the right to reimbursement by appellant could only spring from a liability of the appellees, which Dean, who recovered a verdict against the appellant, might have enforced against them. They were the owners of the properties, and their tenants were, and had been for many years, the actual occupiers of them. The accident was not caused by the bad condition of the pavement or its want of repair, but by a sudden accumulation of ice, to which water from the buildings may have contributed. It was an unusual condition produced by the elements, and seemed to have had no similar recurrence in a period of many years. Whatever the duties of the tenants to keep the pavements free and clear of ice may have been, the appellees, out of possession, with the pavement in proper repair, and the properties properly constructed and also in proper repair, were not bound to keep watch and guard over the pavement to prevent the formation of ridges of ice upon it; and, if so, they cannot be held liable for an injury consequent upon a sudden accumulation of ice there. In Lohr v. Philipsburg, 156 Pa. 246, 27 Atl. 133, Mr. Justice Mitchell said: "In the recent case of Burns v. Bradford, 137 Pa. 361, 11 L. R. A. 726, 20 Atl. 997, our Brother McCollum said: 'A municipal corporation is not an insurer against all defects in its highways, but it is answerable for negligence in the performance of its duties in the construction and care of them. For a defect arising in them without its fault or neglect, it is not liable, unless it has express notice, or the defect be so notorious as to be evident to all passers.'" It was accordingly held in that case that, although "it is a fact well known to the inhabitants of all our municipalities that sidewalks are liable in the winter to be thrown out of level by the action of the frost," yet the plaintiff, who was injured—very much in the same manner as the present plaintiff was—by the stringers of a plank walk being raised higher on one side than the other, could not recover without proof that the defect was observable by all passers. So here the proper instruction to the jury should be that the borough was bound to keep a reasonable supervision over the condition of its sidewalks, but it was not liable for negligence unless it had actual notice or knowledge of the defect complained of, or it was so plain to observation and had existed so long a time that officers exercising a reasonable supervision ought to have observed it.

The primary liability on the part of the owner out of occupancy may arise where the injury is the result of negligence springing from a failure to repair a pavement, but where no such condition exists, and there is no failure of duty in regard to any repairs, no negligence can be said to be attributed to him. There was no evidence in this case that the pavement was in a bad condition or out of repair, and none that there was danger by reason of the failure to construct across it a gutter to the street. No such gutters were laid across pavements in the locality, and none required. This is apparent from the fact that there was no proper storm gutter in the street to carry off water, and especially so in the case of appellees' pavement, as a telegraph pole over a foot in diameter had been erected, under the direction of appellant's engineer, directly opposite the waterspout from appellees' property, which precluded the construction of a small gutter. It is, however, manifest that, if even a small gutter had been constructed across the pavement, under the stress of the intense weather which caused the ridge of ice upon the pavement it would not have successfully operated to prevent such accumulation. It follows, then, that, unless there was such a failure of duty on the part of the appellees in the construction of a water pipe as resulted in a nuisance per se, continuing as such, no liability on their part could arise. The conductor or waterspout was constructed at the time of the erection of these houses, some twenty years previous, was such as was in common use, was proper and necessary to remove water from the roof of the houses, and was so recognized. As its construction was proper, and as it was used for a necessary purpose, and as it was not out of repair, it was not a nuisance per se, and the fact that a severe storm at some remote period of time might possibly cause an unusual flow of water would not necessarily make it so. There is no evidence that any such flow ever previously made any mischief. Such being the case, there was no such failure of duty on the part of appellees as to be the foundation of any liability. The case of Brown v. White, 202 Pa. 297, 58 L. R. A. 321, 51 Atl. 962, was a case in which the construction was a nuisance per se, and the owner's liability was placed distinctly upon that ground; and Mr. Justice Mestrezat, quoting from the case of Knauss v. Brua, 107 Pa. 85, says: "But the converse of this proposition is also true: If the premises are so constructed, or in such a condition, that the continuance of their use by the tenant must result in a nuisance to a third person, and a nuisance does so result, the landlord is liable."

The learned trial judge was not guilty of error in giving binding instructions for the appellees, and this judgment is affirmed.

4. One appointed guardian of another because of his lack of discretion to manage his estate has no authority over the person of his ward, which will entitle him to separate him from his wife.

(July 28, 1904.)

PETITION for a writ of habeas corpus to obtain the release of Henry C. Chace from the custody of Andrew D. Wilson, who was attempting to exercise control over him as his guardian. Granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George S. Engle, F. P. Owen, and Willis B. Richardson for petitioner.

Mr. Clarence A. Aldrich for respondent.

Tillinghast, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a petition for a writ of habeas corpus brought by Elizabeth E. Chace in behalf of her husband, Henry C. Chace. The material facts in the case are these: On the 23d day of May, 1899, Andrew D. Wilson was appointed guardian of the person and estate of said Henry C. Chace, a person of full age, under the provisions of Gen. Laws 1896, chap. 196, § 7, on the ground that, from want of discretion in managing his estate, he was likely to bring himself to want. Subsequently, on the 20th of November 1902, Mr. Chace married his present wife. The marriage was solemnized in Massachusetts, although both of the parties were domiciled in Rhode Island, and it was entered into by Mr. Chace without obtaining the written consent of his guardian, which is made one of the requisites for obtaining a marriage license in this state, under Pub. Laws 1898, 1899, chap. 549, § 11, p. 49. Soon after the marriage, Mr. and Mrs. Chace returned to this state, and lived together as husband and wife for some months, until some time last August, when the guardian aforesaid removed Mr. Chace from his home, against his protest and that of the petitioner. The petitioner avers that the respondent guardian thereupon imprisoned Mr. Chace, and is now unlawfully restraining him of his liberty at No. 9 Lemon street, Providence; that he is deprived of the companionship, assistance, and care of his wife, which he desires; that he is not permitted to have social intercourse with her, save in the presence of his guardian; and that he is being treated in a manner inconsistent with the relation of guardian and ward.

In determining whether the petitioner is entitled to the relief she prays for, the first question calling for decision is whether she was lawfully married to Mr. Chace, for, if not, she shows no standing to petition in his behalf as his wife. It is argued by the counsel for the guardian that the marriage is invalid, and that the petitioner never became the wife of Mr. Chace. The reasons advanced are (1) that by our statute, cited above, a ward is rendered unable to obtain a marriage license without the consent of his guardian, and that no such consent was given by the respondent; (2) that by the provisions of Gen. Laws 1896, chap. 196, § 16, "all contracts, bargains, and conveyances made by any person under guardianship shall be utterly void;" (3) that these provisions show that it is the policy of our law to deny any validity to any kind of a contract which a ward attempts to make, and that therefore, although the marriage took place in Massachusetts, and may have fulfilled the requirements of Massachusetts law, it will not be recognized in this state.

We do not think that any of these arguments are sound. As to the first two, we think it is clear that the statutes relied upon can have no direct application to this marriage, for it was celebrated in another state, and under the provisions of other laws.

The third argument, however, requires more consideration. It is said by counsel for the guardian that "marriage, in evasion of the laws of the domicile, and contrary to the public policy or laws of the domicile will not be recognized as valid." But it must be noticed, in the first place, that it nowhere appears, either in the pleadings or proof, that the marriage involved here was entered into in evasion of the laws of the domicil, and contrary to the public policy thereof. For aught that appears, the parties may have entered into this contract of marriage in the most perfect good faith, and without any intention of evading the laws of Rhode Island. And, as is said by Mr. Bishop in the first volume of his work on Marriage, Divorce, & Separation, §§ 77, 836: "Each particular instance of what is meant for marriage has the aid of all the presumptions, both of law and fact, and equally whether the marriage was domestic or foreign." Furthermore, it is not clear that, even if the marriage had been solemnized in this state, it would have been void. Pub. Laws 1898, 1899, p. 49, chap. 549, § 11, merely provides that no marriage license shall issue to a person under guardianship without the written consent of the guardian; but it by no means necessarily follows that a marriage procured without first obtaining such license would be void, although the official or other person who performed the ceremony might be liable to punishment under § 19 of the same chapter. See Parton v. Hervey, 1 Gray, 119, 121. For, while our statutes prescribe certain formalities and requirements in connection with the entering into the marriage relation, it is to be carefully borne in mind that they nowhere declare that the failure to observe any or all of said formalities or requirements shall have the effect to render a marriage void.

Again, although Gen. Laws 1896, chap. 196, § 16, provides that all contracts made by a ward shall be void, it is at least very questionable whether the legislature intended that section to refer to the contract of marriage. Indeed, the words of the section referring to bargains and conveyances would clearly seem to show that it was only intended to affect contracts relating to property. Certainly the provision is not of universal application for, under Pub. Laws 1898, 1899, chap. 549, § 11, p. 49, there must be an implied exception in the case of a marriage contract to which the guardian consents in writing. Upon the questions of interpretation thus raised, however, we refrain from expressing any opinion, as we think that, even assuming that the marriage would have been void in this state, yet, as, so far as appears, it was lawfully celebrated in Massachusetts, it must be considered valid here. We are aware that the authorities are not entirely uniform upon this point, now for the first time presented in Rhode Island; but the general principle, as we gather it from text writers and decisions, both English and American, is that the capacity or incapacity to marry depends on the law of the place where the marriage is celebrated, and not on that of the domicil of the parties. Story, Conf.

L. 8th ed. § 89. See Id. §§ 113, 121, 123a, 123b; Bishop, Marr. Div. & Sep. § 843, and cases cited; Putnam v. Putnam, 8 Pick. 433; West Cambridge v. Lexington, 1 Pick. 506, 11 Am. Dec. 231; Van Voorhis v. Brintnall, 86 N. Y. 18, 40 Am. Rep. 505. In Medway v. Needham, 16 Mass. 157, 8 Am. Dec. 131, a statute made a marriage between a negro or mulatto and a white person void. A couple, one of whom was a mulatto and the other white, in order to evade the statute, came into Rhode Island, where such connections were allowed, were there married, and immediately returned. And the marriage, being good in Rhode Island, was held to be good in Massachusetts. The reasoning upon which these cases proceed is well stated by Sir Edward Simpson in Scrimshire, v. Scrimshire, 2 Hagg. Consist. Rep. 395. He says on page 417: "All nations allow marriage contracts. They are juris gentium, and the subjects of all nations are equally concerned in them; and from the infinite mischief and confusion that must necessarily arise to the subjects of all nations with respect to legitimacy, successions, and other rights, if the respective laws of different countries were only to be observed as to marriages contracted by the subjects of those countries abroad, all nations have consented, or must be presumed to consent, for the common benefit and advantage, that such marriages should be good, or not according to the laws of the country where they are made. By observing this law no inconvenience can arise, but infinite mischief will ensue if it is not."

The counsel for the guardian, however, cites several cases which at first sight seem to support the position that marriage in evasion of the laws of the domicil is invalid. Thus in Stull's Estate, 183 Pa. 625, 39 L. R. A. 539, 39 Atl. 16, and Pennegar v. State, 87 Tenn. 244, 2 L. R. A. 703, 10 Am. St. Rep. 648, 10 S. W. 305, a statute forbade any person from whom a divorce was obtained on the ground of adultery to remarry. In both cases a party forbidden to marry went into another state and remarried. The second marriage in both cases was held invalid in the state where the party was domiciled. In Dupre v. Boulard, 10 La. Ann. 411, a statute forbade the intermarriage of blacks and whites, and it was held that any such marriage, although valid where performed, would not be recognized in Louisiana. To the same effect are State v. Kennedy, 76 N. C. 251, 22 Am. Rep. 683, and Kinney v. Com. 30 Gratt. 858, 32 Am. Rep. 690. And in Brook v. Brook, 9 H. L. Cas. 193, where a statute declared that a marriage with a deceased wife's sister should be invalid, it was held that such a marriage, entered into between British subjects in a country where the marriage was not forbidden, was absolutely void in England. We consider these cases inconclusive. Most of them, if not all, fall within a well-recognized exception to the general rule laid down above, namely, that, if a marriage is odious by the common consent of nations, or if its influence is thought dangerous to the fabric of society, so that it is strongly against the public policy of the jurisdiction, it will not be recognized there, even though valid where it was solemnized. Thus a polygamous marriage, although valid and binding in the country where it was contracted, would probably be denied validity in all countries where such unions are prohibited. See Re Bethell, L. R. 38 Ch. Div. 220. Probably the rule would be the same in case of an incestuous marriage, although valid in the place where contracted. See Bishop, supra, §§ 858 et seq.; Com. v. Lane, 113 Mass. 458, 463, 18 Am. Rep. 509. The cases cited from Louisiana, North Carolina, and Virginia may be explained, then, on the ground that the tendency of such unions in those states was considered destructive of society; and their apparent conflict with Medway v. Needham rests, not upon any conflict of opinion regarding the general principle governing foreign marriages, but only upon the different conceptions of the courts regarding the importance of the public policy forbidding such marriages. The first two cases cited by counsel for the respondent guardian are harder to distinguish, although we think that here, again, the difference in the result is attributable to the same difference in the conception of the public policy regarding such marriages. But if the cases really are in conflict, we believe that the current of authority is in favor of the principle already enunciated. It is true that in the important case of Brook v. Brook, 9 H. L. Cas. 193, decided by the House of Lords, a contrary position was taken, and the Massachusetts cases were expressly disapproved. That case, however, although of great weight, has been considerably criticised, and is believed to be contrary to the weight of American authority. For a learned criticism of the case, see the opinion of Gray, Ch. J., in Com. v. Lane, 113 Mass. 467, et seq., 18 Am. Rep. 509. See also Bishop, supra, § 827. The case of Andrews v. Andrews, 188 U. S. 14, 47 L. ed. 366, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 237, has no bearing upon the question at issue. In that case the only question was whether the court of Massachusetts constitutionally could refuse to recognize a divorce granted by the court of South Dakota, in view of a Massachusetts statute providing that a divorce obtained in fraud of the laws of the 69 L. R. A.

domicil should be invalid; and it was held that, as the divorce was granted to one who had never obtained a bona fide domicil, the court of South Dakota never acquired jurisdiction, and hence the due faith and credit clause of the Constitution did not require the enforcement of the decree in Massachusetts against the public policy of that state as expressed in its statutes. It is to be noticed that both the first and second marriages involved in that case took place in Massachusetts. And as to the invalidity of the divorce, it is clear that different considerations apply to the determination of the validity of divorces than to the validity of marriages procured in evasion of the law of the domicil. Bishop, supra, §§ 836, 837.

Coming now to the case in hand, it requires no argument to show that, even if the marriage might have been void if solemnized in this state, it is nevertheless not such a union that it can in any sense be considered so subversive of good morals, or so threatening to the fabric of society, as to fall within the exception to the general rule regarding foreign marriages. In other words, if valid in Massachusetts, it is equally valid here. As to its validity in Massachusetts, no authorities were cited by counsel, and we have not succeeded in discovering any Massachusetts statute or decision which would tend to show that the marriage is not valid there. Indeed, the only authorities we have found which seem to bear upon the point look the other way. In Parton v. Hervey, 1 Gray, 119, 121, the facts were in some respects similar to those in the case at bar. The petitioner had married a female infant of the age of thirteen years, with the free assent of said infant, but without the knowledge or consent of her mother, who was her only surviving parent. The latter, claiming that the marriage was invalid without her consent, locked her daughter up, and refused to allow her husband to have the custody of her person. The petitioner was allowed a writ of habeas corpus against the mother. The court says on page 122: "But in the absence of any provision declaring marriages not celebrated in a prescribed manner, or between parties of certain ages, absolutely void, it is held that all marriages regularly made according to the common law are valid and binding, although had in violation of the specific regulations imposed by statute." And in Milford v. Worcester, 7 Mass. 48, 54, 55, Parsons, Ch. J., said: "When a justice or minister shall solemnize a marriage between parties who may lawfully marry, although without publication of the banns of marriage, and without the consent of the parents or guardians, such marriage would unquestionably be lawful, although the officer would incur the penalty of £50 for a breach of his duty." See 2 Parsons, Contr., 9th ed. p. 93. In the absence, then, of any showing that Mr. Chace was either an idiot or lunatic at the time of the marriage, we are of opinion that the marriage in Massachusetts was valid.

It is argued by counsel for the petitioner that, as there was at least the form of a marriage in this case, it cannot be collaterally attacked, but must, for the purposes of this proceeding, be considered valid and binding. As the respondent's counsel took no notice of this point in his brief, however, and relies chiefly upon the invalidity of the marriage, we prefer to express no opinion upon that question, but to decide this branch of the case upon the ground selected by the respondent for his defense.

Having, now, as we think, established the validity of the marriage, we proceed briefly to inquire whether the facts of the case warrant the issuing of the writ.

In the first place, it is clear that the husband or wife of a person illegally restrained of his liberty is a proper person to petition for a writ of habeas corpus. Parton v. Hervey, 1 Gray, 119, 121; 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 181, and cases cited; Id. p. 193. As to the effect of the marriage upon the status of guardian and ward, it is strenuously argued on the part of the petitioner that the marriage relation is inconsistent with the guardianship, and that, as marriage is paramount to any other social status, the guardianship, at least of the person of Mr. Chace, terminated upon his marriage. In support of this proposition he cites a number of authorities of great weight, including Woerner, American Law of Guardianship, 335, 336; Schouler, Dom. Rel. 5th ed. § 313; Reeve, Dom. Rel. 4th ed. 409; and 2 Kent, Com. 12th ed. *226. None of these authorities, however, cites any decided case in support of this proposition, save in the case of the marriage of a female ward. Counsel for respondent, on the other hand, maintains that, if the guardianship can be terminated by the ward's own act, without any action by the probate court, then, although he is incompetent, and has been so adjudged, he immediately becomes competent to remove his own disability, while still incompetent for every other purpose; and it must be admitted that this argument is a very cogent one. Fortunately, however, we are not under the necessity of deciding the question thus raised, for, even granting that the marriage of the ward did not terminate the guardianship of his person, the petitioner is still, under our own decision, entitled to the relief she prays. In Tillinghast v. Holbrook, 7 R. I. 230, the court passed upon the question whether a guardian of the person and estate of a married woman could properly be appointed on the ground that she, for want of discretion in managing her estate, was likely to bring herself to want. It was held, in a learned opinion by Brayton, J., that such an appointment was valid. On page 250 he says: "Neither do we think that it is any sufficient objection to the decree that the guardianship of the property is coupled with the guardianship of the person. It is not necessary, in the exercise of any of the guardian's powers, to invade any of the rights of the husband, either in the disposition and control of the property of the wife, or the custody of her person. Whatever control of her person may be necessary for her protection and for the assertion of her just rights must necessarily be given to the guardian, but this may be, and would be, in subordination to every just right of the husband. The custody of her person would not be taken from him, unless for her protection." In view of this decision, the remainder of the case is free from difficulty, and may be decided without questioning the authority, either of the text-writers cited by petitioner, or of the decision last cited. If the marriage terminated the guardianship of the person, the petitioner is obviously entitled to the relief she seeks. If the guardianship is not thus terminated, yet, under our own decision, the control exercised by the guardian must be in subordination to every just right of the wife. It needs no argument nor citation of authority to show that, in the absence of very exceptional circumstances, a wife is entitled to the society of her husband, free from the restraint of any third person. No such circumstances appear in this case. And, taking the facts above recited as true, as they must be assumed to be in the absence of anything to the contrary, it appears that the wife of the ward is prohibited by the guardian from enjoying the society of her husband, and that he is being restrained of his liberty in a way which calls for the interference of this court. See Whitten v. Tomlinson, 160 U. S. 231, 242, 40 L. ed. 406, 412, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 297. Whether the guardianship is terminated or not, therefore, the petitioner's right to a writ of habeas corpus is made out.

Blodgett, J., concurring:

I concur in the conclusion reached in the foregoing opinion, for the reason that the appointment of a guardian in Rhode Island had no effect upon the person or property of the ward in Massachusetts. Mitchell v. People's Sav. Bank, 20 R. I. 500, 40 Atl. 502. And such is the law in Massachusetts. Woodworth v. Spring, 4 Allen, 321; Milli- ken v. Pratt, 125 Mass. 374, 28 Am. Rep. 241, and cases cited. And see Hoyt v. Sprague, 103 U. S. 613, 26 L. ed. 585; Morgan v. Potter, 157 U. S. 195, 39 L. ed. 670, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 590; Wuesthoff v. Germania L. Ins. Co. 107 N. Y. 580, 14 N. E. 811. The ward, Henry C. Chace, when in Massachusetts, was not under the disability of guardianship there, and was accordingly sui juris in that state. And certainly, in the absence of affirmative proof of fraud upon our law, he is entitled to the benefit of the maxim, Nullus videtur dolo facere qui suo jure utitur. Since this is decisive of the question, I prefer to withhold an expression of opinion as to whether the rule in Medwoy v. Needham (decided in 1819) 16 Mass. 157, 8 Am. Dec. 131, upon the validity of a marriage celebrated prior to 1770, and which has been much criticised, or the opposing view taken by the House of Lords nearly fifty years later, in Brook v. Brook, 9 H. L. Cas. 193, which has been also much questioned, shall be held to be the law of this state, until such time as a case shall arise in which it shall affirmatively appear that there was a deliberate attempt to evade the provisions of our law, and it shall become necessary to determine between them. The writ will issue as prayed.

George E. DARLING.

(.....R. I.....)

A subcontractor may pursue simultaneously a proceeding to enforce his mechanic's lien against the property and an action against the contractor for the amount due him, in which he attaches funds due the contractor from the property owner.

(November 25, 1904.)

ON MOTION by respondent to compel petitioner to elect as to which remedy he would pursue, where he was proceeding to enforce a mechanic's lien, and to recover the amount of his claim from the principal contractor. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Terence M. O'Reilly, for petitioner:

There is no more reason why the petitioner should be compelled to elect than there would be in a case of a plaintiff in several suits against joint and several makers of a note.

Briggs v. Titus, 13 R. I. 138; Quidnick Co. v. Chafee, 13 R. I. 388; Stillwell v. Bertrand, 22 Ark. 380; Selz v. Collins, 55 Mo. App. 63; Welch v. Seligman, 72 Hun, 138, 25 N. Y. Supp. 363.

Douglas, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These are petitions for mechanics' liens, brought by subcontractors to recover for work and materials performed and used in the construction of buildings for the respective respondents. In each case the respondent has filed a motion alleging "that said petitioner has commenced an action at law against the original contractors, in the common pleas division of this court, for the recovery of the same sum of money, for the same materials, labor, etc., mentioned in the petition, and has in said action at law attached the fund from which said lien might be satisfied, to wit, the last payment due under said original contract, which suit is still pending," etc., and praying that the petitioner may be required to elect between the two remedies.

The question is thus presented whether a petition for a mechanic's lien may be prosecuted simultaneously with a suit at common law to recover the same debt from the contractor. It is a corollary from the maxim, Nemo debet bis vexari pro eadem causa, that, if a complainant sues a defendant at the same time in law and in equity to enforce the same obligation, the court in equity will require him to elect which remedy he will pursue. 1 Foster, Fed. Pr. § 295; Fletcher, Eq. Pl. & Pr. § 365, note 1; Quidnick Co. v. Chafee, 13 R. I. 367. If he chooses to proceed in equity, the court will enjoin his suit at law; and, if he elects to proceed at law, it will dismiss his bill, but without prejudice. Mitford & T. Eq. Pl. 340; Dan. Ch. Pr. *817, note 9; Royle v. Wynne, Craig & P. 252. The courts, however, exercise a wide discretion in applying this rule, and are careful not to make it an instrument of oppression by enforcing it where both remedies sought may be necessary to complete satisfaction of the claim. Dan. Ch. Pr. *634, note 3; Story, Eq. Pl. § 742a. Lord Cranworth says in Ostell v. Le Page, 21 Eng. L. & Eq. 640: "But when the court interferes upon motion to stop the plaintiff from proceeding, it is taking upon itself a very delicate jurisdiction, and one in which it ought to see that by no possibility can it be doing injustice." Thus, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, the holder of a bond or note secured by mortgage may sue the parties to the instrument at common law, and may at the same time maintain his suit for foreclosure. Dunkley v. Van Buren, 3 Johns. Ch. 330; Mundy v. Whittemore, 15 Neb. 650, 19 N. W. 694; Aylet v. Hill, 2 Dick. 551; *Perry v. Eq. 214, 84 Am. Dec. 147; 20 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 271. In Jones v. Conde, 6 Johns. Ch. 77, Chancellor Kent says: "The one remedy is in rem, and the other in personam; and the general rule, to which this case is an exception, applies only to cases where the demand at law and in equity are equally personal, and not where the cumulative remedy is in personam, while the other remedy is upon the pledge;" citing Booth v. Booth, 2 Atk. 343; Schoole v. Sall, 1 Sch. & Lef. 176; Lord Kenyon in Smart v. Wolfe, 3 T. R. 342; Boyd v. Heinzelman, 1 Ves. & B. 381; Jackson ex dem. Ireland v. Hull, 10 Johns. 481; Lord Erskine in Perry v. Barker, 13 Ves. Jr. 205; and Dunkley v. Van Buren, 3 Johns. Ch. 330. The distinction drawn by Chancellor Kent applies as reasonably to the present cases as to the case of a mortgage.

A mechanic's lien is additional security given by statute upon certain conditions, but does not in any way abrogate the contract between the workman and his employer. It has been held that, like a mortgage, the liability to a mechanic's lien is an obligation voluntarily assumed by the owner when he engages a builder. Briggs v. Titus, 13 R. I. 136. The lien proceedings are in rem against the land, and the common-law action is in personam against the employer. In some cases both remedies may be required, to procure full payment of the debt, and in some cases part of the claim only may be enforceable as a lien against the land. The defendants are not the same any more than in the case of a mortgagor who is also the maker of a note which is secured by it. The land is the real defendant in this proceeding, whoever actively represents it in the trial of the case, and the contractor is the defendant in the common-law action, no matter on what fund attachment may have been laid, as the land is responsible in the foreclosure of a mortgage, whether it is still owned by the maker of the note, or has been transferred to a new owner.

It is represented to us in these cases that the owners hold a certain part of the contract price of the building, out of which they may satisfy any mechanics' liens which may exist, and that they have left to the contractor the defense of these suits. We do not see how that alters the relations of the parties which we have to consider. In every case, if the owner is so fortunate or has been so prudent as to hold in his hands money due to the contractor, he can charge against such sum any payments which he may be obliged to make to satisfy mechanics' liens; but the workman has no lien upon such fund, and is not pursuing it by this proceeding. Even if the owner has no such fund, such payments would constitute a debt from the contractor to him, so that the rights of the parties in these cases are not different from their respective rights in all cases of petitions for mechanics' liens by subcontractors or workmen. So, in the case of the sale of mortgaged land, the parties to the sale may make such arrangement between them as they please with respect to the mortgage debt, but the holder of the mortgage may pursue his several remedies notwithstanding.

A mechanic's lien is more nearly analogous to a maritime lien even than to a mortgage, and it is held that a lien may be prosecuted in admiralty while a suit for the debt is pending at common law. Russell v. Alvarez, 5 Cal. 48; People ex rel. Granger v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 27 Mich. 406, 15 Am. Rep. 195, and cases cited.

Following these analogies, we must deny the motions. If the petitioners should elect to discontinue the common-law actions, they could not renew their attachments if their liens should prove insufficient; and, if they should elect to abandon their liens, these would be wholly lost if the attachments should not satisfy the claims. It is manifestly impossible to discontinue a petition for a mechanic's lien without prejudice. From the fact that the garnishee in each of these common-law cases cannot answer as to the amount of his debt to the contractor until the claims for liens are settled to which he has a right to devote the funds in his hands, the common-law suits cannot probably be satisfied until these proceedings are terminated; but we see no reason why they should not proceed to judgment simultaneously, if the plaintiffs desire to press them.

Counsel have not cited to us any cases directly in point, but those which we have found sustain the view we have expressed. It is held in Bates v. Santa Barbara County, 90 Cal. 543, 547, 27 Pac. 438, the right to a money judgment against the person who employs the mechanic or purchases the materials is not lost or waived by a proceeding to enforce the lien, or recover from the owner the balance of the contract price remaining in his hands. In West v. Flemming, 18 Ill. 248, 68 Am. Dec. 539, it was held that a party may proceed to collect his debt by attachment and by enforcing a mechanic's lien, as concurrent remedies, and the lien is not waived by so doing. The court says: "The proceeding under the statute is additional or cumulative of such other remedies for enforcement of the contract out of which the lien arises as the party may have either against person or property. He may therefore at the same time pursue several remedies for satisfaction of one debt, which are not substantially the same in their nature and effect, as a proceeding against property and an action against the person, or two proceedings against different properties or things, but can have one satisfaction only;" citing 1 Chitty, Pl. 212, 254; Delahay v. Clement, 4 Ill. 201; Branigan v. Rose, 8 Ill. 123. This case is cited with approval in Olson

v. O'Malia, 75 Ill. App. 387. In Massachusetts it is provided by Pub. Stat. chap. 191, § 46, that a person having a mechanic's lien may maintain also an action at common law; and it was accordingly held in Angier v. Bay State Distilling Co. 178 Mass. 163, 59 N. E. 630, that a building contractor does not waive his lien by bringing an action at law attaching the real estate. The same doctrine is held in Brennan v. Swasey, 16 Cal. 140, 76 Am. Dec. 507; Salt Lake Lithographing Co. v. Ilex Mine & Smelting Co. 15 Utah, 440, 62 Am. St. Rep. 944, 49 Pac. 768, and in Roberts v. Wilcoxon, 36 Ark. 356, 363, without reference to any statute.

The motions are denied, and the cases will stand for hearing upon the merits.

George KERR, Sheriff of Beadle County, Respt.,
v.

John MURPHY et al., Appts.

(.....S. D.....)

A judgment of a justice of the peace, rendered within less than the time prescribed by statute after service of summons, is not so far void that its execution can be enjoined; but the defendant must take the proper steps to obtain a review on appeal.

(March 1, 1905.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Beadle County in favor of plaintiff in a suit to enjoin the execution of certain judgments. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Kelley & Chamberlain, for appellants:

Injunction does not lie against an execution issued upon a void or voidable judgment rendered by a justice of the peace.

St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Lowder, 138 Mo. 533, 60 Am. St. Rep. 565, 39 S. W. 799; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Reynolds, 89 Mo. 146, 1 S. W. 208.

The judgments were not void. By reason of a defective service on the sheriff in giving him but two days to answer instead of three, there was simply an irregularity and an erroneous service, which must be rectified or taken advantage of in the justice court, or by appeal to the appellate court.

Mr. Henry C. Hinckley for respondent.

Corson, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action in equity brought by George Kerr, as sheriff of Beadle county, against John Murphy, R. B. Brockway, justice of the peace, and A. B. Kenyon, coroner of Beadle county, to restrain the defendants from enforcing three certain judgments alleged to have been entered in the police justice court of Huron by the defendant R. B. Brockway, police justice, in actions wherein John Murphy was plaintiff and George Kerr was defendant. Findings and judgment were in favor of the plaintiff, and defendants have appealed.

The court's findings are, in substance, as follows: That said Brockway was the duly elected, qualified, and acting justice of the peace in and for the city of Huron; that defendant Kenyon was the duly elected, qualified, and acting coroner in and for Beadle county; that the plaintiff was the duly elected, qualified, and acting sheriff of Beadle county; that on the 5th day of November, 1902, the defendant John Murphy commenced three actions against the sheriff as sheriff of the county, in the court of the defendant Brockway; that said actions were in claim and delivery, to recover possession of certain personal property which had been levied upon and was in the possession of the plaintiff, Kerr, as sheriff aforesaid, as the property of one S. D. O'Connors; that on November 5, 1902, three summonses were issued by said Brockway, as such police justice, in said actions, requiring the plaintiff herein to appear before said Brockway on the 8th day of November, 1902, at the hour of 8 o'clock A. M., to answer the complaint of the defendant Murphy; that each and every one of said summonses were served on the plaintiff herein on the 6th day of November, 1902; that the plaintiff failed to appear in said Brockway's court in response to said summonses, or any one of them, on the 8th day of November, or at any time, and that the said Brockway, as justice aforesaid, without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff herein, and without notice to him, proceeded to, and did, enter judgments against him, and in favor of the defendant Murphy, at the hour of 8 o'clock of the 8th day of November, 1902, aforesaid, whereby said Murphy was awarded the possession of the property described in said Murphy's complaint, besides costs of suit; that each and every one of the judgments rendered by the said Brockway, as hereinbefore set out, in favor of defendant Murphy and against said plaintiff, is null and void, and of no force and effect, for the reason that said summonses were not served as required by statute, in that the defendant in said three actions was not given the said three days' notice, as required; and that said justice had no jurisdiction of said case whatever. And the court concludes from the said findings that the three summonses issued in the three several cases aforesaid were not served on the defendant in said action, and that the said Brockway, as justice aforesaid, acquired no jurisdiction by which he could render or enter judgments in said several causes against the said George Kerr, sheriff, aforesaid; that said judgments and all proceedings thereunder are void. The court thereupon entered judgment restraining the said defendants, and all persons claiming under them, from enforcing said judgments by execution or otherwise.

It will be seen from the findings of the court that the summonses in the three actions were dated the 5th day of November, 1902; that they were not served until the 6th; and that judgments were entered thereon on the 8th by default. Two questions are therefore presented by the record: (1) Were the judgments so entered by the police justice void or simply erroneous? (2) Was a suit in equity a proper proceeding to vacate and set aside the said judgments, and to restrain the defendants from proceeding thereunder?

It is contended by the appellants that the judgments were not void; that, as to the defective service upon the plaintiff, as sheriff, and defendant in those actions, in giving him but two days in which to answer, instead of three days, it was simply an irregularity on the part of the justice, which could only be taken advantage of in the justice court by motion to vacate and set aside the same, and, if denied, by appeal to the appellate court; that the defective service did not deprive the justice of jurisdiction; that, the moment that personal service was obtained on the plaintiff as defendant in the claim and delivery actions, jurisdiction attached, subject to be defeated by the proper proceedings before the justice, and by appeal to the circuit court having appellate jurisdiction of the same.

It is contended, on the other hand, by the respondent, that the justice's judgments, as found by the court, were absolutely void, and that, being void, an action in equity was the proper remedy to enjoin proceedings thereunder. Section 14 of the Revised Justices' Code provides, "The time specified in the summons for the appearance of the defendant shall in all cases be not less than three nor more than twelve days from the date of the service of the same;" and by § 15 it is provided that "when the defendant resides in the county, or is summoned therein, the summons cannot be served within two days of the time fixed for the appearance of the defendant."

It will thus be seen that the time specified in the summons shall, when served within the county, be not less than three nor more than twelve days from the date of the service of the same, and that, when the defendant resides in the county, he cannot be served within two days of the time fixed for the appearance of the defendant. These provisions of the Code are mandatory, and cannot be dispensed with, unless waived by the defendant by appearing in the action, generally at the time specified in the summons. The service of the summonses in the cases in the justice's court being made on the 6th of November, and the summonses requiring the defendant thereunder to appear on the 8th day of the same month, under no rule or computation of time gave him more than two days' notice. The view that a judgment in such a case is irregular, but not void, seems to be sustained by the great weight of authority. Mr. Freeman, in his work on Judgments, vol. 1, § 126, says: "There is a difference between a want of jurisdiction and a defect in obtaining jurisdiction. . . . From the moment of the service of process the court has such control over the litigants that all its subsequent proceedings, however erroneous, are not void. If there is any irregularity in the process, or in the manner of its service, the defendant must take advantage of such irregularity by some motion or proceeding in the court where the action is pending. The fact that defendant is not given all the time allowed him by law to plead, or that he was served by some person incompetent to make a valid service, or any other fact connected with the service of process on account of which a judgment by default would be reversed upon appeal, will not ordinarily make the judgment vulnerable to a collateral attack. In case of an attempted service of process, the presumption exists that the court considered and determined the question whether the acts done were sufficient or insufficient. If so, the conclusion reached by the court, being derived from hearing and deliberating upon a matter which by law it was authorized to hear and decide, though erroneous, cannot be void." That learned author, in the note to the section, says: "A distinction is to be made between a case where there is no service whatever, and one which is simply defective or irregular. In the first case the court acquires no jurisdiction, and its judgment is void; in the other case, if the court to which the process is returnable adjudges the service to be sufficient, and renders judgment thereon, such judgment is not void, but only subject to be set aside by the court which gave it, upon seasonable and proper application, or reversed upon appeal. Isaacs v. Price, 2 Dill. 351, Fed. Cas. No. 7,097." Judge Black, in his work on Judgments, § 224, says: "Although the service of process in an action may have been characterized by some defect or irregularity, it does not necessarily follow that the ensuing judgment will be void. For, if the party would take advantage of such a matter, he must do so in the action itself, by some proper motion or proceeding. It is only when the attempted service is so irregular as to amount to no service at all that there can be said to be a want of jurisdiction. In any other case there may be error in the subsequent proceedings, but they will be sustained against a collateral attack." In § 223 that learned author says: "But where it appears that there was notice, though defective, and service, though imperfect, a decision of the court to which the process was returnable that such notice and service were sufficient will not be held void in a collateral proceeding. . . . Again, a judgment in an action in which the required number of days' notice was not given to the defendant is erroneous, but not void, and cannot be questioned in a collateral proceeding."

In the case of Ballinger v. Tarbell, 16 Iowa, 491, 85 Am. Dec. 527, the supreme court of Iowa, speaking by Judge Dillon, says: "It is claimed by the defendants, Claggett, Browne, and Claggett, that the judgment of the plaintiff against Tarbell and Robertson was wholly void as against Tarbell, because the justice of the peace who rendered the same had no jurisdiction of the person of the defendant Tarbell; and this is the first question which we are called upon to determine. . . . That this service, as to Tarbell, was defective, is apparent, because the statute requires five days' notice, and here were only four. It may also be defective because served by the justice himself, and not the constable. It was therefore clearly erroneous in the justice to have rendered judgment against Tarbell on this service. It would have been, without doubt, reversed on writ of error. But it was erroneous simply, and not void. It is not a case where there is no service at all, but a case where there was a defective service. The justice erred in deciding that this service authorized him to render judgment against Tarbell; but neither Tarbell nor his assignees can question the validity of this judgment, or claim to have it treated as void in this collateral proceeding."

This question has been very fully considered by the supreme court of Missouri in Leonard v. Sparks, 117 Mo. 103, 38 Am. St. Rep. 646, 22 S. W. 899, and that learned court arrives, after an exhaustive review of the authorities, at the same conclusion, and in its opinion says: "But was complete jurisdiction obtained over Mr. Bouton? The latter personally received an official command to appear in the condemnation case before the mayor at a time named. The notice itself was valid and regular, in the prescribed statutory form, and duly served on Mr. Bouton within the territorial jurisdiction of the mayor. Mr. Bouton was entitled by law to six days' notice; but the mayor would have had jurisdiction over him if he had appeared without any notice, as he might have done. So, also, might he have objected to the shortness of the service, and have asserted his right to the full six days' notice by moving at the proper time to make that objection. But he did not see fit to do so. He was as competent to waive the full length of time of service as he was to appear without any notice whatever. The personal service of the process of the court brought the judicial power of the latter to bear upon him. He had his 'day' to object to the process, if he did not deem it sufficient because not timely, or for any other reason; but he did not avail himself of that opportunity. He certainly could not, by ignoring the command of the writ, deprive the court of authority to determine as to the sufficiency of its service. It was for the court, not the party, to decide whether or not it was sufficient. It held it to be good, and rendered judgment accordingly. In contemplation of law, Mr. Bouton was before the court, for he had been personally summoned to appear there, and might have done so. If the call for his appearance was too sudden, the court's ruling that it was adequate may be error, which could have been rectified by seasonable and direct moves for that purpose; but such error could not defeat the court's jurisdiction to render a judgment conclusive upon him, or subject that judgment to successful attack collaterally. A broad distinction is to be drawn between cases where no service on defendant appears, and those in which service is shown, but where it is in some respect deficient or irregular. In the latter cases, jurisdiction attaches, subject to be defeated by objections to the irregularity, interposed in season in some direct manner. In the former class, jurisdiction is not obtained if the law requires service. Where the facts touching the acquisition of jurisdiction are fully disclosed, the principles of law governing liability to collateral attack are applied no less favorably to judgments of justices of the peace than to the adjudications of courts having more extensive powers. We conclude, therefore, that, on principle, the shortness of the service on Mr. Bouton furnishes no substantial ground in the present action to deny effectiveness to the judgment in the condemnation case. . . . In this condition of the precedents in Missouri, we have felt at liberty to re-examine the subject, and to declare the law as seemed in conformity with correct principles. In doing so, we find that the position we have taken has ample support in well-considered cases in other states bearing upon the precise point of present controversy. Ballinger v. Tarbell (1864) 16 Iowa, 491, 85 Am. Dec. 527; McNeill v. Hallmark (1866) 28 Tex. 157; Glover v. Holman (1871) 3 Heisk. 519; Nelson v. Becker (1875) 14 Kan. 509; Betts v. Baxter (1880) 58 Miss. 334; Bowman v. Venice & C. R. Co. (1882) 102 Ill. 472; Jackson v. State (1885) 104 Ind. 516, 3 N. E. 863."

This question was also very fully considered by the supreme court of Vermont in Hammond v. Wilder, 25 Vt. 343, in which that court, speaking by Redfield, Ch. J., says: "Two questions arise in the present case: (1) If a writ of attachment, returnable before a justice in a different county from that in which it is served, be served by attaching property less than twelve days before the return day, and no appearance is made by defendant, and judgment is given by default, is the judgment valid? . . . Is there any such case where the defect has been held fatal to the proceeding when the defendant does not appear? So far from this, it is true that even matters of error, and which, on writ of error, would be held fatal to the proceeding, when fully apparent upon the record, do not render the judgment void. There is no case in which the judgment of a court of record of general jurisdiction has been held void unless for a defect of jurisdiction. This seems to be conceded in argument, and it is attempted to make this defect amount to a want of jurisdiction. But this is certainly a new view of the subject. It is but a defect of service, and not more important than thousands of other defects. It was never supposed before that, because the proper time was not given to a defendant to prepare for trial, the whole proceedings were rendered utterly void. And it is impossible to make this result from the form of the provisions of the statute. If we extend such a doctrine to one case, we must to all; and if it apply to justice courts, it must to the county court and to this court. And, to be consistent, we shall have to extend it to all omissions of the statute requisites, either in the writ or service, if apparent on the face of the proceedings. If a writ of summons is served by reading, the party may disregard it, and the judgment is void. This would certainly work a very important change upon this subject, and one of immense consequence in a practical point of view,—one which will virtually overthrow the whole doctrine of the conclusiveness of judgments, and make them to depend altogether upon their entire regularity in regard to all the preliminary proceedings, so far as they appear on the face of the papers, which is a very precarious reliance, and which leaves everything in such a state of uncertainty as to render nothing stable or secure, and virtually to encourage speculation and litigation." In the case at bar no question is raised as to the summonses issued by the justice, and, had they been served on the 5th,—the day they were issued,—the judgment would have been perfectly valid, as the plaintiff herein would then have had his three days' notice. As stated by the court, presumptively the police justice considered the return before him, and erroneously decided that the plaintiff in the actions had had proper notice. To say, therefore, that the judgment is void because the justice made an erroneous decision would, as stated by the supreme court of Vermont, virtually overrule the doctrine of the conclusiveness of judgments when defects appear in the record of such judgments, and would, as stated by that learned court, work a very great change in the law applicable to judgments. We are clearly of the opinion that the judgments in this case were not void, but simply erroneous.

This brings us to the last question, namely, Was this action in equity to restrain the defendants from executing the said judgments a proper remedy, or was the plaintiff required to make his motion in the justice's court to vacate and set aside the judgments, and, if denied, to appeal to the proper appellate court? In other words, Did the defendant in these actions have an adequate remedy at law? If he had such a remedy, then the action by injunction proceedings in a court of equity cannot be sustained, for the rule is well settled that, where a party has an adequate remedy at law, he cannot resort to a court of equity.

In Grand Chute v. Winegar, 15 Wall. 373, 21 L. ed. 174, the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking by Mr. Justice Hunt, says: "It is an elementary principle of equity law that when full and adequate relief can be obtained in a suit at law a suit in equity cannot be maintained." The rule we have stated is so elementary that a further citation of authorities is unnecessary. In the case at bar, so far as the record discloses, there was nothing to prevent the defendant in these actions from moving to vacate and set aside the judgments in the justice's court, and, had this motion been denied, no reason is shown why he could not have appealed to the proper appellate court, and obtained a decision reversing the judgments of the justice's court. To hold that the plaintiff in the case at bar could invoke the equity powers of the court, ignoring his rights to make a motion to vacate and set aside the judgments in the justice's court, and his right of appeal, in case the motion was denied, to the appellate court, would be establishing a very dangerous doctrine; for, if it was proper in this case, we can see no reason why it would not be proper in all cases where the justice had committed some error which would render his judgments subject to reversal on appeal to an appellate court. Even if the judgment had, in fact, been void for the reason that there had been no service whatever upon the plaintiff in this action, the authorities are not in entire harmony as to the right of the defendant in such a case to proceed in equity to enjoin the proceedings. Mr. High, in his work on Injunctions, in speaking of this subject, in § 228 admits that there is a great conflict in the authorities, though he seems to take the view that the defendant in such a case would have the right to proceed in equity to restrain proceedings under such a judgment; but speaking of judgments that are simply erroneous that author, in § 225, says: "It is a well-established rule that the interference of equity will not be granted for the purpose of correcting mere irregularities or informalities in judicial proceedings. And where a judgment is assailed upon the ground of irregularity in the proceedings antecedent to obtaining the judgment an injunction will not be allowed. Thus, in the absence of allegations of fraud, irregularities in the service of process will not constitute ground for an injunction upon the general principle that equity will not sit as a court of review to revise irregularities in proceedings at law. . . . And it may be laid down as a rule that the powers of equity cannot be invoked to restrain execution upon the ground of irregularity, since it is the province of a court of law to annul its own process or correct any errors in its own proceedings concerning executions. Nor, in the absence of fraud, will errors or irregularities in the action of the court warrant an injunction against a judgment, especially when the party complaining might have availed himself of such errors upon an appeal, if prosecuted in due season. And although no remedy be provided by appeal from the judgment of a justice, its enforcement will not be enjoined because of error in the proceedings."

The learned Circuit Court was clearly in error, therefore, in rendering a judgment restraining the proceedings upon the judgments in the Justice's Court, and its judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed, and that court is directed to dismiss the action.

v.

M. F. YEGGE, Plff. in Err.

(.... S. D.)

An ophthalmologist who prefixes to his name the letters "Dr." on his sign, and on notices in which he undertakes to correct certain diseased conditions by the fitting of glasses to the eyes, comes within the terms of a statute providing, that, when a person shall append the title "Dr.," in a medical sense, to his name, he shall be regarded as practising medicine, within the meaning of the statute which requires a license as a condition precedent to doing so.

(April 5, 1905.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Beadle County to review a judgment convicting defendant of practising medicine without a license. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. T. H. Null for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Aubrey Lawrence, with Messrs. Philo Hall, Attorney General, and C. A. Kelley, for the State.

Corson, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon an information duly filed the plaintiff in error was tried and convicted of the offense of practising medicine without a license.

It is contended by the plaintiff in error that the evidence was insufficient to warrant his conviction, in that it failed to show that he was practising, or attempting to practise, medicine within the provisions of the act of 1903, and that he was simply engaged in the business of fitting glasses to the eye. It was proved by the evidence of Dr. McNutt, secretary of the board of medical examiners, that no license had been granted to the plaintiff in error. The state then introduced in evidence the following notice, marked "Exhibit 1:" "Ophthalmology. A Science for the Analysis of the Cause of Human Ills and How to Abolish Them. Everybody should know that this is a science that practises by guesses. It differentiates between functional derangements and disease. By its assistance nature cures cross-eyes without operation; headache without drugs; hysteria without a straight jacket; female disorders without a trip to the hospital; and hundreds of nervous troubles. Simply removing causes is the secret. A true Ophthalmologist explains your case to you. Dr. M. F. Yegge, Huron, S. D. Office rooms over Huronite." There was also evidence tending to prove that the plaintiff in error had a sign in front of his office with the name "Dr. Yegge" thereon. There was also evidence tending to prove that ophthalmology is science which treats of the physiology, anatomy, and diseases of the eye; that any deformity in the eye is considered a disease of the eye; any abnormal condition of the eye should be considered as a disease; that it is so considered by the profession; and that the fitting of glasses for the relief of defective eyesight is a branch of the practice of medicine. The defendant, being called as a witness in his own behalf, testified, in substance, that he had lived in Huron since the 1st of June, 1903; that he was engaged in optics; that he had an office in the James Valley Bank building; that he was a graduate of the McCormick School of Ophthalmology of Chicago, Illinois, where they teach ophthalmology particularly; that it had been established twelve or thirteen years; that it is a reputable school; that they issue diplomas to those taking a full course; that the degree of ophthalmology is conferred; that he received a regular course diploma, and graduated in ophthalmology,—the fitting of glasses; that the degree of doctor of ophthalmology was conferred upon him, and that he had a diploma, which he produced; that no disease was treated by him by the use of medicine; that they were not instructed to treat any disease by the use of medicine in that college; that the course of education in that college was purely nonmedical; and that they learned to correct errors in refraction by test. On cross-examination he stated that he took the course of a graduate, a two-weeks course,—a little over two weeks. He also testified that he studied anatomy and physiology of the eye for about two years; that previous to going to the school he studied for about a year in Iowa; that he was in a doctor's office, where he made a specialty of refraction. Chapter 176, p. 202, of the Laws of 1903, provides for creating a board of medical examiners, defines their duties, empowers them to grant licenses to qualified applicants, and prescribes penalties for practising without such a license. Section 21 provides as follows: "When a person shall append or prefix the letters 'M. B.', or 'M. D.', or the title 'Dr.' or 'Doctor' or any other sign or appellation in a medical sense to his or her name or shall profess publicly to be a physician or surgeon, or who shall recommend, prescribe, or direct for the use of any person any drug, medicine, apparatus, or other agency for the cure, relief, or palliation of any ailment or disease of the mind or body, or for the cure or relief of any wound, fracture, or bodily injury, or deformity after having received or with the intent of receiving therefor, either directly or indirectly, any bonus, gift, or compensation, [he or she] shall be regarded as practising within the meaning of this act." It will be observed that it is provided by the above section that, "when a person shall append or prefix the letters 'M. B.', or 'M. D.', or the title 'Dr.' or 'Doctor' or any other sign or appellation in a medical sense to his or her name, or shall profess publicly to be a physician or surgeon, . . . [he or she] shall be regarded as practising within the meaning of this act." The evidence seems to be uncontradicted that the plaintiff in error did, upon a sign in front of his office, and in the notice published, prefix to his name the letters "Dr.," and it is quite clear from the evidence that they were used in a medical sense, and we are of the opinion that the jury were fully justified in so regarding them.

The legislature evidently intended, in enacting the law, to prevent persons not properly educated in the science of medicine from assuming to act as a physician, and to protect the public, and it has deemed it proper that every person assuming to act as a physician or surgeon should be properly licensed. In carrying into effect this law, it was competent for the legislature to define, as it has assumed to do in § 21, what evidence shall be deemed sufficient to constitute a practitioner within the meaning of the act. In view of the testimony of the physicians as to the proper definition of ophthalmology, it is quite clear from the advertisement of the plaintiff in error that he had assumed to hold himself out as a physician within the meaning of the act. And it is not only clear from the language of the advertisement itself, which would be generally understood as an assumption on his part of being a regular physician, or at least a specialist in that branch of medicine treating of ophthalmology, but the legislature has declared that prefixing the term "Dr.," to his name shall be so regarded. The law should not be so construed as to deprive the people of the benefits intended by the act, but such a construction should be given it as to carry into effect the evident intention of the legislature. See 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 786, and cases there cited.

Finding no error in the judgment of the Circuit Court, the same is affirmed.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE of the State of Michigan

v.

Monroe J. MCPHEE, Exceptant.

(.....Mich.....)

The fact that each member is entitled to trade out the amount he has paid in whenever he chooses to withdraw from the club does not prevent a suit club, which is a scheme by which a certain number of persons pay a small sum per week, and choose by lot each week one of the number who shall receive a suit of clothes worth much more than such weekly payment, upon receipt of which he ceases to be a member of the club, from being a lottery.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant before sentence to a ruling of the Circuit Court for Chippewa County directing a verdict of guilty in a prosecution for conducting a lottery. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Clyde Hayden, with Messrs. Holden & Holden, for exceptant.

Mr. John P. Conrick, for the People:

A lottery is "a scheme by which a result is reached by some action or means taken, and in which result man's choice or will has no part, nor can human reason, foresight, sagacity, or design, enable him to know or determine such result until the same has been accomplished."

Where skill or judgment is exercised in determining the result there is no lottery, but where pure chance determines we have one of the elements of a lottery.

Ostrander, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the conclusion of the testimony in this case, counsel on both sides asserted that there was no issue of fact to be determined, and requested the court to direct a verdict either of conviction or acquittal, according to his opinion of the law. The court instructed the jury that, under the testimony, they should render, and they did render, a verdict of guilty as charged, and the case comes here upon exceptions before sentence.

Respondent is charged in the information with setting up and promoting a lottery for merchandise, and that he did dispose of merchandise by way of lottery and gift enterprise, contrary to the form of the statute. He is a merchant tailor doing business at the city of Sault Ste. Marie, and, in connection with, or as a part of, the regular business, he conducted what is known as a "tailor suit club," or "suit club." This suit club had 30 members, who each paid to respondent $1 a week. Respondent gave receipts for the money, dated, and in the following form: "$1.00. Received of — one dollar, club dues. M. J. McPhee." To each members a number was allotted by the members themselves. These were put in a cigar box, thoroughly mixed and shaken, and a drawing was made from this box by one of the members according to some plan agreed upon among themselves. The drawings took place each Saturday night, and some member, as a result of the drawing, received for whatever he had paid in a suit of clothes or an overcoat valued at and worth $20, made to order by respondent. If a member won, he drew out of the club, and a new member was taken in. It might occur that one who had paid in but $1 would get the suit of clothes or overcoat, and it might occur that a member would pay $20 and participate in 20 drawings without securing either as a result of the drawing. It was a part of the agreement, however, and was the practice, to permit a member of the club to withdraw at any time, and upon such withdrawal he was entitled to receive from respondent clothing of the value of the money he had contributed to the club, or let the sum of money he had paid in stand as a credit and as part payment for clothing purchased of respondent. That is to say, if a member had paid $1 a week for twenty weeks, he had a credit of $20. If he had paid but six weeks, he had a credit of $6, which he could use with the respondent in the purchase of garments.

Counsel for respondent say that the only question involved is whether, upon this state of facts, a verdict of guilty was properly directed, or, to put it in another way, whether respondent was conducting a lottery or gift enterprise, within the meaning of our statute. The statute in question is § 11,344 of the Compiled Laws of 1897, and is the first section of chapter 316, entitled, "Of Offenses against the Public Policy." It provides that "every person who shall set up or promote, within this state, any lottery or gift enterprise for money, or shall dispose of any property, real or personal, goods, chattels, or merchandise or valuable thing, by the way of lottery or gift enterprise, and every person who shall aid, either by printing or writing, or shall in any way be concerned in the setting up, managing, or drawing of any such lottery or gift enterprise, or who shall in any house, shop, or building owned or occupied by him or under his control, knowingly permit the setting up, managing, or drawing of any such lottery or gift enterprise, or the sale of any lottery ticket or share of a ticket, or any other writing, certificate, bill, goods, chattels, or merchandise, token or other device purporting or intended to entitle the holder or bearer or other person to any prize or gift, or to any share of, or interest in, any prize or gift, to be drawn in any such lottery or gift enterprise, or who shall knowingly suffer money or other property to be raffled for in such house, shop, or building, or to be there won by throwing or using dice, or by any other game or course of chance, shall for every such offense be punished by a fine not exceeding $2,000, or by imprisonment in the county jail not more than one year." A subsequent section of the same chapter provides that if any person shall, after being convicted of any offense mentioned in this section, commit the like offense, or any other of the offenses therein mentioned, he shall, in addition to the fine provided therefor, be further punished by imprisonment in the state prison not more than three years, or by imprisonment in the county jail not more than one year.

The single contention of counsel is that, inasmuch as there was no chance for a member of the club to sustain a loss, respondent was not conducting a lottery. We have been referred to many definitions of the word "lottery," some of them made by lexicographers, some by judges, and particularly to one given in the third edition of Bishop on Statutory Crimes, which counsel say supports their contention, and which is: "A lottery may be defined to be any scheme whereby one, on paying money or other valuable thing to another, becomes entitled to receive from him such a return in value, or nothing, as some formula of chance may determine." We do not understand how this definition aids respondent. It is well known that in most lottery schemes some of those who pay get nothing. It is difficult to see how a definition intended to be general, and to describe the results to participants in a lottery, could well omit language indicating that the result might be nothing. But the learned author does not mean that, to be classed as a lottery, the scheme must have blanks. This is evidenced by the context and by cases cited. § 952. In another place the same author says that the word has not yet been defined in a manner which is both inclusive and exclusive. Our statute does not define the word. Nor need we attempt a definition. Like similar statutes in other of the states, our own has a general purpose, and this purpose is not alone evidenced by the language of the statute. In a large majority of the states, including Michigan, there is a constitutional limitation upon the power of the legislature to authorize lotteries. Few definitions are directly or indirectly attempted. These various constitutional inhibitions in effect recognize and affirm the rule stated in Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S. 814, 25 L. ed. 1079, that lotteries are not in the legal acceptance of the term mala in se, but may properly be made mala prohibita. Such a provision has been held to be so far self-executing as to warrant and require the court, in the absence of penal or other statutes upon the subject, to declare the charter of a private corporation, whose scheme and plan of business was within the constitutional inhibition, to be forfeited. State ex rel. Kellogg v. Kansas Mercantile Assn. 45 Kan. 351, 11 L. R. A. 430, 23 Am. St. Rep. 727, 25 Pac. 984. In the case mentioned it was said that the word "lottery" must be construed in the popular sense, with the view of remedying the mischief intended to be prevented, and to suppress all evasions for the continuance of the mischief. The word "lottery" is generic. No sooner is it defined by a court than ingenuity evolves some scheme within the mischief discussed, but not quite within the letter of the definition given. This is made very apparent in the large number of cases which we have examined in which various methods of distributing money or goods by chance are examined and discussed. It is said by counsel for respondent in their brief that this court, in People v. Elliott, 74 Mich. 264, 3 L. R. A. 403, 16 Am. St. Rep. 640, 41 N. W. 916, laid down a definition which did not include a possibility of loss. In that case, as in others, the language of the opinion is addressed to the facts before the court, and the contentions presented for decision. We approve the language used in the opinion in Ballock v. State, 73 Md. 1, 8 L. R. A. 671, 25 Am. St. Rep. 559, 20 Atl. 184, where it is said: "Our statute does not justify a court . . . in deciding a thing is not a lottery simply because there can be no loss, when there may be very large contingent gains, or because it lacks some element of a lottery according to some particular dictionary's definition, . . . when it has all the other elements, with all the pernicious tendencies which the state is seeking to prevent." In that case it was contended that no blanks were drawn, and the scheme considered provided for the ultimate return of the entire investment, with interest; the time of such return to certain holders of the bonds depending upon chance, and the inducement for investment being the possibility of getting a bonus, also determined by chance. See also State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Interstate Sav. Invest. Co. 64 Ohio St. 283, 52 L. R. A. 530, 83 Am. St. Rep. 754, 60 N. E. 220; Den ex dem. Wooden v. Shotwell, 23 N. J. L. 465; United States v. Olney, 1 Abb. (U. S.) 275, Fed. Cas. No. 15,918; State v. Mumford, 73 Mo. 647, 39 Am. Rep. 532; MacDonald v. United States, 12 C. C. A. 339, 24 U. S. App. 25, 63 Fed. 426; Reg. v. Harris, 10 Cox, C. C. 352. For a considerable collection of cases and general discussion, see Equitable Loan & Security Co. v. Waring, 117 Ga. 599, 62 L. R. A. 93, 97 Am. St. Rep. 177, 44 S. E. 320. The case of State v. Moren, 48 Minn. 555, 51 N. W. 618, is in its essential facts precisely like the case at bar. The only question considered by the court was whether the evidence was sufficient to bring the case within the condemnation of the statute. The Minnesota statute defines a lottery to be a scheme for the distribution of property by chance among persons who have paid, or agreed to pay, a valuable consideration for the chance, whether called a "lottery," "raffle," or "gift enterprise," or by any other name. The court held the term "lottery" to have no technical meaning; but under the statute it was to be construed in the popular sense, and with the view to remedy the mischief intended to be prevented. "The statute is intended to reach all devices which are in the nature of lotteries, in whatever form presented, and the courts will tolerate no evasions for the continuance of the mischief. Of the fact that the holder had the option to receive in goods the amount he had paid, it was said that it would probably operate only as an additional incentive to aid the lottery scheme. "It does not take the scheme out of the statute. They were not bought in order to get their face value in goods. The vicious element still inheres in the transaction. . . . The sale of a ticket gave the purchaser the chance to obtain something more than he paid for, and that became an extra inducement for the purchase." Counsel for respondent say that the Minnesota statute differs from ours, and that the court had before it what we have not,—a statutory definition of the word "lottery." The definition, however, is very broad, and cannot be said to contain any language which would make the decision on that account inapplicable here. Upon the facts and the construction placed by the court upon the statute, the case is decisive.

It cannot be denied that the respondent sought to, and presumably did, increase his business by a device or scheme, the feature of which, so far as securing patrons and customers was concerned, was the chance to obtain $20 worth of clothing for some sum of money less than $20. It was calculated to, and did, appeal to the gambling propensity of men, was within the mischief at which the legislation is aimed, was within the terms of the statute, and, in our opinion, a disposition of property by way of lottery. We are referred by counsel to no case which sustains their contention.

We have not lost sight of the fact that the charters of various cities permit ordinances forbidding lotteries and punishing promoters of them, treating them as minor offenders, nor that the statute before us warrants the imposition of a considerable penalty, and makes a second offense a felony. The statute is general, as it must be, and applies to big and to little lotteries. The extent of the mischief done by respondent is not a consideration which ought to affect our determination.

We are of opinion that the court below was right, and the conviction is therefore affirmed.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

BIBB BROOM CORN COMPANY, Respt.,
v.
ATCHISON, TOPEKA, & SANTA FE RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.
 (.....Minn.....)

- *1. It is the duty of a common carrier to whom goods are delivered for transportation to forward them promptly, and without unreasonable delay, to their destination.
- 2. If he fails to do so, and negligently and carelessly delays the shipment, and the goods are overtaken in transit, and damaged by an act of God which would not have caused the damage had there been no delay, he is liable, even though the act of God could not reasonably have been anticipated. The negligence and unreasonable delay is such a proximate or concurring cause as renders a carrier liable.
- 3. This rule applies whether the goods in their nature are perishable or nonperishable.

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the Municipal Court of Minneapolis denying an alternative motion for judgment non obstante veredicto, or for a new trial after verdict in plaintiff's favor, in an action brought to recover damages to property while in defendant's possession for transportation. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Belden, Hawley, & Jamison, for appellant:

Concurring negligence which, when combined with the act of God, is actionable, must be such as is in itself a real, producing cause of the injury.

Jones v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 91 Minn. 229, 103 Am. St. Rep. 507, 97 N. W. 893.

The test of liability is not whether the company used such particular foresight as is evident, after the accident happened, might have averted it had the danger been known, but whether it used that degree of care and prudence which a very cautious and prudent person would have used, under the apparent circumstances of the case, to prevent the accident, without reasonable knowledge that it was likely to occur.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts in this case are as follows: On or about May 12, 1903, plaintiff delivered to defendant at Stafford, Kansas, a car load of broom corn, to be transported to Minneapolis, this state. The route of transportation was by way of Kansas City, and defendant was to forward the car at that point, the terminus of its line, over the Chicago Great Western road. The car reached the freight yards of defendant at Kansas City on May 23d, but defendant wholly failed and neglected to send it forward or notify the Chicago Great Western Company of its arrival, though the evidence tends to show that immediately after the arrival of the car at Kansas City defendant sent a messenger to communicate the fact to the Great Western company, and that it was to be forwarded over its line, but through carelessness the messenger notified the Missouri Pacific company instead, and the Great Western was not informed of the matter at all. In consequence of the neglect of the messenger, the car remained in the yards of defendant until it was submerged by water in the great flood occurring during the last days of May and the first days of June at Kansas City, and the corn substantially destroyed. After the waters of the flood had receded, defendant, having first offered to forward the car to Minneapolis, and plaintiff having refused to accept the corn in its damaged condition, caused the same to be sold, and tendered plaintiff the proceeds, less freight charges. Plaintiff brought this action to recover the value of the corn, alleging in its complaint that it was damaged and injured while in the possession of defendant, through its negligence and carelessness. The delivery of the corn to defendant for transportation, and that it was damaged while in defendant's possession, are admitted in the answer, but it is alleged in defense that the damage was caused by an act of God; that an unusual and extraordinary rainfall occurred at Kansas City and vicinity at the time the car was in its yards, causing the river to overflow its banks and submerge defendant's yards, the occurrence and extent of which could not have been foreseen or anticipated. The trial court instructed the jury in part that, if the corn was destroyed by an act of God, unaccompanied by the concurrent negligence of defendant, plaintiff could not recover; but, in effect, left to the jury to say whether the delay in forwarding the car was negligence, and whether such negligence concurred in causing the damage. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff, and defendant appealed from an order denying its alternative motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict or for a new trial.

The only assignments of error requiring consideration are those which challenge the charge of the trial court, in which the jury was instructed that, if the negligent delay of defendant in forwarding the car concurred in causing the injury or loss complained of, defendant was liable. It is contended with much earnestness and ability by defendant's counsel that, notwithstanding there might have been negligent delay in forwarding the car from Kansas City to Minneapolis, but for which the corn would not have been damaged, yet the damage complained of resulted proximately from the flood, an act of God, and that, as plaintiff failed to show that defendant was chargeable with neglect in not foreseeing or guarding against the danger, no recovery can be had. The question presented, then, is whether a common carrier is liable to the owner of goods delivered to him for transportation, which are damaged or destroyed by an act of God while in his possession, in consequence of a negligent delay in forwarding them, whether the act of God could reasonably have been anticipated or not. The question is an important one, and the authorities are not in harmony. We have considered it with care in all its bearings, and reach the conclusion that the carrier is liable.

As a general rule, applicable to all cases of negligence, if damage is caused by the concurrent force of defendant's neglect and some other cause for which he is not responsible, including an act of God, he is nevertheless liable if his negligence is one of the proximate causes of the injury complained of, even though, under the particular circumstances, he was not bound to anticipate the interference of the intervening force which concurred with his own. In the application of this rule, however, the authorities are not agreed. It is held in some states, as applied to common carriers, that a negligent delay in forwarding property delivered to them for transportation, which are injured by an act of God, or other cause for which they are not responsible, and could not reasonably have been anticipated, does not render the carrier liable, although the property would not have been damaged had there been no delay. 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 596. Courts holding to this rule place their decisions on the ground that the act of God in such cases is the proximate cause of the injury, and not the delay in transportation. Herring v. Chesapeake & W. R. Co. 101 Va. 778, 45 S. E. 322. In other states the opposite doctrine is settled and adhered to. Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 40. The authorities are not at variance where the property damaged is perishable, or inherently susceptible to damage from climatic influences, as sudden changes in the weather. Changes in the weather are conditions which the carrier is bound to anticipate as likely to occur, and for injuries resulting to perishable goods from such causes the carrier is liable where his negligent delay in forwarding them contributes to cause the injury. Goods in this class are those likely to be damaged by freezing or from excessive heat. The authorities are at variance, in so far as negligent delay is concerned, only in cases involving property not perishable. The property in the case at bar was of that character, and would not have been damaged but for the flood that submerged the car while in the yards at Kansas City; neither would it have been damaged had defendant forwarded the car to Minneapolis promptly, and without unreasonable delay, as it was required by law to do. So the question is, Was the negligent delay of defendant in forwarding the car one of the proximate causes of the damage to the corn, or did such delay concur with the flood in fact causing the damage? It may be conceded, for the purposes of this case, that the flood was an act of God; that it was unprecedented, and beyond the reasonable anticipation of the most prudent residents of the vicinity where it occurred; and, unless we are to hold that the negligent delay rendered defendant liable, the case must be reversed.

One of the first cases reported in the books, so far as our research has extended, wherein the carrier is held liable for negligent delay in transporting goods, not perishable, which were injured in transit by an overpowering cause not reasonably to have been anticipated, is Michaels v. New York C. R. Co. 30 N. Y. 564, 86 Am. Dec. 415. In that case there was a delay of several days in forwarding certain dry goods delivered to the defendant for transportation, which were damaged in transit by an act of God,—a flood similar to the one in the case at bar. In disposing of the case and the contention of the railway company that it was exempt from liability for the reason that the injury complained of was the result of an act of God, the court said: When a carrier is intrusted with goods for transportation, and they are injured or lost in transit, the law holds him responsible for the injury. He is only exempted by showing that the injury was caused by an act of God or the public enemy; and to avail himself of such exemption he must show that he was himself free from fault at the time. His act or negligence must not concur or contribute to the injury. If he departs from the line of his duty, and violates his contract, and while thus in fault, and in consequence of that fault, the goods are injured by an act of God, which would not otherwise have caused the injury, he is not protected. That case has been consistently followed and adhered to in New York, and is now the settled law of that state. In Read v. Spaulding, 30 N. Y. 630, 86 Am. Dec. 426, it was held that, if a common carrier unreasonably delays goods received by him for transportation, and they are injured by an act of God in consequence of such delay, he must show, to exempt himself from liability, that the delay did not contribute to, or concur in, the injury. In Condict v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 54 N. Y. 500, it was said that it is the duty of a common carrier to forward goods delivered to him for transportation promptly, and within a reasonable time, and, if a loss occurs in which his negligence in part concurs, he is liable. See also Dunson v. New York C. R. Co. 3 Lans. 265. This doctrine has been followed and applied in other states. In Wolf v. American Exp. Co. 43 Mo. 421, 97 Am. Dec. 406, the court laid down the general rule in such cases in the following language: "The act of God which excuses the carrier must not only be the proximate cause of the loss, but the better opinion is that it must be the sole cause; and, where the loss is caused by the act of God, if the negligence of the carrier mingles with it as an active and co-operative cause, he is still responsible." In

Wald v. Pittsburg, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 162 Ill. 545, 35 L. R. A. 356, 53 Am. St. Rep. 332, 44 N. E. 888, it appeared that plaintiff had purchased of defendant a ticket entitling him to passage from Chicago to New York upon one of its trains known as the "Limited Express." He was also entitled, as a matter of law, to have his baggage, which was checked at the time he procured his ticket, forwarded by the same train. The baggage was, however, by the negligence of the baggage-gaman, forwarded from some point on the line by the day express, a train following the "Limited Express" a number of hours later. Plaintiff reached his destination in safety, but the day express which carried his baggage was overtaken by a flood at Johnstown, Pennsylvania,—an act of God,—and the baggage destroyed. The court held the defendant liable, saying in the opinion that the unnecessary delay of a carrier which subjects goods in his possession to loss by an act of God, which they would not otherwise have met with, is in itself such negligence as will render him liable. In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Gidley, 119 Ala. 523, 24 So. 753, it appeared that plaintiff delivered to defendant, a common carrier, at Gadsden, Alabama, goods to be transported to Philadelphia. The carrier unnecessarily delayed forwarding them for some days, and they were in the meantime destroyed by fire, for which defendant was in no way responsible, and for which it could not, under its contract, have been made liable to the owner of the goods. The court held that the unnecessary delay in shipment was the proximate cause of the loss, and that the carrier was liable. This rule of liability is followed in Kentucky. Cassilay v. Young, 4 B. Mon. 265, 39 Am. Dec. 505; Hernsheim Bros. v. Newport News & M. Valley Co. 18 Ky. L. Rep. 227, 35 S. W. 1115. Also in Maryland. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Keedy, 75 Md. 320, 23 Atl. 643. The foregoing cases all involve property not perishable, and the negligent delay was held either the proximate cause of the loss, or that it concurred with the act of God in causing the damage and rendered the carrier liable. Other cases, more or less in point, may be found collected in 36 Am. St. Rep. 839. See also Deming v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 48 N. H. 455, 2 Am. Rep. 287; Michigan C. R. Co. v. Curtis, 80 Ill. 324; Campbell v. Morse, Harp. L. 468; Meyer v. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. 41 La. Ann. 639, 17 Am. St. Rep. 408, 6 So. 218; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. McFadden Bros. 89 Tex. 138, 33 S. W. 853; Pruitt v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 62 Mo. 527. And the rule was, in effect, laid down, though the precise question here under consideration was not there involved in Jones v. Min- neapolis & St. L. R. Co. 91 Minn. 229, 103 Am. St. Rep. 507, 97 N. W. 893.

We have examined the authorities holding the opposite of this doctrine, and, while the courts adhering to the same are of eminent standing, we have no difficulty in adopting the view of the cases above cited. The rule that permits a carrier to excuse his negligence by an act of God overtaking him while thus in fault seems to us unsound. It is based on too strict an application of the rule of proximate cause. It is the duty of a common carrier to whom goods are delivered for transportation promptly and without unreasonable delay to forward them to their destination, and such was defendant's duty in the case at bar. This it failed to do, and its negligence in this respect is not seriously controverted. The car arrived at its yards in Kansas City on the 23d of May, and was permitted to remain there without proper effort to forward it until it was overtaken by the flood. It could have been moved from defendant's yards on any day after its arrival prior to the 29th of May, and, had this been done, the corn would not have been damaged. If defendant had acted as required by the terms of its contract, and as enjoined by law, the car would have been forwarded, and would have arrived at its destination prior to the flood. That defendant's neglect concurred and mingled with the act of God seems the only reasonable conclusion the facts will warrant, and we feel safe in applying the general rule that an act of God is not in such cases a defense. Every reason in equity and justice relieves a carrier from the performance of his contract and from liability for injuries to property in his custody for transportation, resulting exclusively from an act of God, or other inevitable accident or cause over which he has no control, and could not reasonably anticipate or guard against. But reasons of that nature lose their force and persuasive powers when applied to a carrier who violates his contract, and by his unreasonable delay and procrastination is overtaken by an overpowering cause, even though of a nature not reasonably to be anticipated or foreseen. If, but for his negligence, the loss would not have occurred, no sound reason will excuse him, and he should not be relieved by an application of the abstract principles of the law of proximate cause. No wrongdoer should be allowed to apportion or qualify his own wrong; and, if a loss occurs while his wrongful act is in operation and force, and which is attributable thereto, he should be held liable. Davis v. Garrett, 6 Bing. 716.

Our conclusions are that the trial court correctly instructed the jury, that the record presents no reversible errors, and the order appealed from is affirmed.

The authorities upon the precise question determined in *UNION P. R. CO. V. The discussion will not be extended, however, to the consideration of the duty owing to childhood (see note, Care required of railroad companies to prevent injuring small children upon the track, 25 L. is the omission or negligent discharge of legal duties only which come within the sphere of judicial cognizance." Those duties which are dictated merely by good morals, or by humane considerations, are not within the domain of the law. Feelings of kindness and sympathy may move the good Samaritan to minister to the needs of the sick and wounded at the roadside, but the law imposes no such obligation, and suffering humanity has no legal complaint against those who pass by on the other side. Legal rights are relative, and arise out of those complex relations of human society which create correlative rights and duties, whose performance is so necessary to the good order and well being of society that the state makes their observance obligatory. Unless, therefore, the relation existing between the sick, helpless, or injured and those who witness their distress, is such that the law imposes the duty of providing the necessary relief, there is neither obligation to minister on the one hand, nor cause for legal complaint on the other. *Allen v. III. Principles which determine duty in certain relations.

a. Duty of special care due to persons under disability in general.

It is a rule of the common law, recognized as necessary to good order and to the proper protection of society, that, in the exercise of his legal rights, one is bound to observe ordinary care not to injure others. As subjects of this general duty, persons under disability constitute no exception. And one who is guilty of a breach of such duty as to them may be held liable for the consequences, although his act or omission might have been attended with less serious results, or might not have resulted in injury at all, but for the injured person's previous disability. But the law goes further, and imposes the duty of exercising special care toward persons more or less disabled from caring for themselves. What is ordinary care is dependent upon circumstances. When one is brought into relation to a child, he is bound to use more prudence than in dealing with an adult, and, if a person is blind or deaf, or unconscious from any cause, he cannot be treated as one in the full possession of his faculties, if his disability is known. Under such circumstances, ordinary care is such as men of ordinary prudence would exercise in a like situation. And when the law requires a railroad company to check the speed of its train upon discovering a child or person in a helpless condition on the track, when the sounding of the whistle would be an exercise of sufficient care as to a healthy adult, in the possession of all his faculties, it is no more than ordinary prudence and a due regard for human life dictate. As some of the authorities observe. It is a just and beneficent principle, running through all the cases, that what humanity requires must be done by those who act with knowledge of another's helplessness.

Upon the foregoing propositions the authorities are agreed. But when we turn to the cases involving some limitation upon this duty, as where the party under disability is a trespasser, and to those cases where the disability exposing a party to peril is due more or less to his own negligence, we are met with a great contrariety of opinion. These diverse opinions are collected in this note, and it will help us better to appreciate their respective values as authority if we first consider the principles upon which they are based.

b. Limitation upon this duty where disabled party is trespasser.

Some of the authorities, in considering the circumstances bringing persons into relation to each other, and the duty imposed thereby, seem to give undue prominence to the wrong of a merely technical trespass, and fail sufficiently to recognize the element of knowledge, with reference to the presence of another within the range of one's action, and the duty that comes with knowledge, under the general obligation to humanity, and the respect due the natural right of every man to the enjoyment of life. It is accordingly held by some courts that the only duty owing a disabled trespasser is to refrain from wilfully or wantonly injuring him, and Miss. 361, 30 So. 711; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Weber, 33 Kan. 554, 52 Am. Rep. 543, 6 Pac. 877.

Smith, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action brought by Adeline Cappier, the mother of Irvin Ezelle, to recover damages resulting to her by reason of the loss of her son, who was run over by a car of plaintiff in error, and died from the injuries received. The trial court, at the close of the evidence introduced to support a recovery by plaintiff below, held that no careless act of the railway company's servants in the operation of the car was shown, and refused to permit the case to be considered by the jury on the allegations and attempted proof of such negligence. The petition, however, contained an averment that the injured person had one leg and an arm cut off by the car wheels, and that the servants of the railway company failed to call a surgeon, or to render him any assistance after the accident, but permitted him to remain by the side of the tracks and bleed to death. Under this charge of negligence a recovery was had.

While attempting to cross the railway tracks, Ezelle was struck by a moving freight car pushed by an engine. A yardmaster in charge of the switching operations was riding on the end of the car nearest to the deceased, and gave warning by shouting to him. The warning was either too late, or no heed was given to it. The engine was that no liability arises from the omission of ordinary care to avoid injury, even after the presence of the trespasser and his helpless condition are known. Griawold v. Boston & M. R. Co. 183 Mass. 484, 67 N. E. 854; Mason v. Missouri P. R. Co. 27 Kan. 83, 41 Am. Rep. 405.

But the preponderance of authority is with the position that a merely technical trespasser does not forfeit his right to the enjoyment of life; and that, while he assumes the risk of dangers incident to the condition of premises upon which he trespasses, and of instrumentalities with which he comes in contact, yet, when his presence becomes known to the owner, he comes at once under the protection of the rule that one must use ordinary care to prevent his conduct resulting in injury to another. As Lord Denman has well said: "Everyone in the conduct of that which may be harmful to others, if misconducted, is bound to the use of due care and skill, and the wrongdoer is not without the pale of the law for this purpose." Colchester v. Brooke, 7 Q. B. 377. It is relation, accompanied with knowledge, or the presumption of knowledge, which limits or conditions the freedom of one's right of action. A man who is alone in a wilderness is free to act as he pleases; but when he transfers his action to an inhabited locality, where he knows, or has reason to believe, there are persons liable to be affected by his acts, he must have respect to their right of security, and must so qualify his conduct as to avoid doing them harm. Likewise, the owner of premises may presume that he is alone in their enjoyment, except as he may have given invitation to others, and is entitled to the freedom of action which his exclusive possession warrants. But when that presumption is overcome by knowledge of another's presence, the duty of using ordinary care to avoid injury to such person immediately arises.

The farmer who discovers a trespasser crossing his field, and the railroad company that observes a man upon its right of way, have no more reason to omit ordinary care to prevent their affirmative acts resulting in injury to the person thus trespassing upon their premises, than they have toward one who is lawfully there. This knowledge of a trespasser's presence, however, is not sufficient to impose the duty of showing him special care because of some disability which increases his danger, unless his disability also is known, or is sufficient.

ly evident to the senses to charge one with knowledge. Therefore, the duty of exercising such special care as the circumstances may require to avoid injury to a disabled trespasser is conditioned upon knowledge of his presence and knowledge of his disability.

c. Duty limited by negligence of person under disability.

Again the rule denying relief to a party injured, where his own negligence concurred with that of the defendant in causing the injury, seems to be regarded by some authorities as based upon the theory that the negligence of the plaintiff in such case "justifies or excuses the negligence of the defendant." Consistent with this theory, it is held that no duty is owing a person negligently coming within the range of another's action, save to refrain from wilfully or wantonly injuring him. Hence, these authorities deny to the person injured any remedy, even when his negligence was not the proximate cause of his injuries; as where the injury to which his negligence subjected him might have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary care on the part of the defendant.

But the better reason for the rule denying relief in cases of concurring negligence is that the courts will not undertake an apportionment of the damage where an injury occurs through the concurring acts of negligence of both parties. Needham v. San Francisco & S. J. R. Co. 37 Cal. 409, 419; Isbell v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 27 Conn. 393, 71 Am. Dec. 78; Trow v. Vermont C. R. Co. 24 Vt. 487, 494, 58 Am. Dec. 191; Cleveland, C. & C. R. Co. v. Terry, 8 Ohio St. 570, 581; Simpson v. Hand, 6 Whart. 311, 36 Am. Dec. 231. The party inflicting injury is allowed to escape judgment, "because, from the nature of the case, it is unable to ascertain what share of the damages is due to his negligence. He is both legally and morally to blame, but there is no standard by which the law can measure the consequences of his fault, and therefore, and therefore only, he is allowed to go free of judgment." Hence, where the negligence of the injured party is not the proximate cause of his injuries, he may be entitled to damages, notwithstanding his negligence, because the reason for denying him relief, where the negligence of both parties concurs in producing the injury, does not exist.

stopped. After the injured man was clear of the track, the yardmaster signaled the engineer to move ahead, fearing, as he testified, that a passenger train then about due would come upon them. The locomotive and car went forward over a bridge, where the general yardmaster was informed of the accident, and an ambulance was summoned by telephone. The yardmaster then went back where the injured man was lying, and found three Union Pacific switchmen binding up the wounded limbs and doing what they could to stop the flow of blood. The ambulance arrived about thirty minutes later, and Ezelle was taken to a hospital, where he died a few hours afterwards.

In answer to particular questions of fact, the jury found that the accident occurred at 5:35 P. M.; that immediately one of the railway employees telephoned to police headquarters for help for the injured man; that the ambulance started at 6:05 P. M., and reached the nearest hospital with Ezelle at 6:20 P. M., where he received proper medical and surgical treatment.

Judgment against the railway company was based on the following question and answer:

Q. Did not defendant's employees bind up Ezelle's wounds, and try to stop the flow of blood, as soon as they could after the accident happened?

A. No.

The lack of diligence in the respect stated was intended, no doubt, to apply to the yardmaster, engineer, and fireman in charge

What duty, then, does the law impose upon one who is brought into relation to another through the latter's negligence? According to the preponderance of authority, it requires that he shall be in the exercise of ordinary care in the immediate action in which he is engaged; and, if that action is calculated to create circumstances which imperil human life, he must be on the lookout in places where persons may be reasonably expected to be present to prevent his action resulting in injury. The purpose of such lookout being to discover situations requiring preventive effort to avoid injury, its omission is negligence, which will subject one to liability, although the danger to which the injured party was subjected was unknown to him, if it might have been known in time to avoid injury, had the proper lookout been maintained. And, of course, where the danger of the negligent party is discovered, ordinary care requires preventive effort to avoid the infliction of injury according to the demands of the situation. In a word, the law holds all persons to the observance of ordinary care always when brought into relation to others, and charges them with the consequences of the failure of that duty, if such negligence, and not the preceding negligence of the injured party, is the proximate cause of the injury.

The leading authority for this doctrine is the early case of Davies v. Mann, 10 Mees. & W. 546, where it appeared that the plaintiff, having fettered the fore feet of his donkey, turned it into the highway. Thereafter the defendant coming down a slight descent with a team and wagon, at a smartish pace, ran against the donkey, and knocked it down, and, the wheels passing over it, it died from its injuries. Parke, B., said: "Although the ass may have been wrongfully there, still the defendant was bound to go along the road at such a pace as would be likely to prevent mischief. Were this not so, a man might justify the driving over goods left on a public highway, or even over a man lying asleep there, or the purposely running against a carriage going on the wrong side of the road."

The doctrine of this case is now generally accepted by the courts of the United States. See note, Doctrine of "last clear chance," 55 L. R. A. 418.

The foregoing rules respecting the care due to trespassers and persons guilty of contributory negligence are applicable to situations where the person to be affected is suffering from some disability, with this addition, that, where such person's disability is known, or with ordinary care might have been discovered, where the duty to discover exists, then ordinary care to avoid injury includes such an increased measure of care as an ordinarily prudent person would exercise, in view of the helplessness of the person to be affected, and the danger to be avoided. The law will not tolerate the infliction of unnecessary injury upon one who has negligently brought himself within the range of the otherwise lawful action of another. And where such person is not only less culpable, because of infirmities which render it more difficult for him to avoid the place of danger, or because of some disability which has overtaken him after coming to such place, but is also less able to escape from the danger into which he has come, there is the more reason for requiring those coming into relation to him to exercise due care to avoid doing him harm, and to so qualify their action as the nature of the disability may demand, if the same has come to their knowledge.

d. Another's negligence not excuse for wilful or wanton injury.

While some authorities deny the existence of the duty of observing ordinary care to avoid injury either to a trespasser or to one guilty of contributory negligence, even as to affirmative acts calculated to imperil human life, all courts agree that such circumstances are never an excuse for an injury wilfully or wantonly inflicted.

The elements necessary to characterize an injury as wilfully inflicted in such cases are: (1) Knowledge of a situation requiring the exercise of ordinary care and diligence to avert injury to another; (2) ability to avoid the resulting harm by ordinary care and diligence in the use of the means at hand; (3) the omission to use such care and diligence to avert the threatened danger, when to the ordinary mind it must be apparent that the result is likely to prove disastrous to another. Such omission, of course, may arise from a deliberate purpose to inflict injury, but it is more commonly due to that reckless disregard for the safety of others to which the law imputes an intention to do harm. Western Maryland R. Co. v. Kehoe, 83 Md. 434, 452, 35 Atl.

of the car and engine. These facts bring us to a consideration of the legal duty of these employees toward the injured man after his condition became known. Counsel for defendant in error quote the language found in Beach on Contributory Negligence, 3d ed. § 215, as follows: "Under certain circumstances, the railroad may owe a duty to a trespasser after the injury. When a trespasser has been run down, it is the plain duty of the railway company to render whatever service is possible to mitigate the severity of the injury. The train that has occasioned the harm must be stopped, and the injured person looked after, and, when it seems necessary, removed to a place of safety, and carefully nursed, until other relief can be brought to the disabled person."

90; West Virginia C. & P. R. Co. v. State, 96 Md. 652, 667, 61 L. R. A. 574, 54 Atl. 669; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Lankford, 88 Tex. 499, 31 S. W. 355.

The distinction between mere negligence toward a person in peril, after his situation has been discovered, and the wilful or wanton infliction of an injury, is frequently overlooked, and is the occasion for some conflict among the authorities. It is perhaps true, also, that some of the cases call for some discrimination in determining whether an act is merely negligent or wilful. And the question is troublesome mostly to those courts which refuse to apply the doctrine of proximate cause to plaintiff's negligence. But that such distinction exists is evident. For instance, a railroad company has been held liable for an injury inflicted through the negligent refusal of an engineer to obey a signal to stop his train upon the discovery by the brakeman of a sleeping boy under a car. If, however, the brakeman who made the discovery in such case had omitted his efforts to have the train stopped after seeing the boy's peril, the injury would have been wilful. Garza v. Texas Mexican R. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 41 S. W. 172. It is likewise apparent that the duty to a person in peril, after the discovery of his situation, may be performed in such a manner as to render the guilty party liable as for negligence, when his conduct could not be denominated as wanton or wilful. Thus, in Donahoe v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 83 Mo. 543, where a locomotive engineer, seeing children near the track, and women running toward his train, and excitedly waving their hands, a quarter of a mile distant, put his hand on the throttle, "thinking something might turn up," but made no effort to check the speed of the train, until he discovered a child two and one-half years old on the track about 250 feet in front of him, the railroad company was held liable for negligence and carelessness in disregarding warnings with reference to a condition of danger, which clearly gave notice, and demanded that the train should be checked or stopped. And there are numerous authorities which hold that one may be liable for a mere inadvertence in his conduct toward a trespasser or person guilty of contributory negligence after the danger of such person has been discovered. See, among other authorities cited in this note, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Vanarsdell, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1432, 77 S. W. 1103; Clark v. Wilmington 60 L. R. A.

The principal authority cited in support of this doctrine is Northern C. R. Co. v. State, 29 Md. 420, 96 Am. Dec. 545. The court in that case first held that there was evidence enough to justify the jury in finding that the operatives of the train were negligent in running it too fast over a road crossing without sounding the whistle, and that the number of brakemen was insufficient to check its speed. Such negligence was held sufficient to uphold the verdict, and would seem to be all that was necessary to be said. The court, however, proceeded to state that, from whatever cause the collision occurred, it was the duty of the servants of the company, when the man was found on the pilot of the engine in a helpless and insensible condition, to remove him, and

e. Summary.

The sum of the foregoing principles, and of the preponderance of authority under the decisions collected in this note, may be concisely stated as follows:

That the duty of exercising ordinary care to prevent injury resulting from one's lawful action arises immediately when one comes into relation to others. That this relation may be actual, as where persons are known to be present within the range of one's action, or it may be prospective, as where the action occurs in a place where others may reasonably be expected to be present. That, when the relation is prospective in its nature, ordinary care requires a due degree of caution in one's action, in proportion to the probability of others being affected, and in mere anticipation of their presence. It requires, further, that the person acting be on the lookout to discover the presence of others within the range of his action. And for an injury resulting from the failure of this duty, or from want of due care in the performance of the action causing injury, one may be liable in damages, although he was without knowledge of the injured person's presence, and although the injured party was guilty of negligence not the proximate cause of his injury. That this prospective relation cannot exist as to trespassers, because persons cannot reasonably be expected to be present in places where they have no right to be; and, therefore, no duty arises as to trespassers until one is brought into actual relation to them through knowledge of their presence. That, finally, when one is brought into actual relation to another, he is bound to use ordinary care to avoid injury to him, whether the latter is a trespasser or not, and although his negligence has contributed to the creation of a situation requiring preventive effort on the part of others to avoid injury; and neither of these circumstances can in any event justify a wilful or wanton injury. That in all these varied relations, except that imposing the duty of dis-do it with proper regard to his safety and the laws of humanity. In that case the injured person was taken in charge by the servants of the railway company, and, being apparently dead, without notice to his family, or sending for a physician to ascertain his condition, he was moved to defendant's warehouse, laid on a plank, and locked up for the night. The next morning, when the warehouse was opened, it was found that during the night the man had revived from his stunned condition, and moved some paces from the spot where he had been laid, and was found in a stooping posture, dead, but still warm, having died from hemorrhage of the arteries of one leg which was crushed at and above the knee. It had been proposed to place him in the defendant's station house, which was a comfortable building, but the telegraph operator objected, and directed him to be taken into the warehouse, a place used for the deposit of old barrels and other rubbish. The Maryland case does not support what is so broadly stated in Beach on Contributory Negligence. It is cited by Judge Cooley, in his work on Torts, in a note to a chapter devoted to the negligence of bailees (chap. 20), indicating that the learned author understood the reasoning of the decision to apply where the duty began after the railway employees had taken charge of the injured person. After the trespasser on the track of a railway company has been injured in collision with a train, and the servants of the company have assumed to take charge of covery, the disability of the party to be affected by one's action imposes the duty of exercising greater care to avoid injury, according to the demands of the situation, than is required toward persons generally. But, since a person under disability is an exception to the condition of persons generally, the duty of observing special care as to such person does not arise until his disability is known, or until circumstances are presented which are sufficient to charge one with knowledge thereof; and until such disability is known, or may be known by the exercise of ordinary care, where the duty to discover exists, one has the right to presume that a person with whom he is brought into relation is in the possession of all his faculties, and has the ability of people generally to care for himself. That, while the duty to discover another's disability is imposed at places where persons are likely to be present, the measure of care required under such circumstances is no greater than that imposed as to persons generally, until the disability is known. That this duty of exercising special care in respect to helpless persons is applicable to situations where one's action has resulted in injury to another, either with or without his fault, and requires the removal of the injured party to a place of safety, where his injury may receive proper attention, to prevent aggravation of the injury.

IV. Duty to avoid injury.

a. To the sick and infirm.

The obligation to exercise greater care to avoid injury to the sick and the infirm, than is required toward the strong, is not based upon sentiment, other than the value which the law commonly sets upon human life. It is simply the recognition of a measure of helplessness in such persons, which must be met with a care commensurate with the necessities of their situation. Bray v. Latham, 81 Ga. 640, 8 S. E. 64; Cincinnati, I. St. L. & C. R. Co. v. Cooper, 120 Ind. 469, 473, 6 L. R. A. 241, 16 Am. St. Rep. 334, 22 N. E. 340.

But the greater care demanded in such cases is not different in degree from that required toward those having no bodily infirmity. In either case only ordinary care is required, as measured by the demands of the particular situation. Culbertson v. Holliday, 50 Neb. 229, 69 L. R. A.

69 N. W. 858; Cleveland, C. & C. R. Co. v. Terry, 8 Ohio St. 570, 581; Sleeper v. Sandown, 52 N. H. 244; Stanley v. Cedar Rapids & M. C. R. Co. 119 Iowa, 526, 532, 93 N. W. 489.

"A sick or aged person, a delicate woman, a lame man, or a child, is entitled to more attention and care from a railroad company than one in good health and under no disability. They are entitled to more time in which to get on or off the cars; they are entitled to more consideration when crossing a street, to the end that the cars shall not run over them." Sheridan v. Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. 36 N. Y. 39, 93 Am. Dec. 490.

The old, the lame, and the infirm are entitled to the use of the streets; and more care must be exercised toward them by engineers in charge of railroad trains than toward those who have better powers of motion. If an aged or infirm person is seen upon the track, and it appears that he will not escape in time to avoid injury, it is the duty of the engineer to stop the train, if he can, so that the disabled person can make his escape. O'Mare v. Hudson River R. Co. 38 N. Y. 445, 98 Am. Dec. 61; Misouri P. R. Co. v. Weisen, 65 Tex. 443.

It is the duty of a street railway company to run its cars with due regard to the rights of the infirm, of aged persons, and of children of tender years. All of these classes of persons have the right to use the public streets, and the railroad company is liable for the damages they sustain, if it does not use due care, in proportion to the danger, to prevent injury to the various classes. Indianapolis Street R. Co. v. Schomberg (Ind. App.) 71 N. E. 237.

A railroad company operating its trains along a public thoroughfare, and knowing that old and infirm persons, children, and drunken persons are liable at all times to be abroad on the street, must use every precaution to avoid inflicting injury. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Hutchinson, 47 Ill. 408.

Where a person upon a railroad track is taken with a sudden and violent sickness and prostration, it is the duty of those in charge of a railroad train to exercise ordinary care, not only to protect such person when discovered in a helpless condition upon the track, but also to ascertain whether he is upon the track in such condition. Yoakum v. Mettasch (Tex. Civ. App.) 26 S. W. 129.

A railroad company owes to a man lying insensible upon a railroad track the duty to avoid him, the duty arises to exercise such care in his treatment as the circumstances will allow. We are unable, however, to approve the doctrine that when the acts of a trespasser himself result in his injury, where his own negligent conduct is alone the cause, those in charge of the instrument which inflicted the hurt, being innocent of wrongdoing, are nevertheless blamable in law if they neglect to administer to the sufferings of him whose wounds we might say were self-imposed.

With the humane side of the question courts are not concerned. It is the omission or negligent discharge of legal duties only which come within the sphere of judicial cognizance. For withholding relief from the suffering, for failure to respond to the calls of worthy charity, or for faltering in the bestowment of brotherly love on the unfortunate, penalties are found not in the laws of men, but in that higher law, the violation of which is condemned by the voice of conscience, whose sentence of punishment for the recreant act is swift and sure. In the law of contracts it is now well understood that a promise founded on a moral obligation will not be enforced in the courts. Bishop states that some of the older authorities recognize a moral obligation as valid, and says: "Such a doctrine, carried to its legitimate results, would release the tribunals from the duty to administer the law of the land, and put in the place of law the varying ideas of morals which the changing incumbents of the bench might from time to injuring him, if, by the exercise of due care, his situation can be discovered in time to stop the train; and the failure to make such discovery, and to stop the train, because of the unlawful speed at which the train is traveling, is negligence. Hankerson v. Southwestern R. Co. 59 Ga. 598, 61 Ga. 114, 72 Ga. 182.

A railroad company may be liable for running over an idiot at a crossing. If its employees in charge of the train saw him upon the track, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have seen him, in time to stop the train, and had actual knowledge, or reasonable ground for the belief, that, on account of some mental or physical infirmity, the idiot could not step off the track in time to avoid injury. Dally v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 106 N. C. 301, 11 S. E. 320.

But where an engineer at once gives the alarm signals upon discovering a man lying upon the track, reverses the engine, and does all in his power to avoid running over him, no liability, as for gross negligence, arises, although the man's presence on the track is due to his having fallen there in an unconscious condition from the effects of a fever. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Brown (Tex.) 18 S. W. 670.

It is well known that women when pregnant are more likely to be nervously affected, and that any fright or injury sustained under such circumstances is liable to be attended with serious consequences. Therefore, where a landlord entered upon the premises of his tenant, and, in the presence of the latter's wife, whom he knew to be far advanced in pregnancy, made an assault upon some negroes, and his conduct so frightened the lessee's wife that a miscarriage and consequent ill health resulted, he was held liable for these consequences. Hill v. Kimball, 76 Tex. 210, 7 L. R. A. 619, 13 S. W. 50.

In the foregoing cases the negligence for which a liability was imposed is based upon the failure to exercise the greater care which the known physical infirmity of the person injured manifestly demanded. But the physically infirm are, likewise, entitled to exemption from the consequences of another's omission to exercise the care due to persons generally, even though their disabilities are not known to the negligent party. One cannot escape from liability for the consequences of his negligent act because the person injured was already crippled or suffering from some disease which tended to aggravate or enlarge the results of his negligence. If he has been guilty of an act which is negligent in its nature as to persons generally, he is liable for the consequences of his negligence to a person under disability, although the same consequences might not have attended the action if the person affected had been sound in body.

"The duty of care, and of abstaining from injuring another, is due to the weak, the sick, the infirm, equally with the healthy and strong, and when that duty is violated the measure of damage is the injury inflicted, even though that injury might have been aggravated, or might not have happened at all but for the peculiar physical condition of the person injured." In this case it was held that a child's inheritance of an hysterical diathesis in no manner affected her right to protection from injury through defendant's negligence. Laplane v. Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. S. Co. 40 La. Ann. 661, 1 L. R. A. 378, 4 So. 875; Tice v. Munn, 94 N. Y. 621.

Where a person partially recovered from a fractured limb, which is still weak and more susceptible to fracture than it would have been if the injury had not occurred, receives an injury resulting in a second fracture, the party causing the injury cannot escape liability for the consequences of his fault because such injury may have been aggravated, or more easily caused, by reason of the first fracture. Drless v. Frederick, 73 Tex. 460, 11 S. W. 493.

The duty of municipal corporations to keep their streets in reasonable repair extends to the sick and infirm, as well as to the healthy and strong. All have a right to use the streets, and to rely upon the performance of this duty. A person is not to be precluded, therefore, from recovering for injuries resulting from a breach of this duty, because at the time he was suffering from some disability which rendered him more susceptible to injury than one who is without physical infirmity, if he was in the exercise of ordinary care, as measured by the conduct of persons of ordinary prudence, when under like disability, and under similar circumstances.

The sidewalks of the city are for the use of those with organic predisposition to disease, as well as for the healthy and robust, and the former are entitled to have them made reasonably safe for such use. Any injuries which they may sustain by reason of defects in such sidewalks, which result in aggravating an already time entertain." Bishop, Contr. § 44. Ezelle's injuries were inflicted, as the court below held, without the fault of the yardmaster, engineer, or fireman in charge of the car and locomotive. The railway company was no more responsible than it would have been had the deceased been run down by the cars of another railroad company on a track parallel with that of plaintiff in error. If no duty was imposed on the servants of defendant below to take charge of and care for the wounded man in such a case, how could a duty arise under the circumstances of the case at bar? In Barrows on Negligence, p. 4, it is said: "The duty must be owing from the defendant to the plaintiff; otherwise there can be no negligence, so far as the plaintiff is concerned. . . . And the duty must be owing to plaintiff in an individual capacity, and not merely as one of the general public. This excludes from actionable negligence all failures to observe the obligations imposed by charity, gratitude, generosity, and the kindred virtues. The moral law would obligate an attempt to rescue a person in a perilous position,—as a drowning child,—but the law of the land does not require it, no matter how little personal risk it might involve, provided that the person who declines to act is not responsible for the peril." See Kenney v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 70 Mo. 252-257. In the several cases cited in the brief of counsel for defendant in error to sustain the judgment of the trial court it will be found that the negligence on which recoveries were based occurred after the time when the person injured was in the custody and care of those who were at fault in failing to give him proper treatment.

The judgment of the court below will be reversed, with directions to enter judgment on the findings of the jury in favor of the railway company.

diseased condition, are results for which the city must respond, if due to its negligence. Denver v. Hyatt, 28 Colo. 139, 63 Pac. 403; McNamara v. Clintonville, 62 Wis. 207, 51 Am. Rep. 722, 22 N. W. 472; Smalley v. Appleton, 75 Wis. 18, 43 N. W. 826; Hall v. Cadillac, 114 Mich. 99, 72 N. W. 33.

A municipal corporation cannot escape liability for an injury caused by a defective sidewalk, resulting in necrosis of the humerus, although the injury would not have been attended with such result but for a previous organic tendency to scrofula in the party injured. A city is "chargeable with knowledge that people of different bodily conditions, travel its streets, and that among these are the weak, the decrepit, and those with organic predisposition to disease. It is reasonable to expect that in certain cases, if an injury happen to one of the latter class, his full recovery therefrom may be retarded or prevented by such predisposition or tendency to disease. In the present case the defendant is chargeable with knowledge that persons with a constitutional tendency to scrofula (a very large class in any community) constantly travel its streets and sidewalks, and that such tendency to that disease might greatly aggravate a bodily injury. Hence, it had reasonable grounds to expect that, if one of that class were injured by reason of the admitted defect in the sidewalk, the disease might develop, and greatly retard, and perhaps prevent, a cure, as in this case." Stewart v. Ripon, 38 Wis. 584, 591.

One who is crippled, and necessarily uses crutches, has the same right to use the sidewalks of a town as anyone who is not in his condition. And if the sidewalk is unsafe for persons having the use of their limbs, the fact that one is a cripple will not defeat his right of recovery for injuries sustained from a defect in the walk, if he used care proportionate to his condition. But "It is not the duty of the city, in the construction and repair of its sidewalks, to provide against injury to a person in a crippled condition any further than for persons having the ordinary use of their physical powers; all it is required to do is to use ordinary care to keep the walks in a reasonably safe condition for persons using ordinary care, and with the ordinary capacity to care for themselves." Mt. Vernon v. Brooks, 39 Ill. App. 426.

This duty of a municipality to keep its highways in repair for the sick extends to women in the state of pregnancy. The susceptibility of a pregnant woman to injury does not relieve a municipality from liability for the consequences of an omission of such duty. It is under obligation to keep its streets in such repair that they will be reasonably safe for a woman in her condition to travel over. Lewis v. Independence, 54 Mo. App. 183.

Likewise, as to other negligent acts, pregnant women are held to be entitled to damages for injuries suffered in consequence thereof, although such consequences would not have attended the negligent act but for the existence of pregnancy. Thus, where a railroad company's cars leave its track, and are sent crashing into the house of a pregnant woman, and the fright thereby induced causes a miscarriage, the railroad company is liable. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Hunerberg, 16 Ill. App. 387.

A trespasser who uses violent and abusive language to a woman, which so visibly affects her that he must know that injury will result, cannot be excused from the consequences of his misconduct, upon the ground that the same results would not follow but for her pregnancy, which fact is unknown to him. Brownback v. Fralley, 78 Ill. App. 262.

Likewise, a landlord who, with knowledge that the wife of a tenant holding over is confined to her bed with heart disease, commences to tear down the house on the next day after the expiration of the lease, thereby aggravating her illness, is liable for her miscarriage and death. If they are the proximate result of his trespass. Prelser v. Wielandt, 48 App. Div. 569, 62 N. Y. Supp. 890.

And where an intoxicated person causes a pregnant woman to flee in fright, and she falls while attempting to climb a fence, which results in a miscarriage, he is liable for the consequences. Barbee v. Reese, 60 Miss. 906.

But where the injury resulted from the use of threats and abusive language to a pregnant woman's husband, and the defendant had neither knowledge of her presence nor of her condition, it was held that defendant was not liable for a miscarriage induced by his conduct. Phillips v. Dickerson, 85 Ill. 11, 28 Am. Rep. 607.

And in Renner v. Canfield, 36 Minn. 90, 1 Am. St. Rep. 654, 30 N. W. 435, recovery was denied for the miscarriage of a pregnant woman, produced by fright from the unlawful shooting of a dog, where the presence of the woman was unknown to the person doing the shooting.

According to some authorities, misconduct inducing fright, and which results in a miscarriage, does not subject the guilty party to liability. Mitchell v. Rochester R. Co. 151 N. Y. 107, 34 L. R. A. 781, 56 Am. St. Rep. 604, 45 N. E. 354; Nelson v. Crawford, 122 Mich. 466, 80 Am. St. Rep. 577, 81 N. W. 335. And see further, upon recovery for such injury, notes, Recovery of damages for miscarriage, 32 L. R. A. 142; and Extent of trespasser's liability for consequential injuries resulting from the trespass, 53 L. R. A. 626, 638.

b. To persons of defective sight or hearing.

The blind and the deaf are entitled to the same protection against injury that the law accords to those in the full possession of their faculties, and may recover damages for the negligent omission of the ordinary duties owing the latter, although their performance might not have saved them from the injury sustained. And, if their disabilities are known to those coming into relation to them, the duty of greater care to avoid doing them harm immediately arises; and the failure to exercise such increased care is culpable negligence within the rule of proximate cause, stated above. If a deaf man on a railroad track fails to heed the usual signals, and those in charge of an approaching train know of his disability, or if his appearance indicates that he is insensible to his danger, after warnings which a person in possession of all his faculties would be likely to heed, they must stop the train, if necessary, to avoid injuring him.

While a village owes a blind man no greater duty with respect to keeping its sidewalks in a safe condition for public travel than it owes to others in the full possession of their faculties, yet such person, in going upon the public streets and walks, is not to be deprived of the protection afforded to other citizens. Carter v. Nunda, 55 App. Div. 501, 66 N. Y. Supp. 1059.

"The streets and sidewalks are for the benefit of all conditions of people, and all have the right, in using them, to assume that they are in good condition, and to regulate their conduct upon that assumption. A person may walk or drive in the darkness of the night, relying upon the belief that the corporation has performed its duty, and that the street or the walk is in a safe condition. He walks by a faith justified by law, and if his faith is unfounded, and he suffers an injury, the party in fault must respond in damages. So, one whose sight is dimmed by age, or a near-sighted person whose range of vision was always imperfect, or one whose sight has been injured by disease, is each entitled to the same rights, and may act upon the same assumption. Each is, however, bound to know that prudence and care are in 60 L. R. A. turn required of him, and that, if he falls in this respect, any injury he may suffer is without redress." Davenport v. Ruckman, 37 N. Y. 568; Yeager v. Spirit Lake, 115 Iowa, 593, 88 N. W. 1095.

Although an injury to a blind man, caused by a defective railing to a bridge, would not have happened if he had been possessed of his sight, the town is nevertheless liable, in the absence of any contributory negligence by such person; and the question whether he was negligent is for the jury to determine from all the circumstances of the case. Sleeper v. Sandown, 52 N. H. 244.

A contrary view is taken in Garbanati v. Durango, 30 Colo. 358, 70 Pac. 686, where an aged man with defective eyesight, though using the greatest precaution to avoid injury, was denied recovery for injuries sustained from a fall from an elevated sidewalk, the railing to which had been broken down, upon the ground that his defective sight was the proximate cause of the injury. Such decision, however, is opposed to the great preponderance of authority, if, indeed, it does not stand alone. See other cases cited in this division.

Notwithstanding the repeal of a statute requiring the blowing of a whistle or ringing of a bell a quarter of a mile before reaching a crossing, it is the settled law of New York state that railroad companies, at crossings, must give some adequate notice or warning to travelers upon highways of the approach of their trains. Therefore, an old person of defective sight, in crossing a railroad track, is justified in assuming that a proper warning of the approach of a train will be given, and in relying upon it; and if he is injured by a train which he can not see, and does not hear because of the failure to give warning, the railroad company is liable, although a person of perfect sight might not be entitled to recover under the same circumstances. Lortz v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 7 App. Div. 515, 40 N. Y. Supp. 253.

If not himself negligent, a blind man may recover for injuries received from falling into an excavation in the sidewalk. Salem v. Goller, 76 Ind. 291.

Whether allowing a trap door in the sidewalk of a city street to remain open and unguarded is such negligence as renders the owner liable for injuries to a blind man falling therein, is a question for the jury. Smith v. Wildes, 143 Mass. 558, 10 N. E. 446.

The existence of a doorway to a warehouse opening on to the street is not such an invitation to enter as to render the owner liable for injuries to a person of defective sight, who enters the building by mistake, and falls into an open hatchway. The defendant's duty to protect the hatchway is neither increased nor diminished by the fact of plaintiff's blindness under such circumstances. Oysterbank v. Gardner, 17 Jones & S. 263.

But where a man sixty-three years of age, and wearing glasses, enters a dimly lighted shipping room of a mercantile company on invitation, and falls into an unguarded elevator shaft, which is in close proximity to the place where his business is to be transacted, the company cannot escape liability by showing that young persons, whose eyesight is good, could see and avoid the danger, since it is equally bound to afford protection to those who come to its place of business with eyes more or less dimmed by age or other causes. McCrum v. Well, 125 Mich. 297, 84 N. W. 282.

And a storekeeper who has knowledge that a customer has defective eyesight, but not that he is deaf, does not perform his full duty in directing him to go to the rear of the store for the goods he desires, by telling him in an ordinary tone of voice to look out for the trap door, since the customer would have no reason to believe the door is in the middle of the floor, where people are standing around. Brown v. Stevens (Mich.) 11 Det. L. N. 27, 99 N. W. 12.

What would be ordinary care on the part of railroad employees in the case of exposure to danger of a man possessed of all his faculties would not be such care as to one who is deaf, and, therefore, unable to hear the warnings given of an approaching train. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Garcia, 75 Tex. 583, 13 S. W. 223.

When such disability is known to the employees in charge of a railroad train, their duty becomes entirely different from that where they are unaware of the person's infirmity. "The presumption that he will leave the track, which excuses the company in other cases, does not exist, and they have no right to act upon it, but must use all proper precautions demanded by the situation; and, if they do not, they will be liable for the consequences, notwithstanding the original negligence of the deaf person in attempting to walk the track of the railroad. Any infirmity of one traveling upon the track, or lying upon it, known to those in charge of the particular train, requires such diligence on the part of the company as will best protect him from harm." International & G. N. R. Co. v. Smith, 62 Tex. 252.

Likewise, if there is anything disclosed in the conduct or appearance of a person on a railroad track which raises a suspicion that he is deaf, or blind, or helpless, then the obligation on the part of the trainmen to use all necessary and proper care to avoid injuring him by stopping the train, if necessary, immediately arises. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Murphy, 17 Ohio C. C. 223; Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Stroud, 64 Miss. 784, 2 So. 171; Omaha & R. Valley R. Co. v. Cook, 42 Neb. 577, 60 N. W. 899.

And where the motorman of a street car sees a boy approaching the track without heeding the signals given to warn him of his danger, and that he will probably go upon the track in front of the car, it is his duty to do everything in his power, consistent with the safety of those on the car, to avoid injuring him, although not aware that he is deaf. Galveston City R. Co. v. Hanna (Tex. Civ. App.) 79 S. W. 639.

"Where the appearances indicate that a person upon the track is in such condition as to be either insensible of his danger or unable to avoid it, those in charge of a train must use all available means, consistent with the safety of those on the train, to stop. The same rule is applied with reference to a young child, who is unable to understand the peril of being upon a railroad track." Campbell v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 55 Kan. 536, 40 Pac. 997.

But whether there was enough in the appearance of a deaf-mute walking on a railroad track to indicate his infirmity to the locomotive engineer of an approaching train, so as to impose upon him the duty of increased caution to avoid injuring him, is not subject to proof by opinions of witnesses who saw him walking. Tyler v. Sites, 90 Va. 539, 19 S. E. 174.

Since the questions of the ordinary care of one injured by being struck by a train at a railroad crossing, and that of the employees in charge of the train, are to be determined with reference to the peculiar facts and circumstances of each case, evidence of the deafness of the injured party is admissible on behalf of the plaintiff, although it is not proposed to show that such fact was known to defendant. But such fact, if unknown to the servants of the railroad company, will not increase their responsibility as to care. Cleveland, C. & C. R. Co. v. Terry, 8 Ohio St. 570.

A deaf or helpless person on a railroad track is entitled to such warnings as will reasonably alarm his fears, and cause him to leave the track. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Smith, 62 Tex. 254; McDonald v. International & G. N. R. Co. 86 Tex. 1, 40 Am. St. Rep. 803, 22 S. W. 939; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Harvin (Tex. Civ. App.) 54 S. W. 629; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Tinkham, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1784, 44 S. W. 439; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Triplett, 38 Ill. 482.

And a railroad company cannot excuse its omission to give the usual train signals on the ground that they would not have been heard by a deaf-mute walking on the track, if given. If unaware of the condition of a man in such situation, the employees of the railroad company must exercise the same degree of care required with reference to those capable of hearing and understanding the warning given; and, if they have knowledge of the man's condition, it is their duty to stop the train in time to avoid injuring him. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cooper (Ky.) 6 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 5; Poole v. North Carolina R. Co. 53 N. C. (8 Jones, L.) 340.

The fact that a person of defective hearing failed to hear the whistle of a train once sounded at the distance of 80 rods will not excuse the railroad company's disobedience of a statute requiring the whistle to be continuously sounded, or the bell rung, during the whole of that distance before reaching a crossing, upon the theory that the failure of the single blast to warn the injured party shows that he was either too deaf to have heard a continuous signal, or too reckless to have regarded it if heard. A deaf person is at least entitled to such warning of the approach of danger as the law designs to give those in full possession of their faculties, and to enjoy such chances as his infirmity has left him of hearing, and being saved by the warning. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Triplett, 38 Ill. 482.

A street railway company is liable for the killing of a deaf and dumb boy fourteen years of age, where the motorman, after discovering that the sounding of the gong failed to attract the boy's attention, was prevented from stopping the car in time to avoid the injury by reason of the brakes not being in good condition; and this is so, although the boy failed to look to see if a car was approaching, and, if his hearing had been good, might have had his attention attracted to the approach of the car by the sounding of the gong. Thompson v. Salt Lake Rapid Transit Co. 18 Utah, 281, 40 L. R. A. 172, 87 Am. St. Rep. 621, 52 Pac. 92.

Contrary to the current of authority, it is held in Cogswell v. Oregon & C. R. Co. 6 Or. 417, that, if a deaf man walking upon a railroad track fails to hear the warning signals, because of his deafness, and does not leave the track on that account, his deafness is the proxmate cause of his injuries, although the engineer had observed him for $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile.

And in Schexnaydre v. Texas & P. R. Co. 46 La. Ann. 248, 49 Am. St. Rep. 321, 14 So. 513, it is held that a railroad company is not liable for killing a deaf man walking upon the track, though the locomotive engineer discovered him $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile distant, but was not aware of his infirmity, and when within 100 yards blew the danger signal rapidly, "very vicious and quick for a number of times," and, upon coming within 30 or 40 feet of him, reversed the engine, and applied the air brakes, but it was then too late to avoid the accident.

Again, the knowledge of the conductor of a railroad train that a man, within the past five or ten minutes, has started to walk along the track to a neighboring town, and that he is partially deaf, has been held insufficient to charge the railroad company with gross negligence or wantonness in running over him, although the train could have been stopped within the space of from 125 to 150 feet, and no effort was made to avoid the injury beyond the blowing of the whistle. Kennedy v. Denver, S. P. & P. R. Co. 10 Colo. 493, 16 Pac. 210. (The weight of authority would seem to be on the side of the dissenting opinion of the chief justice in this case,—that there was sufficient evidence of wilful negligence to go to the jury.)

On the other hand, a railroad company has been held liable for injuries to a deaf man walking on the track, where he was not seen by the engineer, but a brakeman riding on the tender of the engine saw him, and hallooed to him, and attempted, but was unable to stop the engine because of defective brakes. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Harvin (Tex. Civ. App.) 54 S. W. 629.

But the measure of care due persons under such disabilities depends upon whether their disabilities are known (see divs. VI. and VIII. infra), and whether they are in a place in which they have a legal right to be (see div. VII. infra).

c. To persons in helpless situations.

1. Sleeping on railway track.

Going to sleep upon a railroad track is an act of such gross negligence that some feeling against one so culpable seems to have colored some of the decisions upon the question of liability for injury in such cases. These decisions refuse to apply the rule that a person's negligence is not an excuse for another person's subsequent act of negligence causing injury, and hold that a railroad company owes one in such situation no duty whatever, save to refrain from wilful or wanton injury.

The mere going to sleep on a railroad crossing is such great negligence and recklessness that no recovery can be had for the killing of such person through the negligence of employees in charge of a passing train, where it is provided by statute that plaintiff cannot recover if he could have avoided defendant's negligence by the exercise of ordinary care. Raden v. Georgia R. Co. 78 Ga. 47.

And in New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. Kelly, 35 C. C. A. 571, 93 Fed. 745, it is said that "a railroad company ought not to be held responsible for running over a trespasser, who, sober or drunk, has located himself between its tracks and gone to sleep, in the absence of wanton negligence in the management of the train on the part of the employees in charge." 69 L. R. A.

The engineer owes it to the passengers on the train, and to persons lawfully upon the track, to keep a lookout in order to prevent injury to them, but he owes no such duty to a trespasser. If, seeing him, and realizing that he will not probably remove himself from in front of the train in time to escape injury, the engineer then does what he reasonably can to avoid injuring him, he has done his full duty."

Sitting or lying down and going to sleep beside a railroad track, in such a position that a passing train must strike one, is an act of gross negligence, contributing to an injury subsequently inflicted by such train, and precludes the recovery of damages, unless the railroad company was guilty of some wanton or wilful act. Sibley v. Ratliffe, 50 Ark. 477, 8 S. W. 686; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Townsend. 69 Ark. 380, 63 S. W. 994; Krenzer v. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 151 Ind. 587, 68 Am. St. Rep. 252, 43 N. E. 649, 52 N. E. 220; Williams v. Southern P. R. Co. (Cal.) 11 Pac. 849. The attempt of the court to distinguish the case last cited from that of Meeks v. Southern P. R. Co. 56 Cal. 513, 38 Am. Rep. 67, is not very successful, and, in its opinion upon a rehearing (72 Cal. 120, 13 Pac. 219), the above position is somewhat qualified. The court says: "Taking the admitted negligence of the plaintiff as premise,—4. e. as a circumstance,—in view of which the defendant is to be judged, did the defendant even then fail in some duty which it owed the plaintiff? This will depend upon two propositions: Did the engineer, as a matter of fact, see the plaintiff, helpless or unjudging, in a dangerous position in time to have stopped the train; and having so seen him, did he use ordinary diligence to stop the train?" However, there being no evidence whatever that the engineer saw the plaintiff, except the fact that the train was stopped about the time of the injury, and it appearing that as soon as the engineer saw him he used every effort to stop the train as quickly as possible, the court adhered to its former judgment.

As to the distinction between subsequent negligence and wilfulness, see div. III., supra.

Upon the other hand, a few authorities impose upon a railroad company the duty of using ordinary care to discover a person in such situation upon its track, and then require it to use every means at its command to stop the train in time to avoid injury.

In North Carolina it is now settled that a railroad company is liable in damages for running over a person asleep on its track, if he was discovered, or by the exercise of ordinary care might have been discovered, in time to avoid injury. Deans v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 107 N. C. 686, 22 Am. St. Rep. 902, 12 S. E. 77; Pickett v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 117 N. C. 616, 30 L. R. A. 257, 53 Am. St. Rep. 611, 23 S. E. 264; Upton v. South Carolina & G. Extension R. Co. 128 N. C. 173, 38 S. E. 736; Carter v. Southern R. Co. 135 N. C. 498, 47 S. E. 614. But no liability is incurred for the negligent killing of a drunken man, lying insensible upon the track, under similar circumstances, unless he was discovered by those in charge of the train in time to avoid the injury. In such case, it is held, the self-imposed disability of drunkenness is such contributory negligence as precludes the recovery of damages. Smith v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. 114 N. C. 728, 25 L. R. A. 287, 19 S. E. 863, 923. It is not altogether clear whether this holding is not intended to be qualited in Pickett v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 117 N. C. 616, 30 L. R. A. 257, 53 Am. St. Rep. 611, 23 S. E. 264, by imposing upon railroad companies the duty of discovering persons in an unconscious condition upon their tracks, although their condition be self-imposed.

When a boy slave asleep upon a railroad track was seen by those in charge of a locomotive $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile distant, but was supposed to be the coat of a repair hand, yet, when his identity was discovered upon a nearer approach, no signal or alarm was given, nor any attempt made to check the speed of the train, the railroad company was held to an unconditional liability, although any effort to have stopped the train, after the object was discovered to be a boy, would have been ineffectual. East Tennessee & G. R. Co. v. St. John, 5 Sneed, 524, 73 Am. Dec. 149. To the same effect is Meeks v. Southern P. R. Co. 56 Cal. 513, 38 Am. Rep. 67, where a boy asleep on a railroad track could have been seen and recognized at a distance of from 300 to 350 yards, but he was not discovered, and no effort was made to stop the train until within 150 feet of the child, nor was any whistle blown, or bell rung.

As to whether any duty is imposed upon a railroad company to discover trespassers upon its tracks, see div. VII. subd. b, infra.

Between these two extremes is the generally accepted doctrine that a railroad company is liable for the result of mere negligence in such cases, but that the duty to exercise ordinary care to avoid injury arises only when the person's peril or disability is discovered. This liability is not affected by the fact that the subject of the injury is a child instead of an adult. The demand for the exercise of ordinary care to avoid injury is as imperative in the one case as in the other. A sleeping man is as helpless as a sleeping child, if he sleeps as soundly, and either one presents a condition of temporary helplessness calling for such care to avoid injury as the situation demands.

The fact that an intoxicated person lies down on a railroad track, and goes to sleep, does not justify a railroad company running a train over him, and taking his life. If he is seen in time by the company's employees, and they are aware of his danger, and by ordinary care can avoid injuring him, they are bound to do so. Rozwadowskie v. International & G. N. R. Co. 1 Tex. Civ. App. 487, 403, 20 S. W. 872; Carter v. Southern R. Co. 135 N. C. 498, 47 S. E. 614.

In Garza v. Texas Mexican R. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 41 S. W. 172, a boy lay down under a car standing on a side track and went to sleep. Subsequently the car was attached to an engine, and, when moved, caught the boy's sleeve, and dragged him with it. The boy began to scream, and was discovered by a brakeman, who gave the signal for the train to stop. Thereupon the engineer threw on the air brakes, and checked the train, but immediately withdrew the brakes, and started up again. The signal was repeated several times before it was sufficiently heeded by the engineer to remove the boy from his perilous situation, and not until his arm had been mangled. It appeared that the boy would not have been injured if the signal to stop the train had been at once heeded. It was held that if, after the boy was discovered, the train could have been stopped, and the injury averted, and the engineer negligently refused to obey the signal to stop the train, the railroad company was liable.

It is not only a want of reasonable care, but reckless negligence, for employees in charge of a railroad train, in sight of an indistinguishable object on the track, to ignore the signal of men running toward the train, on either side of the track, and waving their hats at every step, until after the discovery, at a distance of 60 yards, that the object in question is a man, when it is too late to avoid injury. Seaboard & R. R. Co. v. Joyner, 92 Va. 354, 23 S. E. 773.

Generally, it is not the duty of a locomotive engineer to slow up or stop his train before he becomes aware that an object upon the track is a human being. He has the right to assume, in the first instance, that, if it is a man, he will leave the track. But when he discovers that the trespasser is not aware of the approach of the train, it is his duty, in good faith, to do all he reasonably can to avert a disaster. Murch v. Western N. Y. & P. R. Co. 78 Hun, 601, 29 N. Y. Supp. 490.

A railroad company cannot be held liable for the running over and killing of one lying asleep upon its track, where it discovered such person as soon as it could do so with reasonable care, and used all proper diligence to stop the train. Gregory v. Southern P. R. Co. 2 Tex. Civ. App. 279, 21 S. W. 417; Smith v. International & G. N. R. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 78 S. W. 556; St. Louis S. W. R. Co. v. Shiflet, 94 Tex. 131, 58 S. W. 945; Williams v. Southern P. R. Co. 72 Cal. 120, 11 Pac. 849; Zumault v. Kansas City Suburban Belt R. Co. 175 Mo. 288, 74 S. W. 1015.

The failure to stop a railroad train in time to avoid injury to a sleeping child on the track is not negligence, where the engineer saw the child in time to stop, but thought it was a bundle or a dog, and did not discover that it was a child until too late to avoid injury. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. v. Williams, 69 Miss. 631, 12 So. 957; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Dunaway, 93 Va. 29, 24 S. E. 698; Meeks v. Southern P. R. Co. 52 Cal. 602. Upon a second appeal of the latter case, the railroad company was held liable upon evidence showing that at the place where the accident occurred, and for a considerable distance beyond, the road of the defendant was perfectly straight, and free from weeds or other like obstructions, that the day was very clear, and that at the time of the injury the child could have been seen and recognized as a boy on the track at a distance of from 300 to 350 yards. See 56 Cal. 513, 38 Am. Rep. 67.

And when the body of a man extending outward from the track between two projecting cross-ties, with his head resting on a cross-tie, close to the rail, was not seen by the fireman until the engine was at a distance of about 180 feet, and, notwithstanding immediate efforts to stop the train, the man was struck and injured, it was held that the railroad company was not liable. Goodwin v. Central R. & Bkg. Co. 96 Ala. 445, 11 So. 393.

The failure of a track walker to signal and stop an approaching train to prevent its running over a man found asleep upon the track is not negligence, where the track walker previously aroused and warned him of the coming of the train, and the person raised himself on his elbows, and signified his comprehension of the situation, and gave no indication of being disabled by intoxication or otherwise. Virginia Midland R. Co. v. Boswell, 82 Va. 932, 7 S. E. 388.

The preceding case is distinguished in Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Marrs, 27 Ky. L. Rep. 388, 85 S. W. 188, wherein it is held that it is the duty of railroad employees, upon finding a drunken man lying asleep between tracks in the company's yard, either to lead him to a place of safety, or else be on the lookout for him in the operation of their trains. And if they simply arouse him, and start him walking in the direction of the road, and he is subsequently overcome, and is injured while asleep on the company's tracks, the railroad company is liable.

No liability arises for injury to a man who went under a standing freight train, and fell asleep, in the absence of knowledge of his situation at the time the train was moved, although he was seen by the company's employees sitting under a car smoking, a half hour before the train started. Kendall v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 25 Ky. L. Rep. 793, 76 S. W. 376.

In Denman v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 26 Minn. 357, 4 N. W. 605, it is said that a railroad company owes a person asleep on its track no duty except that of exercising due diligence to avoid injuring him, after discovering his situation; and that, if he is not seen by those operating the train, no liability arises for running over him, although the track is level and straight where the man is lying, so that a man's hat can be seen for 400 or 500 yards distant.

And O'Keefe v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 32 Iowa, 467, holds that an instruction, requested by defendant, that a railroad company is not liable for running over a man sleeping on the track, unless it had knowledge that he was thus lying in time to prevent the accident, should have been given without the qualification "or could have known with the exercise of ordinary caution."

2. Foot caught in railway track.

Here, again, we find the same conflict of authority as to the duty owing persons thus helplessly situated, with the preponderance in favor of the rule that the duty of exercising care to avoid injury arises as soon as such person's danger is discovered.

It is for the jury to say whether it was negligence not to stop a railroad train upon seeing a child upon the track, where, upon being ordered off the track by the employees, when the train was 163 feet distant, the child started to get off, and caught its foot between the rail and the planking at a private crossing; whereupon everything possible was done to avoid injuring it. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Morgan, 82 Pa. 134.

Even where a person puts himself in a position of peril by inserting his foot in the space between two rails for an experiment, and it becomes fastened there, the railroad company must use reasonable care not to run over him. McKinney v. Long Island R. Co. 2 Silv. Sup. Ct. 543, 6 N. Y. Supp. 168. Affirmed in 119 N. Y. 631, 23 N. E. 1144.

Where a switch is moved by a brakeman so as to turn an engine onto a track where a boy has his foot caught between a rail and the guard rail, and the brakeman then attempts to extricate the foot before the approaching engine, but, failing in that, the engine runs over the foot and crushes it, the question of the railroad company's negligence should be left to the jury. Burnett v. Burlington & M. R. Co. 16 Neb. 332, 20 N. W. 280.

Whether the failure of a yardmaster to go to the relief of a little girl, whose foot had become fastened between a rail and a guard rail, when he knew she was in danger from approaching cars; and whether a switchman whose duty it was to see that the track was clear, ought to have seen the child before giving the signal to back cars, and given alarm in time to avoid injury, or should have rescued her by his own efforts, are questions for the jury. Townley v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 53 Wis. 626, 11 N. W. 55.

Because of the danger from an approaching train, a little girl went upon a railroad crossing to compel some children younger than herself to leave the track, and in so doing got her foot caught between the planking and the rail. At the distance of 854 feet the engineer of the train saw the child on the track, and that she was waving her hands in alarm, and not stepping aside. It was held that the engineer should have stopped the train at once upon discovering plaintiff, and that his failure to make an effort to do so until it was too late to avoid striking her raised a question of negligence for the jury. Spooner v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 115 N. Y. 22, 21 N. E. 696.

It being the duty of a railroad company to use reasonable care and diligence to prevent accidents to persons crossing its tracks, it may become liable for injury to a person whose foot is caught in the track at a crossing, although his disability is not discovered. If a boy's foot was caught between a main rail and a guard rail, because of their worn condition, while he was crossing the track before slowly moving detached cars, and was run over, when the accident might have been prevented if the brakeman on the moving cars had been on the lookout, or if signals to stop the cars had been obeyed, the railroad company is liable on the ground of the defective condition of the track, and also for its failure to stop the cars after the boy's situation became known. Goodrich v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 103 Iowa, 412, 72 N. W. 653; Hughes v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 122 Wis. 258, 99 N. W. 897; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Crockett, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1989, 79 S. W. 235.

But a railroad company does not owe the duty of keeping a lookout, to a boy trespasser on the track, although he has his foot caught in a frog or a cattle guard; and, if he is not discovered in time to stop the train before striking him, it is not liable for his death or injury from being run over by a train or backing engine. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Clark, 41 Ill. App. 343; Louisville & N. E. Co. v. Kellem, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 734, 21 S. W. 230; Sheehan v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 22 C. C. A. 221, 46 U. S. App. 498, 76 Fed. 201.

In Smalley v. Southern R. Co. 57 S. C. 243, 35 S. E. 489, it is held that the duty of exercising special care to avoid injury to a person found upon a railroad track, who from age or misfortune is apparently helpless, has no application to the case of a person whose foot is caught between the ties of a railroad trestle, but who to all appearances is simply squatting or sitting there, and is in the possession of all his faculties.

As in other cases affecting trespassers, it is held by a few authorities that the only duty arising under such circumstances is to avoid wilful injury.

The sole duty which a railroad company owes to a trespasser whose foot is caught in the track is not wantonly or with reckless carelessness to injure him after his situation is perceived. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Monday, 49 Ark. 257, 4 S. W. 782; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Phillips, 112 Ind. 59, 2 Am. St. Rep. 155, 13 N. E. 132.

See further, as to liability of a railroad company for injuries to persons in such situation, note on Care, required of railroad companies to prevent injuring small children upon the track, 25 L. R. A. 784.

3. Walking on railway trestle.

Where those in charge of a railroad train discover a person on a trestle, from which he cannot step off to a place of safety, it is their duty to stop the train, if possible. Pelrice v. Walters, 164 Ill. 560, 45 N. E. 1068, Affirming 63 Ill. App. 562; Cook v. Central R. & Bkg. Co. 67 Ala. 533.

And even if such person might save himself by a perilous jump of 11 feet to the ground, it is the duty of the engineer, upon discovering his peril, to resolve all doubt in favor of human life, and forthwith reverse his engine, and put on the brakes. Clark v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 109 N. C. 430, 14 L. R. A. 749, 14 S. E. 43.

Persons operating a railroad train are not permitted to speculate, in such case, whether a trespasser will jump from the trestle, or lie down, or in some other way get out of harm's way, a moment after it becomes evident that he is insensible of the impending danger, or incapable of providing for his safety. The moment that a person goes upon such a bridge his peril is manifest and imminent, and the railroad employees, having this knowledge, are required to exercise reasonable care to avoid a collision. Purcell v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 109 Iowa, 628, 77 Am. St. Rep. 557, 80 N. W. 682; Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Vaughan, 93 Ala. 209, 30 Am. St. Rep. 50, 9 So. 468.

In such case no presumption can arise that the person in peril will take care of himself, and it is the imperative duty of the engineer, upon discovering a person in such situation, to endeavor to stop his train immediately. But, although the trestle is between a blow post and a public crossing, the omission of the company to observe the statutory requirements as to signals and checking speed before persons on the trestle are discovered is not negligence. Atlanta & C. Air-Line R. Co. v. Gravitt, 93 Ga. 369, 26 L. R. A. 553, 44 Am. St. Rep. 145, 20 S. E. 550.

Even though the engineer of a train believes that a person will reach the end of the trestle in time to escape injury, he is deemed guilty of negligence if, having discovered the person's peril in time, he fails to stop the train or lessen its speed until too late to avoid a collision. Vanarsdall v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1666, 65 S. W. 858, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1432, 77 S. W. 1108.

A railroad company is guilty of negligence in running down a child upon a trestle 4 or 5 feet high, where it is seen by those operating the train when from 800 to 1,000 feet distant, and the train runs about 250 feet thereafter before any effort is made to check its speed, and even then an emergency stop is not made. St. Louis 69 L. R. A.

S. W. R. Co. v. Bolton (Tex. Civ. App.) 81 S. W. 123.

In Becker v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 110 Ky. 474, 53 L. R. A. 267, 96 Am. St. Rep. 459, 61 S. W. 997, which was an action for injuries to a boy of fourteen on a railroad trestle, while he was in the act of assisting a companion who had fallen through the cross-ties, it is said: "If it be conceded that the plaintiff was a trespasser, and that defendant owed him no duty except to protect him after discovering his peril, it is clear that, when discovered upon the bridge, the defendant should have given him ample time to have escaped. If he had simply been on the railroad track in the open country, it might be said that defendant had a right to presume that he would step off the track, and get out of the way of the train; but if a party, having started to cross a bridge of as much length as the one under consideration, had no means of escape except to reach the termination of the bridge, common humanity demands that, even if a trespasser, he should not be wantonly run over, but should have a reasonable chance to cross the bridge in safety."

But, if a trespasser on a trestle is not seen until it is too late to stop the train before striking him, the railroad company is not liable for his injuries. Tennenbrock v. Southern Pacific Coast R. Co. 59 Cal. 269; Anderson v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 87 Wis. 195, 23 L. R. A. 203, 58 N. W. 79; Shaw v. Missouri P. R. Co. 104 Mo. 656, 16 S. W. 832; Camden, G. & W. R. Co. v. Young, 60 N. J. L. 193, 37 Atl. 1013; Atlanta & C. Air-Line R. Co. v. Gravitt, 93 Ga. 369, 26 L. R. A. 553, 44 Am. St. Rep. 145, 20 S. E. 550.

If, however, the trestle has been in constant use as a walk way for years, with the knowledge of the railroad company and its employees, so that persons may reasonably be expected to be present there, it is the duty of the company to use reasonable care to discover a person walking thereon, whether he is a licensee or a trespasser. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Rodgers, 100 Va. 324, 41 S. E. 732; Cassida v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 14 Or. 551, 13 Pac. 483.

Where an engineer, after seeing a man on a trestle, checked his train, and could have avoided a collision, but relieved the brakes, and made no further effort to stop, upon the man taking a position on a cap-sill, where others had escaped unhurt while a train was passing, the railroad was held not liable for an injury inflicted by reason of the man not holding his head back far enough to escape the train. Little v. Carolina C. R. Co. 118 N. C. 1072, 24 S. E. 514.

Opposed to the rule of the foregoing authorities that the situation of a person upon a railroad trestle constitutes in itself a condition of helplessness, demanding affirmative action by the servants of the railroad to avoid injury, there are a few cases holding that such duty does not arise until it becomes apparent that the person on the trestle will not get out of harm's way. Smalley v. Southern R. Co. 57 S. C. 243, 35 S. E. 489.

And in Southern R. Co. v. Bush, 122 Ala. 470, 26 So. 168, where the injured party saw the approaching train when at the further end of the trestle, and in time to get off to a place of safety, but, instead, started to run across in front of the train, it is held that it was the duty of the engineer to begin to stop the engine only from the moment that the trestle passer's conduct made it reasonably manifest that he did not intend to get out of the way, or could not reasonably extricate himself from his peril.

In North Carolina, where the law imposes upon railroad companies the duty of maintaining a lookout for trespassers, a railroad company is liable for running down and injuring a person negligently walking on its trestle, and who is unable to save himself, if those in charge of the train discovered, or by the exercise of ordinary care might have discovered, the peril of the injured person, and might, by the exercise of such care, have avoided the accident. Bogan v. Carolina C. R. Co. 129 N. C. 154, 55 L. R. A. 418, 39 S. E. 808.

And in West Virginia, where the same duty is imposed in relation to trespassers, the failure to discover two children sitting astride the guard rail on a trestle is culpable negligence, where the evidence tends to show they had been there for some time before being struck by the train, on a bright June morning, and the engineer had a clear view of the trestle for $\frac{1}{2}$ mile. Gunn v. Ohio River R. Co. 42 W. Va. 676, 36 L. R. A. 575, 26 S. E. 546.

On the other hand, in Indiana, where no liability is recognized for an injury to a trespasser, unless it is wilfully inflicted, a railroad company was not liable for running down a person on a trestle, where the trespasser saw the train at a distance of 2,000 feet, and having started to retrace his steps to the end of the trestle 100 feet distant the engineer believed he would escape until it was too late to stop the train. Ullrich v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 151 Ind. 358, 51 N. E. 95. This harsh rule seems to obtain, likewise, in Kansas. Mason v. Missouri P. R. Co. 27 Kan. 83, 41 Am. Rep. 405.

4. Falling on railway track.

If a person on horseback is thrown from his horse upon a railroad track, in front of an approaching train, and is lying there in a stunned or insensible condition, it becomes the duty of those in charge of the train to use every means within their power to stop the train; and, if they fail to do so, and the jury are satisfied that such exertions, promptly employed, would have averted the injury, the railroad company is liable. Tanner v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 60 Ala. 621.

Where a woman fell twice upon a railroad track, in attempting to cross before an approaching train, and the employees in charge of the train saw her from the beginning to the end of the tragedy, and the evidence as to the distance of the train from her when she first stepped upon the track ranges from 6 to 500 feet, and that of the speed of the train from 6 to 20 miles an hour, the question whether the railroad company, in running over the woman, was guilty of negligence subsequent to her contributory negligence, is a question for the jury. Sullivan v. Missouri P. R. Co. 117 Mo. 214, 23 S. W. 149.

In McKeon v. Steinway R. Co. 20 App. Div. 401, 47 N. Y. Supp. 374, the plaintiff, by a collision occurring through his negligence, was thrown from his wagon onto the track of the defendant, and, while lying there in an unconscious condition, was struck by one of defendant's cars. The trial court charged the jury to the effect that, if any negligence of the plaintiff contributed to the collision which caused him to be thrown upon the track, what followed was in like manner affected by that negligence, and he could not recover. Upon appeal, such instruction was held to be erroneous, the court saying: "It may, in view of the finding of the jury, be assumed that the negligence of the plaintiff placed him in the position where he is said to have been struck by the other car, and that, therefore, the injury there received by him was in some sense the consequence of his negligence. But it does not follow that this gave legal immunity to the defendant to run its car onto him. The negligence of a plaintiff which is effectual to relieve a defendant from liability for the consequences of his negligence must be proximate in such sense as to contribute concurrently to the result complained of. Although the injury may not have occurred but for the negligence of the former, his antecedent negligence may not be concurrent or simultaneous in such sense as to relieve the latter from the consequences of his negligence. In other words, when a plaintiff, by his negligence, has placed himself in a dangerous position, the defendant, advised of his situation, is not for that reason legally justified in failing to use reasonable care to not injure him."

Likewise, where a woman while crossing the street was knocked down by a cab, and thrown upon the street car track, and while in that situation she was run over by one of the defendant's cars, the jury was instructed that her presence upon the track under the circumstances gave the car driver no legal license to run over her, but that he was bound to exercise reasonable care to avoid doing her any further injury. Mooney v. Third Ave. R. Co. 2 N. Y. City Ct. Rep. 366.

If a boy is lying in a helpless condition upon a street car track, where the motorman of an approaching car, by the exercise of ordinary care, can discover him in time to avoid injuring him, but, instead, wantonly, recklessly, and negligently runs the car over him, the railroad company is liable, regardless of how the boy came to be on the track. Chicago City R. Co. v. O'Donnell, 207 Ill. 478, 69 N. E. 882.

A street railway company is chargeable with negligence in running over a child who has fallen upon its track, at such distance as to allow ample time for the stoppage of an approaching car before reaching him, but who is not discovered by the driver by reason of his being engaged in conversation with passengers, with his back toward the horses. Ordinary care is not sufficient under such circumstances. If a human being is seen by an engineer or by a driver lying upon a railroad track, it is his duty to exercise the very highest care, and to make the greatest effort to avoid his destruction. Mentz v. Second Ave. R. Co. 3 Abb. App. Dec. 274, Affirming 2 Robt. 356.

A contrary rule seems to be laid down, without apparent reason, in McDonald v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 93 App. Div. 238, 87 N. Y. Supp. 689, where it is held that the falling of a boy upon a street car track 40 or 50 feet in advance of a car does not present a situation calling for the exercise of ordinary care to avoid injury, although the car might have been stopped within 10 feet. The attempt to show that the facts of this case present but a single situation not admitting of a subsequent act of negligence, which distinguishes it from Weltzman v. Nassau Electric R. Co. 33 App. Div. 585, 53 N. Y. Supp. 905, and makes the rule of the latter case inapplicable, is difficult of appreciation. If, after the boy fell upon the track, he was seen by the car driver at a distance of 40 or 50 feet, and the car could have been stopped within 10 feet, it would seem that the omission to stop the car was a failure of duty for which the railway company would be liable under the doctrine of the cases above cited.

And where a boy, in crossing the street before an approaching car, stumbled and fell upon the track at such distance in front of the car as that, if traveling at the usual rate of speed, it would have reached him in about two seconds, and that was all the time the driver had to discover his peril, apply the brakes, and arrest the motion of the car before reaching him, and there was no evidence that by the exercise of vigilance the driver could have arrested the car in time to have avoided injuring him, the failure to stop the car before injury was held not to be negligence. Fenton v. Second Ave. R. Co. 126 N. Y. 625, 26 N. E. 967, Reversing 56 Hun, 99, 9 N. Y. Supp. 162.

No recovery can be had for an injury to a child from being struck by an electric street car where the child fell upon the track in an attempt to cross the street in front of the car, and the motorman had the car so well under control that he stopped it in the "briefest instant of time" after the child fell, and he had reason to believe, until she fell, the child would cross the track safely. Stabenau v. Atlantic Ave. R. Co. 155 N. Y. 511, 63 Am. St. Rep. 698, 50 N. E. 277.

In Griswold v. Boston & M. R. Co. 183 Mass. 434, 67 N. E. 354, where plaintiff was run over by an engine after falling upon a railroad track, and was unable to move, it does not appear whether those in charge of the engine discovered plaintiff's situation in time to have stopped before injuring her; but the court held that, being a trespasser, the defendant owed her no duty save that of refraining from willfully or wantonly running her down.

And no obligation rests upon a railroad company to stop its train to care for a trespasser who has fallen from another train to the space between tracks, where he is in such a position that he can be passed in safety, and injury only results by the trespasser making an imprudent movement, whereby a part of his body is thrust into danger, after a part of the train has passed. However, it is said by the court: "Had the deceased been lying on the track, where he must have been struck if he had not moved, the case would have been different." McKenna v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 9 Daly, 262.

The duty of a railroad company to avoid injuring a person thrown upon its track, outside the limits of the highway, arises only when the perilous position of such person is seen or known. Western Maryland R. Co. v. Kehoe, 83 Md. 434, 35 Atl. 90.

5. Driving frightened horse.

First. General rule as to duty under such circumstances.

The improved means of locomotion for the propulsion of vehicles using the public highway has materially increased the danger from accident to those using the highway for vehicles drawn by animal power. To this new sit uation the courts have applied the common-law principle, that one must so use his own as not to injure another (Hudson v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 14 Bush, 303), and, while recognizing the right of the horseless vehicles to the use of the highway, have imposed upon their owners the duty of using ordinary care to avoid injury to those who are seen to be in peril from the operation of such vehicles. A horse seriously frightened is difficult to control, and is liable to become unmanageable; and, to the extent that he cannot be controlled, his driver is in a helpless situation, and a proper subject for that special care in avoidance of injury which the law requires as to other helpless persons.

Street railroads being granted very great privileges out of the public right, their treatment of the public must be reasonable in return; so that if a person or a team, "through accident or misjudgment, or for any cause, be caught in a position of any peril by coming in collision or close contact with the cars, it is the duty of those who are managing the cars to use all possible effort, by slackening the speed of a car or stopping it altogether, in order to avoid injury. If a horse driven by a traveler appears to be restive or refractory at the sight of a moving car the movement of the car should be managed in such a way as to relieve, if possible, the traveler in his dilemma." Flewelling v. Lewiston & A. Horse R. Co. 89 Me. 585, 36 Atl. 1056.

A motorman is supposed to know that his car is likely to frighten horses that are unaccustomed to the sight of such vehicles. Therefore, "it is his duty, if he sees a horse in the street before him that is greatly frightened at the car, so as to endanger his driver or other persons in the street, to do what he reasonably can in the management of his car to diminish the fright of the horse; and it is also his duty in running the car to look out and see whether, by frightening horses or otherwise, he is putting in peril other persons lawfully using the street on foot or with teams. In this way the convenience and safety of everybody can be promoted without serious detriment to anybody." Ellis v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 160 Mass. 341, 35 N. E. 1127; Thompson v. Holyoke Street R. Co. 170 Mass. 365, 49 N. E. 748; Sunderland v. Pioneer Fire Proof Constr. Co. 78 Ill. App. 102; Ft. Scott Rapid-Transit R. Co. v. Page, 10 Kan. App. 362, 59 Pac. 690; Owensboro City R. Co. v. Lyddane, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 698, 41 S. W. 578; Lincoln Rapid Transit Co. v. Nichols, 37 Neb. 332, 20 L. R. A. 853, 55 N. W. 872; McClellan v. Ft. Wayne & B. I. R. Co. 105 Mich. 101, 62 N. W. 1025; Meyers v. Brantford Street R. Co. 81 Ont. Rep. 309.

If persons in charge of a street car discover a man with a runaway horse on the track, and that he may be saved from injury by stopping the car, it is their duty to stop. Thiel v. South Covington & C. Street R. Co. 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1590, 78 S. W. 206.

A street railway company is liable for injuries resulting from one of its cars negligently striking a frightened horse and its rider, although the horse was not seen by the motorman, by reason of his attention being attracted to a bicycle that was keeping pace with his car. Omaha Street R. Co. v. Duvall, 40 Neb. 29, 58 N. W. 531.

"The sum of the adjudicated cases bearing upon the relative rights and duties of street cars and citizens traveling in vehicles drawn by horses or other animals is, that both have a right to use the street, but that neither has an exclusive right. The operator of a street car is not necessarily obliged to stop the car every time a horse shies or scares at the approaching car; but, when the operator of the car sees that a horse is frightened at the car, it is his duty to manage his car in such manner as a man of ordinary prudence would do under the same circumstances; and it is always a question of fact for the jury whether such care in the running of the car has been observed. This duty may, or may not, lead to the necessity for bringing a car to a full stop. The duty of the company in this regard is just the same as the duty of one individual or citizen to another when they meet on the highway, and the horse of the one becomes frightened at the vehicle of the other, or at anything upon the vehicle of another." Oates v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 188 Mo. 535, 58 L. R. A. 447, 68 S. W. 906.

This statement of the law is cited with approval in Schafstette v. St. Louis & M. River R. Co. 175 Mo. 142, 74 S. W. 826.

Where an electric car ran into a frightened horse, it was held that, "so long as the right of a common user of the tracks exists in the public, it is the duty of passenger railway companies to exercise such watchful care as will prevent accidents or injuries to persons who, without negligence on their own part, may not at the moment be able to get out of the way of a passing car. The degree of care to be exercised must necessarily vary with the circumstances, and therefore no unbending rule can be laid down." Gibbons v. Wilkes-Barre & Suburban Street R. Co. 155 Pa. 279, 26 Atl. 417.

A motorman running a car at the speed of 8 or 10 miles an hour is negligent in not slackening the speed of his car, where, by the exercise of reasonable care, he might have seen, by the aid of electric lights, a colt, attached to a vehicle, shying at the approach of his car when a block distant, and that, when the car approached within 25 feet, the colt turned suddenly, and attempted to cross the track in front of the car. Marion Street R. Co. v. Carr, 10 Ind. App. 200, 37 N. E. 952.

If, by checking the speed of his car upon first perceiving the fright of a horse, a motorman would have been able to stop his car after the horse jumped across the track, his failure to take such precaution, in view of the peril of those in the vehicle to which the horse was attached, is negligence. Citizens' Street R. Co. v. Lowe, 12 Ind. App. 47, 39 N. E. 165.

If a motorman in charge of a street car sees a horse frightened by its approach, and backing the wagon to which it is attached onto the track in front of the car, and that there is danger of a collision; and the car can be stopped in time to prevent a collision, the failure to stop is negligence. Richter v. Cicero & P. Street R. Co. 70 Ill. App. 196; Lexington R. Co. v. Fain, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 2243, 80 S. W. 463.

If the motorman of a street car sees that a horse being led in the highway has become unmanageable, and that its fright is due to the approach of his car, it is his duty to put his car under such control as to be able to stop it, and to take all necessary precautions to that end; and the failure to do so is negligence. 69 L. R. A.

Cameron v. Jersey City, H. & P. Street R. Co. 70 N. J. L. 633, 57 Atl. 417.

And the same duty is imposed upon those operating steam railroads where their operation is likely to result in injury to drivers of frightened animals.

If a locomotive engineer sees a man with a wagon and team between tracks at a railway crossing, and that the team is scared and unmanageable, and by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence he can stop the train in time to avoid a collision, his failure to do so is negligence, for which the railroad company is liable, even though he resorts to means which seem to him best to avoid the accident. Pence v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 79 Iowa, 389, 44 N. W. 686.

Evidence that an engineer opened the steam cocks of his engine, and began to move the same, while plaintiff was trying to calm his frightened horse at a highway crossing, and thereby caused the horse to take greater fright, and to spring down an embankment, whereby plaintiff was injured, will support a verdict for plaintiff. Inabnett v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 69 Ark. 130, 61 S. W. 570; Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Harmon, 47 Ill. 298, 95 Am. Dec. 489.

A railroad company has no right to continue blowing a locomotive whistle in a city, town or village, for the purpose of giving a signal of its approach to the station, after the engineer discovers that a blast of the whistle already given has frightened a horse drawing a vehicle along the public road, and that the horse will probably be more frightened by continuing to blow till the signal is completed; the driver seated in the vehicle being engaged in an effort to control the animal. Akridge v. Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. 90 Ga. 232, 16 S. E. 81; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Spence (Tex. Civ. App.) 32 S. W. 329; Manchester South Junction & A. R. Co. v. Fullarton, 14 C. B. N. S. 54.

Even though there is reason for the blowing of the whistle of an engine, still, if the engineer sees that a horse in the highway will be frightened, and its driver probably injured; and he can desist from blowing it consistently with his duties, and without damage to the railroad company, it is his duty to refrain from blowing it for a reasonable time. St. Louis S. W. R. Co. v. Kilman (Tex. Civ. App.) 86 S. W. 1050.

Second. Basis of duty in such cases.

It is not the danger of collision which is the basis of the duty in such cases, but the equality of right as between persons using the highway, and the obligation of each to use the same with a reasonable regard for the safety and convenience of others. This "reasonable regard" involves the exercise of ordinary care to prevent one's conduct or property becoming an instrument of injury to others lawfully using the highway; and, when such other persons have been rendered helpless, in a measure, through the fright of their animals, ordinary care as to them means such especial care as may reasonably be expected of one under the circumstances of the particular situation to prevent the threatened injury. Ellis v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 160 Mass. 341, 35 N. E. 1127; Oates v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 188 Mo. 535, 58 L. R. A. 447, 68 S. W. 906.

Third. Manifestation of peril necessary to creation of duty.

Generally the mere fright of horses is insufficient to impose upon those causing the same the duty of this especial care. If the driver is a person apparently able to control his horse, notwithstanding its fright, the duty of increased care can hardly be said to arise. On the other hand, if the driver is a woman or young person, or if it is apparent that the horse, whoever the driver, has become unmanageable, then a situation is presented which demands the exercise of ordinary care, according to the necessities of the situation, to diminish the fright of the horse, and prevent any resulting damage. As a general rule, therefore, the fright of the horse must be accompanied by some manifestation of peril in order to create the duty. Oates v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 168 Mo. 535, 58 L. R. A. 447, 68 S. W. 906; East St. Louis & St. L. Electric Street R. Co. v. Wachtel, 63 Ill. App. 181; Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Juday, 19 Ind. App. 436, 49 N. E. 843.

In Hammond, W. & E. C. Electric R. Co. v. Eads, 32 Ind. App. 249, 69 N. E. 555, it is held that a motorman is not required to stop his car immediately upon seeing a horse or team by the side of the track manifesting fright, unless the situation is such as would lead a reasonable man to believe that damage to persons or property cannot otherwise be avoided. But it is held to be culpable negligence not to stop a car, where the motorman sees a horse that has become unmanageable dragging its driver, and running near the track, and swerving from side to side.

Eastwood v. La Crosse City R. Co. 94 Wis. 163, 68 N. W. 651, holds that an inference of negligence is not justified from the facts that a motorman saw, or might have seen, at a distance of 175 feet, upon a well-traveled road, a gentle team, driven by a full-grown man, beginning to prance, but failed to put on the brakes and throw off the current until somewhere from 40 to 100 feet from the point where the team backed suddenly, and threw the corner of the sleigh to which it was attached against the car.

And in Cornell v. Detroit Electric R. Co. 82 Mich. 495, 46 N. W. 791, it is said that a street railway company fulfils its duty by commencing to run its car more slowly upon observing the fright of a colt with a man at his head, from 350 to 400 feet distant. The injury in this case occurred after the colt had been led into an adjacent field, when the car was yet 150 to 200 feet distant.

The sounding of a railroad whistle when within a few steps of a horse that has become frightened will not of itself give a right of action; but it must be shown that the circumstances attending its use are such that a prudent regard for the rights of others forbids it. Hudson v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 14 Bush, 303.

Whether the circumstances were such as to apprise a locomotive engineer, or to charge him with notice, of the peril attending the continued blowing of his whistle, where a horse had been frightened thereby, is a question for the jury. Akridge v. Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. 90 Ga. 232, 16 S. E. 81.

Fourth. Causing fright, without subsequent negligence, will not create liability.

Since owners of vehicles run by motive power have the same right to use the highway as those using animal power, they are not responsible for injuries resulting from the fright of horses at the sight of such vehicles, unless they fail to use reasonable care to avoid injury, after they discover, or are negligent in not discovering, a situation demanding especial care on their part to prevent injury resulting from this exercise of their otherwise lawful right. Kankakee Electric R. Co. v. Lade, 56 Ill. App. 454; Galesburg Electric Motor & P. Co. v. Manville, 61 Ill. App. 490.

A motorman is not negligent, if, upon discovering the fright of a horse crossing the track, he turns off the motive power, applies the brake, and makes every proper effort to prevent a collision, and avoid further frightening the horse. O'Brien v. Blue Hill Street R. Co. 186 Mass. 446, 71 N. E. 951.

If a car approaches a frightened team on a bridge slowly until within 60 feet of the team, and then stops, the railway company cannot be held liable for injuries sustained by the driver of the team from the horses shying after they reach the car. Kankakee Electric R. Co. v. Lade, 56 Ill. App. 454.

A railway company is not liable for causing death, through the collision of one of its cars with a runaway horse, where the motorman at first sight of the horse threw off the current and checked the speed of the car, and had run only from 30 to 50 feet when the horse turned suddenly across the path of the car, and the vehicle to which it was attached was struck before the car could be stopped. Bishop v. Belle City Street R. Co. 92 Wis. 139, 65 N. W. 733.

Evidence that a horse shied when from 20 to 30 feet from an electric street car running at its usual speed, and that after the car had passed the horse made a sharp turn and upset the vehicle to which it was attached, thereby injuring its driver, does not show negligence on the part of the railway company. Yingst v. Lebanon & A. Street R. Co. 167 Pa. 438, 31 Atl. 687.

Where a street car company is doing the thing it has a right to do, no presumption of negligence arises from the fact of injury from the fright of a horse; and a claim that the company is negligent in not exercising its right in such a way as to minimize an impending danger which is apparent to the motorman must be supported by proof. Atlanta R. & Power Co. v. Johnson, 120 Ga. 908, 48 S. E. 389.

Fifth. Duty where fright caused by sounding gong.

A street railway company, in operating its cars along the street, has the right, when occasion requires, as a measure of precaution, to avert danger to its passengers and the traveling public, to ring a bell or sound a gong, and is required to sound it when approaching a public crossing. But this duty or privilege does not warrant the bell or gong being sounded when it appears that it is dangerous to those traveling along the street to do so. When the circumstances are such as reasonably to lead to the belief that to continue to do so will likely cause a horse or team to become unmanageable or run away, and thereby cause injury to the person or property of someone, it is the duty of the company to cease ringing the bell or sounding the gong. Citizens' R. Co. v. Hair (Tex. Civ. App.) 82 S. W. 1050; Galesburg Electric Motor & P. Co. v. Manville, 61 Ill. App. 490.

A contrary view seems to be taken in Steiner v. Philadelphia Traction Co. 134 Pa. 199, 19 Atl. 491, where it is held that a motorman who brings his car to a stop alongside a restive horse may continue to sound his gong, although it is needlessly done. The opinion is very unsatisfactory in its reasoning, and seems to assume that the duty of sounding the gong as a signal on proper occasions to give warning and avoid collisions justifies its use where it will be attended with the very result in avoidance of which the duty is imposed, vis., the infliction of injury.

The holding of the last-cited case is repudiated by the Federal circuit court for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, in Lightcap v. Philadelphia Traction Co. 60 Fed. 212, where the gripman of a cable car, seeing a horse near the track and very much frightened by the approach of the car, so sounded his gong as to cause the horse to jump upon the track, when a collision occurred, and the driver was injured. It was held that the gong might be so rung, and under such circumstances, as to amount to negligence, and whether it was so rung should be left to the jury. In commenting upon the Pennsylvania case, Dallas, J., says: While the proper use of a gong by a street railway company is "rightful, it is no less true that it may be so used as to endanger the safety of those who, equally with the operators of street railways, are entitled, without encountering unnecessary peril to person or property, to the enjoyment of the public highways; and it is not, in my opinion, too much to insist that a device which may both avert and occasion casualties shall be used with that degree of care which, under the circumstances, a man of ordinary prudence would exercise as well to avoid causing accidents as for their prevention. I agree that the law not only permits, but requires, the proper use of the gong; but this does not sanction its wanton and needless use, nor relieve from liability for any harm resulting from unnecessarily, recklessly, and violently ringing it, where, by due prudence, such harm might be properly avoided. And I cannot yield my assent to the proposition that because it is, in general, the duty of the gripman to ring his gong with sufficient emphasis upon proper occasions, therefore he may ring it violently in the face of a frightened horse, and without any necessity whatever." This decision was affirmed on appeal in 10 C. C. A. 46, 17 U. S. App. 605, 61 Fed. 762.

"The true rule is, while the bell must ordinarily be sounded to give notice of the approach of the car, still, if the operator of the car sees that a horse is already frightened by the approach of the car, and that the citizen is in danger, it is his duty to cease sounding the bell, and to even stop, if necessary; and if, instead of doing so, he continues to sound the gong or ring the bell, and further frighten the horse, and cause him to run away, the company is liable for injuries inflicted in consequence thereof." Oates v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 168 Mo. 535, 58 L. R. A. 447, 68 S. W. 906, 60 L. R. A.

Sixth. Care required is question for jury.

What ordinary care requires to avoid accident, after discovering the fright of a horse, is ordinarily a question for the jury to determine under all the circumstances of the case. Kankakee Electric R. Co. v. Lade, 56 Ill. App. 454; East St. Louis & St. L. Electric Street R. Co. v. Wachtel, 63 Ill. App. 181; Oates v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 168 Mo. 535, 58 L. R. A. 447, 68 S. W. 906; Kelly v. Pittsburg & B. Traction Co. 10 Pa. Super. Ct. 644.

The question of a street railway company's negligence was properly left to the jury, where a horse driven by a woman became frightened at an approaching car as she was about to cross the track, and after she had turned to avoid a collision, and the horse was running parallel to the track, the company's car followed sounding its gong, and when alongside the plaintiff the gong was again sounded, causing the horse to spring to the side of the street, and throw plaintiff to the ground. Benjamin v. Holyoke Street R. Co. 160 Mass. 3, 39 Am. St. Rep. 446, 35 N. E. 95.

It is erroneous to instruct a jury, in an action for injuries caused by the negligent operation of defendant's cars after plaintiff's team had become unmanageable, "that defendant's motorman had the right, and it was his duty, if he saw a team ahead of him on the approach, although not on the railway track, but right alongside of it, to keep his car moving, whatever sound might attend its operation, and to sound the gong and give notice to the person in charge of such team that the car was approaching; and that such action on the part of the motorman is not and cannot by the jury be taken to be negligence, or want of ordinary care; and that a motorman, under such circumstances, had the right to assume that the sounding of the gong would not frighten a team ahead of him; and, even if the movement of the car or the sounding of the gong did frighten a team, and the motorman saw it, but the team was not evidently, and while the motorman could see it as his car moved along, so frightened as to be beyond the control of the driver, the motorman had still a right to proceed on his way with his car, and his doing so would not be negligence, nor could it be attributed to the want of ordinary care." Such instruction, it is said, not only invades the province of the jury, but it is not the law. Wachtel v. East St. Louis & St. L. Electric R. Co. 77 Ill. App. 465.

Seventh. Refraining from wilful or wanton injury not measure of duty.

There are a few cases holding that a street railway company is liable only for wilful or wanton injury to drivers of frightened horses; but it is not clear whether the opinions are based upon a misapprehension of the duty owing persons under such disability upon the public highway, or exhibit merely a want of discrimination in the use of terms.

For instance, in Chapman v. Zanesville Street R. Co. 27 Ohio L. J. 70 (a decision at nisi prius), it is said that one in charge of an electric car is not "bound to stop his car simply because a horse that is being driven on the same street has become frightened at the appearance and noise of the car. On the contrary, he may proceed at the usual speed, and with the usual noise. In doing this he would not be negligent, and would not invade any right of the driver of the horse. But if the circumstances were such that failure to stop the car would show a wanton and wilful disregard for the safety of the driver of the horse, so that the continued movement of the car could be attributed only to wantonness or malice, and not to discharge of duty under his employment, he would then be negligent, and for such negligence there would be a liability of the company." All the cases cited in support of the opinion are actions for causing fright, which, of course, is a different question from that of the duty imposed by the situation created by such fright.

The case of Terre Haute Electric R. Co. v. Yant, 21 Ind. App. 486, 69 Am. St. Rep. 376, 51 N. E. 732, also holds that a street railway company is not required to stop its car upon seeing a horse frightened at its approach, and unmanageable, unless the motorman has reason to apprehend the accident that occurs, or, upon seeing the persons in the vehicle in imminent peril, acts in a manner attributable only to wanton disregard for their safety. The language of this decision seems to lay down the rule that no liability arises under such circumstances, unless the injury was wilfully or wantonly inflicted. If it is to be so construed, it is out of accord with other decisions of that state, and is without authority to support it. In Muncie Street R. Co. v. Maynard, 5 Ind. App. 372, 32 N. E. 343, a case of injury to property, the railway company was held liable upon the ground of mere negligence, the court saying: "We think the evidence shows that the engineer could have seen the helpless condition of appellee in time to have stopped his train and have avoided the injury. It was his duty to be constantly on the alert, and, if he discovered appellee's property so situated that injury must follow unless he stop his engine, it was his duty to make all reasonable effort to do so." And at the close of its opinion the court declares the railway company liable, because, though its servants did not see, they "could have seen," the plaintiff's danger in ample time to avoid the injury. Again, in Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Juday, 19 Ind. App. 436, 49 N. E. 843, the same court upheld the sufficiency of a complaint alleging defendants negligent failure to stop a hand car, at which plaintiff's horse had taken fright, upon the ground that after the first sudden fright, with a knowledge of the cause thereof, the servants continued the speed of the car, after observing the apparent danger to appellee, and without attempting to stop. These facts, as averred in the complaint, were acts of negligence. And the court declares it to be "sound doctrine, strongly intrenched by the authorities, that when one person sees another in danger or peril, from which he is unable to extricate himself with reasonable care and prudence, it is the highest duty of such person so to act as not to increase the peril, and, if he does act in a manner to increase the danger with a full knowledge of the facts, it is negligence, for which he may be required to respond in damages."

Finally, in the recent case of Nichols v. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. (Ind. App.) 70 N. E. 183, the same judge who wrote the opinion in Terre Haute Electric R. Co. v. Yant, 21 Ind. App. 486, 69 Am. St. Rep. 376, 51 N. E. 732, approves an instruction that if, on 69 L. R. A.

the approach of a railroad train to a highway crossing, the engineer in charge of the engine observes a team near the crossing, evidently frightened, and becoming unmanageable, it is the duty of the engineer to refrain from giving signals or doing any act that tends to increase the fright of the team; and if, by reasonable exertion, he can avoid the accident by stopping the train, it is his duty to do so.

The theory that street railway companies are not liable for mere negligence, where horses are frightened by the operation of their cars, is expressly repudiated in Oates v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 168 Mo. 535, 58 L. R. A. 447, 68 S. W. 906, the court saying: "Because a street car carries more people than any other kind of a conveyance, or because it is authorized to run more rapidly than a vehicle can ordinarily be legally driven, or because the rush and restlessness of the age make unreasonable demands for more and more rapid transit along the crowded thoroughfares of populous cities, it does not follow that a street car can be run in disregard of the rights of persons traveling by other means; nor that a street car company is exempt from the common-law duty of everyone to exercise ordinary care; nor that it is only liable where the agents act wantonly, maliciously, and heedlessly."

6. Instances of other helpless situations.

If a person is driving a cart at an unusually rapid pace, and drives over another, and kills him, he is guilty of manslaughter, though he calls to the deceased to get out of the way, and he might do so, if he were not drunk. Rex v. Walker, 1 Car. & P. 320.

Where one negligently attempting to pass through a small opening between freight cars at a crossing is caught, but not fatally injured, and notice of his perilous situation is given the railroad employees in time to reverse the motion of the cars, and prevent further injury, but no attention is given to such warning, and the person is killed by the cars coming together, the railroad company is responsible for the consequences, notwithstanding the negligence of the deceased. Pannell v. Nashville, F. & S. R. Co. 97 Ala. 298, 12 So. 236.

It is negligence, if not wantonness, for a street car company to run its car into a wagon on the track while the driver of the wagon is endeavoring to get up his horse, which has fallen, thereby throwing the driver to the ground and injuring him. The driver has a right, in such case, to act upon the supposition that, seeing the inextricable position which his wagon occupies, the motorman will apply the necessary means to stop his car. Kansas City-Leavenworth R. Co. v. Langley (Kan.) 78 Pac. 858.

Where a street-car motorman sees a small boy clinging to the lower step of the car, and crying "Let me off," and, instead of stopping, or attempting to stop, the car, he increases its speed, and so causes the boy to be thrown off and injured, he is guilty of wilful or wanton injury. And it is no defense that he does not actually intend the result. In such case "there is a constructive intention as to the consequences, which, entering into the wilful, intentional act, the law imputes to the offender, and in this way a charge which otherwise would be mere negligence becomes, by reason of a reckless disregard of probable consequences, a wilful wrong. That this constructive intention to do an injury in such cases will be imputed in the absence of an actual intent to harm a particular person is recognized as an elementary principle in criminal law. It is also recognized in civil actions for recklessly and wantonly injuring others by carelessness." Aiken v. Holyoke Street R. Co. 180 Mass. 8, 61 N. E. 557, 184 Mass. 269, 68 N. E. 238.

Where a street is bounded by a wall on one side, and there is no sidewalk on that side, it is negligence to drive a team rapidly within 3 feet of the wall, where a group of children have gathered, if the driver sees or ought to see them. And if a child four years of age attempts to save itself from the danger thus threatened by running in front of the horses to the opposite side of the street, and is thereby injured, she is not without remedy, though she might have been safe had she remained where she was, since the child's fright might reasonably be anticipated by the driver, and should admonish him of the necessity of slackening his speed, or driving to the opposite side of the street. Barrett v. Smith, 128 N. Y. 607, 28 N. E. 23.

Where a boy who had fallen upon a street car track was struck and knocked down by a coach when he was in the act of rising, and run over by its wheels, the negligence of the driver was properly left to the jury. Cowan v. Snyder, 1 Silv. Sup. Ct. 396, 5 N. Y. Supp. 340.

If a man riding a horse on a railroad track is seen by others in charge of a train in a deep cut or on a high embankment, which renders it doubtful if he can pass beyond them before the train overtakes him, they should at once take measures to avoid running him down. Tanner v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 60 Ala. 621, 642.

Where a child negligently runs in front of an electric car, and is caught up in its fender, from that moment a new relation exists between the parties, and any act or omission on the part of the railroad company amounting to the lack of the care demanded by the situation, and resulting in the child's death, is sufficient to charge the company with negligence. Such lack of care is shown in the fact that the child was carried on the fender from 32 to 150 feet before it rolled off, and was run over and killed. Weltsman v. Nassau Electric R. Co. 33 App. Div. 585, 53 N. Y. Supp. 905.

Evidence that, after a trespasser on a railroad track was knocked down by an engine, she was carried a distance of 30 feet under the engine before receiving serious injury, when the engine might have been stopped within 5 feet; and during the time she was carried such distance she was screaming, and others were giving the engineer warning of her peril, warrants the finding by a jury that the engineer discovered the perilous situation of deceased in time, by the exercise of due care and precaution in the use of means at his command, to stop the engine and prevent the fatal injury. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Hill (Ark.) 86 S. W. 303.

But in Massachusetts, where the duty of using ordinary care to avoid injury to a trespasser is denied, even after his peril is discovered, it is held that a railroad company is not liable for the consequences of delay in releasing a trespasser who has been run over by an engine, since the company does not owe her the duty to render her such assistance. Grissold v. Boston & M. R. Co. 183 Mass. 434, 67 N. E. 354.

V. Duty of persons inflicting injury to care for those injured.

a. Obligation to prevent aggravation of injury.

The facts presented in UNION P. R. CO. v. CAPIER really resolve themselves into the inquiry, whether one who has been a concurring cause of injury to another, though without fault, is under obligation, because of the helpless condition of the injured party, to give him such care as may be necessary to insure against aggravation of the injury from lack of proper care. That case answers this question in the negative in the following language: "We are unable, however, to approve the doctrine that when the acts of a trespasser himself result in his injury, where his own negligent conduct is alone the cause, those in charge of the instrument which inflicted the hurt, being innocent of wrongdoing, are, nevertheless, blamable in law, if they neglect to administer to the sufferings of him whose wounds we might say were self-imposed." From this, it will be seen that the court bases its decision upon two assumptions, the correctness of which is vital to the validity of its position: First, that the preceding negligence of the injured man was the proximate cause of the aggravation of his injuries; and second, that no duty to the injured man, from the party inflicting the injury, arose from the relation thus created, because the latter was free from fault. But both of these assumptions seem untenable in the light of the authorities cited in the preceding divisions of this note. If with the aid of surgical skill, promptly called, the life of the injured man could have been saved, then, clearly, the failure to summon such aid was the proximate cause of death; and if, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, surgical skill could have been procured in time, then the omission to procure it was negligence on the part of defendant's employees, provided they owed the injured man the duty to furnish such aid. The principle upon which this position is based is strongly supported by the following authorities: Cooley, Torts, 79; Isbell v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 27 Conn. 393, 71 Am. Dec. 78; Weltsman v. Nassau Electric R. Co. 33 App. Div. 585, 53 N. Y. Supp. 905; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Hill (Ark.) 86 S. W. 303; Pannell v. Nashville, F. & S. R. Co. 97 Ala. 298, 12 So. 236; Northern P. R. Co. v. Craft, 16 C. C. A. 175, 29 U. S. App. 687, 69 Fed. 124.

This brings us to the second proposition upon which the court's decision is based, and which is not easy of solution, viz., whether the circumstances of the injury brought the parties into such relation as imposed upon the railroad company the duty of taking affirmative action to prevent aggravation of the injury. That the parties in such case cannot be regarded as mere strangers, owing no duty to each other, seems to have support in the moral consciousness of every society. Indeed, the existence of a relation, such as imposes a moral duty to prevent fatal consequences ensuing from injuries similarly inflicted, is so universally recognized, and so instinctively acted upon, that its performance is seldom omitted. The driver of a vehicle, who runs down a traveler negligently coming in his road on the highway, and who drives on in utter indifference to the sufferings of the victim of his wheels, is deemed of so gross a nature as to be made the subject of universal execration

And equally unworthy would be regarded the railroad company which, after running over a man, and cutting off his leg, left him upon the track to bleed to death, or to have his life finished by a subsequent train. Since, then, society imposes this duty, and so generally observes it, can it be said to be a mere moral obligation, and without legal foundation? Is it not because of the existence of a social relation, such as imposes upon a person inflicting an injury the obligation to prevent its aggravation through neglect of the person injured, that care is so generally given under such circumstances? And, if the relation be conceded, is there not safe ground for the position that a legal duty exists in such cases, although the injured person may, by his own negligence, have contributed to the injury? This view seems reasonable, and finds support in the authorities.

"Whenever a thing has become universally recognized to be a social duty, especially when it has become thus elevated into a usage, of a magnitude and importance sufficient to be within the law's cognizance, the doing of it is thereupon either legally required or legally permitted." Bishop, Non-Contract Law, § 124.

That the negligent contact of persons may create a new relation, imposing duties different from those existing without such contact, is well illustrated in Weltzman v. Nassau Electric R. Co. 33 App. Div. 585, 53 N. Y. Supp. 905, where a child attempting to cross a street in front of an electric car, upon being struck by the car, fell upon the fender, and was carried along for a distance of from 32 to 150 feet, when he rolled from the fender in front of the car, and was run over and killed. It was held that, "whatever the degree of negligence on the part of the individual in the original contact, that negligence culminated in the accident which landed him in the net of the fender. From that moment a new relation existed between the parties; and any act or omission on the part of the defendant amounting to a lack of the care demanded by the situation and resulting in the death of plaintiff's intestate is sufficient to charge the company with negligence."

See also authorities cited in preceding discussions of this note.

The leading authority upon the main question is that of Northern C. R. Co. v. State, 29 Md. 420, 96 Am. Dec. 545, where the deceased was struck by a railroad train, when upon the track a short distance from a crossing. Without notice to his family or other person interested, and without sending for a physician to ascertain his condition, he was taken by defendant's employees to its warehouse, and there laid on a plank across some barrels, and locked up alone all night, upon the supposition that he was dead. The next morning it was found that deceased had revived from his stunned condition, had moved some paces from the spot where he had been laid, but had died from hemorrhage of the arteries of his right leg, which had been crushed by the train. The railroad company was held liable for its negligent treatment and disposition of the deceased, the court saying: "From whatever cause the collision occurred, after the train was stopped the injured man was found upon the pilot of the defendant's engine in a helpless and insensible condition, and it thereupon at once became the duty of the agents in charge of the train to remove him, and to do so." 69 L. R. A.

it with a proper regard to his safety and the laws of humanity. And if in removing and locking up the unfortunate man, though apparently dead, negligence was committed whereby the death was caused, there is no principle of reason or justice upon which the defendant can be exonerated from responsibility. To contend that the agents were not acting in the course of their employment in so removing and disposing of the party is to contend that the duty of the defendant extended no farther than to have cast off by the wayside the helpless and apparently dead man, without taking care to ascertain whether he was dead or alive. or, if alive, whether his life could be saved by reasonable assistance timely rendered. For such a rule of restricted responsibility no authority has been produced, and we apprehend none can be found."

This case is cited, and the principle it enunciates approved, in Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. State, 41 Md. 268; and Dyche v. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. 79 Miss. 361, 30 So. 711.

And in Whitesides v. Southern R. Co. 128 N. C. 229, 38 S. E. 878, it is held that, if one is knocked off a railroad trestle by a train, and the agents of the company, knowing what has been done, go on with the train, without stopping to give him care and attention, it is such negligence as renders the railroad company liable for the result.

The soundness of the doctrine announced in these cases is recognized by at least two text writers upon the subject of negligence:

"Under certain circumstances, the railroad may owe a duty to a trespasser after the injury. When a trespasser has been run down, it is the plain duty of the railway company to render whatever service is possible to mitigate the severity of the injury. The train that has occasioned the harm must be stopped, and the injured person looked after, and, when it seems necessary, removed to a place of safety, and carefully nursed, until other relief can be brought to the disabled person. This is not more a rule of law than a dictate of humanity." Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 215.

"Although a trespasser upon a railway track has been run over and injured, even as the result of his own folly and unlawful act, yet the railroad company thereafter, as a mere matter of social obligation which rests upon all men, owes him the duty of exercising in his behalf such reasonable care and attention as may be practicable under the circumstances, having regard to the necessity of prosecuting its public duties and the safety of others in its custody on board its train." 2 Thomp. Neg. § 1744.

In South Carolina every railroad corporation is required by statute to "cause immediate notice of any accident which may occur on its road, attended with injury to any person, to be given to a physician most accessible to the place of accident." But where a brakeman is merely missed from his train, and it is not known that any accident has occurred, the failure to summon medical aid before the body of the brakeman is found is not negligence, where there is no undue delay in prosecuting search for the body. Adkins v. Atlanta & C. Airline R. Co. 27 S. C. 71, 2 S. E. 849.

A contrary doctrine is laid down in Griswold v. Boston & M. R. Co. 183 Mass. 434, 67 N. E. 354, which aptly illustrates to what a cold-blooded and inhumane position one is logically led by the rule which denies the duty of exer-claiming ordinary care to avoid injury to a trespasser after his peril is discovered. It is there held that where a woman lying prostrate and helpless upon the track has been run over, and lies screaming under an engine, the railroad company owes no legal duty to the person injured to assist her. "There is, of course," it is said "a moral duty, but in performing that duty the company is not liable if one of its servants does not use his best judgment in affording the necessary assistance." The court attempts to distinguish Northern C. R. Co. v. State, 29 Md. 420, 96 Am. Dec. 545, by saying that in that case "there was evidence of negligence on the part of the railroad company in striking a man at a highway crossing," and that, "this being so, the duty of taking proper care of him afterwards resulted from the legal wrong done." But the court evidently overlooked the fact that the question determined in the Maryland case was the correctness of an instruction to the jury, in accord with plaintiff's position, "that, conceding the deceased to have been wrongfully on the track of the railroad, and thus, by his own negligence, contributed to and brought about the collision, still, there was gross negligence in the subsequent conduct of the defendant's agents in providing for and disposing of the disabled and apparently dead man, and which was the proximate cause of his death." It was this proposition which the court sustained.

It will be seen that the situation of the injured party in the Massachusetts case is very similar to that in Weltzman v. Nassau Electric R. Co. 33 App. Div. 585, 53 N. Y. Supp. 905, supra; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Hill (Ark.) 86 S. W. 303, infra; and Pannell v. Nashville, F. & S. R. Co. 97 Ala. 208, 12 So. 236, infra,—in all of which the railroad company was held liable for the failure to exercise ordinary care to prevent further injury, after discovering the perilous situation of the injured wrongdoer.

In Kendall v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 25 Ky. L. Rep. 793, 76 S. W. 376, it is said that a railroad company is under no legal obligation to give medical attention to a trespasser who is injured without its fault. But no authorities are referred to, and a determination of the question was unnecessary, as the injured man was in fact put in charge of competent and reputable physicians and surgeons.

Although involving somewhat different situations, the following cases seem clearly to support the principle of Northern C. R. Co. v. State, 29 Md. 420, 96 Am. Dec. 545, supra.

In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Hill (Ark.) 86 S. W. 303, a woman trespassing upon a railroad track was knocked down and run over by a switch engine, but without receiving serious injury until she had been dragged under the engine a distance of 30 feet. It was conceded that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence, and the only issue presented was whether the engineer, by the exercise of proper care and after discovering the perilous situation of the woman, could have avoided or mitigated the injury finally inflicted. The jury were instructed that, if they found in favor of the plaintiff upon such issue, the railroad company would be liable, and the instruction was upheld on appeal.

Directly in line with the last preceding authority is the case of Pannell v. Nashville, F. & S. R. Co. 97 Ala. 208, 12 So. 236. The plaintiff's intestate, by his own negligence, was caught between the drawheads of two freight cars, but not fatally injured. Thereupon notice was given defendant's yard master in time for him to signal the engineer, and in time for the latter to reverse the motion of the cars, and prevent further injury. But the yard master paid no attention to the warning, and, the cars coming together, the man was killed by the second impact. In its opinion holding the railroad company liable under these circumstances the court says: "It is a well-settled principle that when one person, whether natural or artificial, is about to be the means or instrument of doing an injury to another, that other's negligence contributing proximately to it does not, per se, exonerate the actor from all further effort; does not, per se, relieve him or it from all responsibility for the consequences. Supine inaction, or stolid indifference to consequences, the law does not tolerate. The actor, no matter how free from fault, and no matter how negligent the one in peril may have been, must resort to every reasonable means, and employ every reasonable agency, to avert the catastrophe."

A saloon keeper who expels from his saloon, in an unconscious condition, and at a late hour of the night, a customer to whom he has sold liquor, with the result that the customer dies from cold and exposure, is liable for causing his death, although the deceased contributed to his death by drinking until he became drunk and unconscious. Weymire v. Wolfe, 52 Iowa, 533, 3 N. W. 541.

In the case of Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Weber, 33 Kan. 543, 52 Am. Rep. 543, 6 Pac. 877, a contract relation existed, but it is instructive as a holding, by the same court as the principal case, that a state of helplessness imposes an obligation upon one coming into relation to a person thus situated to avoid doing him harm. It is there held that no liability attaches to a railroad company ejecting a passenger affected with delirium tremens, where he is put in charge of an overseer of the poor. The opinion intimates, however, that if there had been evidence to sustain the finding of the jury, that the passenger lay on the company's depot platform in an exposed condition for over an hour before he was taken charge of by the overseer, and that during that time he received injuries resulting in his death, the company would have been liable. The court says: "The duty of the railroad company, however, with respect to Weber, did not end with his removal from the train. He was unconscious, and unable to take care of himself. The company could not leave him upon the platform helpless, exposed, and without care or attention. It was its duty to exercise reasonable care and diligence to make temporary provision for his protection and comfort."

In Langan v. Great Western R. Co. 26 L. T. N. S. 577, one holding the office of inspector, and whose duty it was to take care of persons injured on defendant's railway, was held to have authority to pledge the credit of the railway company for the care of injured persons at an inn until their recovery. And Cockburn, Ch. J., said: "I cannot help thinking that where a man has, as incidental to his office, the duty of looking after persons who have been injured by railway accidents, it is competent for him to take them to some place of public entertainment, both for the sake of the sufferers, and also for the advantage of the company themselves, because, if after a railway casualty happened persons injured thereby were left to take their chance of aid, or in such a condition as to make it impossible for them to get away from the place where the disaster befell them, unless there was someone authorized on the part of the railway officials to look after them, the injury caused by the accident would be aggravated to a far greater extent, and so as to render the company liable to much heavier damages."

Whether neglect to care for an injured person produced a subsequent condition which would not have existed but for such neglect is a question for the jury. Vandenburgh v. Truax, 4 Denio, 464, 47 Am. Dec. 268; Pollett v. Long, 58 N. Y. 200.

b. What is sufficient performance of obligation.

Whether the care of a sick, helpless, or injured person is undertaken pursuant to some legal obligation, or is voluntarily assumed, the service must be performed with such degree of care as is commensurate with the responsibility assumed. In such case the act is no longer one of mere nonfeasance, but misfeasance, or the doing improperly what he is under obligation to do with ordinary care. Powers v. Massachusetts Homœopathic Hospital, 65 L. R. A. 372, 379, 47 C. C. A. 122, 109 Fed. 294.

A railroad corporation assuming charge of one run over by one of its trains is charged with the duty of common humanity, and whether such duty is properly performed by summoning a physician, who neglects to perform a necessary surgical operation, thereby lessening the injured person's chances of life, and he dies when the operation is finally performed by other physicians, is a question for the jury. Dyche v. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. 79 Miss. 361, 30 So. 711.

The same principle is applied in Needham v. San Francisco & S. J. R. Co. 37 Cal. 409, to the care of an animal trespassing upon a railroad track. The plaintiff's mare had escaped from his pasture, and strayed upon defendant's right of way. Upon a train whistle being sounded, the mare ran along the track until she came to a trestle 7 feet high, upon which she leaped, and fell in such a way as to be unable to extricate herself. In order to remove her from the track, the defendant's employees sawed off the ties of the trestle on which the mare was lying, and allowed her to fall to the creek below, and it was alleged that she was thereby injured. While it was held that the defendant was not negligent in making the removal, the court refused to approve of defendant's contention that, if the plaintiff was negligent in allowing his mare to escape, and the animal was a trespasser on the track, the defendant would not be liable for injuring the mare in effecting her removal, unless it was done through heedlessness and wantonness. The court says: "The Golden Rule is a corner stone of the law as well as of morals, and in the department of the former finds its expression in the maxim, Sic utere tuo, ut alienum non lædas. No more in law than in morals can one wrong be justified or excused by another. A wrongdoer is not an outlaw, against whom every man may lift his hand. Neither his life, limbs, nor property are held at the mercy of his adversary. On the contrary, the latter is bound to conduct himself with reasonable care and prudence, notwithstanding the fault of the former; and if, by so doing, he can avoid injuring the person or property of the former, he is liable if he does not, if, by reason thereof, injury ensues."

In Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. State, 41 Md. 268, the rule of the Price Case, 29 Md. 420, 96 Am. Dec. 545, supra, is approved, but is held to extend only to proper care and treatment of the injured person until he is carried to a nearby station, and there placed in a hotel, and under the care of a physician. And that under such rule the railroad company could not be held liable for his subsequent death from hemorrhage occurring during his removal to another town where his relatives resided.

In Griswold v. Boston & M. R. Co. 183 Mass. 434, 67 N. E. 354, it is held that a slight delay in extricating an injured trespasser from her situation does not render the railroad company liable for the resulting aggravation of her injuries. The court refers to the case of Dyche v. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. 79 Miss. 361, 30 So. 711, supra, but repudiates its authority, and attempts to distinguish Northern C. R. Co. v. State, 29 Md. 420, 96 Am. Dec. 545, supra, in a manner not warranted by the report of that case, as already pointed out.

VI. Knowledge of disability.

a. Actual knowledge generally necessary to creation of duty.

It has been seen that persons under disability are entitled to the care due to persons generally, and may recover for the consequences of the omission of such care as to them, although the consequences may have been aggravated by their previous physical condition, and could not have been foreseen by the negligent party. (See div. IV. subd. a, supra.) In such cases the negligent person's lack of knowledge of the previous disability of the injured party is not an excuse for the omission of ordinary care. Brownback v. Fralley, 78 Ill. App. 262.

The case of Purcell v. St. Paul City R. Co. 48 Minn. 134, 16 L. R. A. 203, 50 N. W. 1034, is one where a contract relation existed; but the court so clearly distinguishes the cases where liability for injury to a person under disability is not dependent upon previous knowledge of such disability, from those where liability is dependent upon such knowledge, that a quotation from the opinion is appropriate. A street car of the defendant, on which plaintiff was a passenger, came into such imminent danger of a collision with a car on a cross line that plaintiff received a nervous shock, was thrown into convulsions, and, being pregnant at the time, a miscarriage and illness followed. It was held that the defendant was liable for the consequences of its negligence, notwithstanding the absence of knowledge of plaintiff's condition, the court saying: "Certainly a woman in her condition has as good a right to be carried as anyone, and is entitled to at least as high a degree of care on the part of the carrier. It may be that where a passenger, without the knowledge of the carrier, is sick, feeble, or disabled, the latter does not owe to him a higher degree of care than he owes to passengers generally, and that the carrier would not be liable to him for any injury caused by an act or omission not negligent as to an ordinary passenger. But when the act or omission is negligence as to any and all passengers, well or ill, anyone injured by the negligence must be entitled to recover to the full extent of the injury so caused, without regard to whether, owing to his previous condition of health, he is more or less liable to injury."

But ordinarily one is not chargeable with negligence for not guarding against a danger of which he has no knowledge. Ilott v. Wilkes, 3 Barn. & Ald. 304; Worthington v. Mencer, 96 Ala. 310, 315, 17 L. R. A. 407, 11 So. 72; Dally v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 106 N. C. 301, 11 S. E. 320; Langan v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 72 Mo. 392; Jeffrey v. Keokuk & D. M. R. Co. 56 Iowa, 346, 9 N. W. 884; Kansas P. R. Co. v. Whipple, 39 Kan. 531, 540, 18 Pac. 730; Smithwick v. Hall & U. Co. 59 Conn. 261, 12 L. R. A. 279, 21 Am. St. Rep. 104, 21 Atl. 924; Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Hummell, 44 Pa. 379, 84 Am. Dec. 457. This is especially true where the occasion for the exercise of care to avoid injuring another is the disability of the person to be affected, as distinguished from those circumstances calling for care as to persons generally. The law does not impose upon one the duty of giving to another the care due only to the deaf, blind, and unconscious, until he has notice that such person is suffering from one of those disabilities. And where a person's danger arises from the fact of his being where he ought not to be, or where the presence of people is not reasonably to be expected, no duty is owing him until he is discovered. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Smith, 62 Tex. 252; Johnson v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 91 Ky. 651, 25 S. W. 754; Thomas v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 93 Iowa, 248, 61 N. W. 967, 114 Iowa, 169, 86 N. W. 259; Cleveland, C. & C. R. Co. v. Terry, 8 Ohio St. 570; Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Juday, 19 Ind. App. 436, 49 N. E. 843; Kansas P. R. Co. v. Whipple, 39 Kan. 531, 540, 18 Pac. 730.

When the mere negligence of another causes or contributes to the injury of a person so mentally incompetent as to be incapable of exercising care, "if the conduct of the injured person would have avoided his claim to relief if he had been capable of exercising care in his own behalf, the person inflicting the injury is not to be held to a liability which would not have been incurred under the same circumstances in favor of a person of ordinary capacity, unless he had notice of the injured person's mental deficiency, and of his consequent helplessness and peril in the circumstances in which he was placed. The duty of observing special precautions for the safety of another, because the latter, by reason of mental imbecility, cannot be influenced by the dictates of ordinary prudence, is not cast upon one who is not charged with notice of the other's peril and of his lack of sufficient intelligence to avoid it." Worthington v. Mencer, 96 Ala. 310, 17 L. R. A. 407, 11 So. 72.

Where one person negligently comes into a situation of peril, in which his liability to injury is increased by reason of some disability, before another can be held liable for an injury to him, it must appear either that the latter had knowledge of his situation in time to prevent the injury, and failed to use ordinary care to that end, or that the injurious act or omission, considering time and place, was such that its nature and probable consequence would be to produce serious hurt to someone. Dally v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 106 N. C. 301, 11 S. E. 320; Cleveland, C. & C. R. Co. v. Terry, 8 Ohio St. 570; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Monday, 49 Ark. 257, 4 S. W. 782; Birmingham R. & Electric Co. v. Bowers, 69 L. R. A.

110 Ala. 328, 20 So. 345; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Kellem, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 734, 21 S. W. 230; Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. v. Williams, 69 Miss. 631, 12 So. 957.

The presence of a man of advanced years, but strong and healthy, upon a railroad track, does not impose upon the railroad company the exercise of greater care than would be required in the case of an adult of less advanced years, unless its employees know, or have reason to believe, that such person, from some cause, is not possessed of the ordinary ability to care for himself. Green v. Southern P. Co. 122 Cal. 563, 55 Pac. 577.

If a man sleeping on a railroad track is not seen by persons operating a train, the railroad company is not liable for running over him, although the track at the place of the accident, and for a long distance on either side, is level and straight, so that an object no larger than a man's hat can be seen for 400 or 500 yards. A railroad company does not owe to trespassers the duty of keeping a lookout. Denman v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 26 Minn. 357, 4 N. W. 605. And see cases under title, Duty to discover another's peril or disability, div. VII. subdiv. b. infra.

A railroad company cannot be held liable for mere negligence toward a person on its track, who is deaf or otherwise deficient in his faculties, so as to render him unconscious of the impending danger, unless the knowledge of such infirmity is brought home to those in charge of the train. Johnson v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 91 Ky. 651, 25 S. W. 754; Dally v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 106 N. C. 301, 11 S. E. 320; Williams v. Southern P. R. Co. (Cal.) 11 Pac. 849; Tyler v. Sites, 88 Va. 470, 13 S. E. 978.

Likewise, wilful and intentional wrong, a willingness to inflict injury, cannot be imputed to one who is without consciousness, from whatever cause, that his conduct will inevitably or probably lead to wrong or injury. It is only where the engineer of a railroad train becomes actually aware of the danger of a trespasser upon a trestle, that the failure to exercise preventive effort to avert an injury can constitute such gross negligence as amounts to wantonness and recklessness. Southern R. Co. v. Bush, 122 Ala. 470, 482, 26 So. 168; Ulrich v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 151 Ind. 358, 51 N. E. 95.

The failure to stop a train upon the sight of a man 10 or 12 feet from the track, and approaching with the apparent purpose of crossing it, is not wanton negligence, where the train is in full view of such person, and those in charge of the train are without knowledge that he is deaf. Birmingham R. & Electric Co. v. Bowers, 110 Ala. 328, 20 So. 345.

And the duty of active effort to prevent one's lawful action from resulting in injury to another arises, generally, not with knowledge of his presence in a place of possible danger, where ordinary care on his part will insure his safety, but only upon the discovery of his being in imminent peril from such action. This distinction is important in determining the question of liability for either negligent or wilful injuries. Smalley v. Southern R. Co. 57 S. C. 243, 250, 35 S. E. 489; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hill (Tex. Civ. App.) 58 S. W. 255, 258 (opinion on rehearing); Orr v. Cedar Rapids & M. C. R. Co. 94 Iowa, 423, 62 N. W. 851; Southern R. Co. v. Bush, 122 Ala. 470, 26 So. 168; Ulrich v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 151 Ind. 358, 51 N. E. 95.

But the testimony of an engineer as to the time he discovered a person in peril on the track is not conclusive. Where the facts and circumstances proved justify a finding by the jury that the disability of the injured party was discovered by those on the train at a distance which would have enabled them, by the exercise of ordinary care, to avoid injury, a verdict based thereon will not be disturbed, although the engineer testified that he did not discover the person's peril until it was too late to stop the train. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Hill (Ark.) 86 S. W. 303; Farrell v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 123 Iowa, 690, 99 N. W. 578; Orr v. Cedar Rapids & M. C. R. Co. 94 Iowa, 423, 62 N. W. 851; Purcell v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 117 Iowa, 667, 671, 91 N. W. 933; Smalley v. Southern R. Co. 57 S. C. 243, 35 S. E. 489; Gunn v. Ohio River R. Co. 42 W. Va. 676, 36 L. R. A. 575, 581, 26 S. E. 546; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Tabor, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 283, 83 S. W. 894; Hankerson v. Southwestern R. Co. 59 Ga. 593, 61 Ga. 114, 72 Ga. 182; Sibley v. Ratliffe, 50 Ark. 477, 8 S. W. 686. And see dissenting opinion in Williams v. Southern P. R. Co. (Cal.) 11 Pac. 849.

Affirmative evidence that a child on a railroad track was seen by the engineer or fireman in time to stop the train and avoid the injury is not required. If it appears that the view was clear for 1,600 feet, and between the train and the child there was a public crossing, where it was the duty of the engineer to be on the alert, it is for the jury to say whether the child was seen by the engineer in time to stop the train. Johnston v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 56 Kan. 263, 43 Pac. 228.

And a jury is not bound to accept the statement of a locomotive engineer that he did not discover that a woman was under his engine, nor receive warning of her perilous situation, in time to have avoided the injury inflicted, where there is evidence that the woman was screaming loudly, and that persons were running toward the engine and giving warning by gestures and loud screams. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Hill (Ark.) 86 S. W. 303.

"While wantonness on the part of the engineer cannot be predicated on the mere fact that he ought to have seen deceased on the trestle, or on anything short of actual knowledge, yet this actual knowledge need not be positively and directly shown, but, like any other fact, may be proved by showing circumstances from which the fact of actual knowledge is a legitimate inference. Otherwise, in cases of this character, this fact could never be proved except by the testimony of the engineer himself. Certainly the facts that the road was straight for a long distance, the view of the track unobstructed, and the engineer was in his seat looking ahead along the track, and there was nothing to prevent him from seeing a person on the track a few hundred feet ahead, are relevant and admissible for the purpose of proving that he did see such person, and may properly be submitted to the jury on this issue; and, while no presumption arises from these facts that the engineer did see the person on the track, yet this may be inferred from these facts by the jury, whose province alone it is to decide the weight to be given to facts legally in evidence, and their effect on an issue which they are admitted to prove." Southern R. Co. v. Bush, 122 Ala. 470, 26 So. 168.

474, 53 L. R. A. 267, 96 Am. St. Rep. 459, 61 S. W. 997. In finding that the jury were justified in finding that the engineer of a train saw some children upon a trestle in time to stop the train and prevent injury, the court says: "The evidence conduces to show that the engineer could see the whole bridge from a distance of 960 feet, and one standing on the track at the bluff can see the whole length of the bridge for 520 yards; that a man in the cab could see the bridge 120 feet further back. The proof also conduces to show that a man in the cab could see the bridge 120 feet further back than if on the ground. It is also evident from the proof that for a considerable distance from the bridge it is up grade in reaching the bridge in question. There is also some proof tending to show that someone on the engine was seen to put his head out, as if looking toward the bridge, at some distance from it. It seems to us, from the evidence, that the jury were authorized to believe and to have found that the defendant's agents and servants saw those children upon the bridge in ample time to have so slackened the speed of the train as to enable them to have escaped the danger. There is hardly room to doubt this, from the map and evidence filed in this action."

b. When mere belief sufficient to impose duty.

Where there are reasonable grounds to believe that a person in danger will not be able to help himself because of some mental or physical infirmity, or other disability, such belief, in the absence of actual knowledge, is sufficient to impose the duty of exercising ordinary care to avoid injuring such person. Dally v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 106 N. C. 301, 11 S. E. 320; Clark v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 109 N. C. 430, 14 L. R. A. 749, 14 S. E. 43; Tucker v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 92 Va. 549, 24 S. E. 229; Blankenship v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 94 Va. 449, 27 S. E. 20; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Wilkerson, 46 Ark. 513; Sibley v. Ratliffe, 50 Ark. 477, 8 S. W. 686; *Anderson v. If the conduct of a person walking upon a railroad track is such as to create in the minds of those operating a train a doubt as to whether such person is in possession of all his faculties, and to give them reason to believe that an injury will occur unless the train is checked, they are bound to use greater caution, and to stop the train, if necessary, to insure his safety. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cooper (Ky.) 6 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 5; Lexington & C. C. Min. Co. v. Huffman, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 775, 32 S. W. 611; Pittsburgh, C. & S. T. L. R. Co. v. Judd, 10 Ind. App. 213, 37 N. E. 775; Campbell v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 55 Kan. 536, 40 Pac. 997; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Robinson, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 121, 23 S. W. 433; Galveston City R. Co. v. Hanna (Tex. Civ. Likewise, if there are circumstances sufficient to give notice to the engineer of a train that the life of a human being is in danger, as where persons are running toward the train and excitedly waving their hands, it is his duty to stop the train, or materially check its speed, although he may not in fact see any person upon the track or in danger. Donahoe v. Wabash,

An engineer who sees a person on the track waving his hands, and not stepping aside, should check his train at once, though he may not know that such person's foot is caught in the track. Spooner v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 115 N. Y. 22, 21 N. E. 696.

c. Negligent ignorance equivalent to knowledge.

When knowledge itself is a duty, as where there is a probability of the presence of persons liable to be affected by one's action, negligent ignorance is equivalent to knowledge. Goodrich v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 103 Iowa, 412, 72 N. W. 653; Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Rodgers, 100 Va. 324, 41 S. E. 732; Murphy v. Orr, 96 N. Y. 14; Kunz v. Troy, 104 N. Y. 344, 10 N. Hewitt*, 67 Tex. 479, 60 Am. Rep. 32, 3 S. W. 705; Werner v. Citizens' R. Co. 81 Mo. 368.

Where a man is stricken down in a fit at a private crossing, the railroad company cannot be relieved from liability for running over him, because of its failure to discover his presence upon the track in such condition. Yoakum v. Mettash (Tex. Civ. App.) 26 S. W. 129.

A railroad company is liable for running over a man having his foot caught in a frog at a city crossing, where, if not seen, he might have been seen, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, in time to avoid the injury. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Crockett, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1989, 79 S. W. 235.

The failure of the motorman of an electric street car to see the peril of one driving a horse which has been frightened by his car, and become unmanageable, when he might have seen it by the exercise of ordinary care, is negligence; and it is proper in such case to submit to the jury the question whether the motorman ought to have seen the frightened condition of the horse. Ellis v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 160 Mass. 341, 35 N. E. 1127; Lexington R. Co. v. Fain, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 2243, 80 S. W. 463.

Where a motorman, because of his attention being drawn to a bicycle keeping pace with his car, failed to see a frightened horse that had sprung upon the track ahead of him, and in consequence the car struck the horse, and threw its rider to the pavement with such force as to render him insane, it was held that the court properly instructed the jury that, if the motorman could, in the exercise of reasonable care, have seen the plaintiff in time to check his car after plaintiff's horse sprang upon the track, and before the car collided with his horse, and the plaintiff was not himself guilty of negligence which contributed to his injury, then the defendant would be liable. Omaha Street R. Co. v. Duvall, 40 Neb. 29, 58 N. W. 531.

The misapplication of the principle of these cases to actions for injuries to trespassers has led to some conflict in the authorities. Against the holding of the authorities above cited, that knowledge of a person's peril or disability is necessary to the creation of a special duty toward such person, based upon his situation or condition, it is contended by respectable authority that "discovery" is not a prerequisite to such duty to trespassers; that since the negligence which will defeat a plaintiff's recovery for an injury may be his failure, by the exercise of ordinary care, to discover and avoid a collision with an obstruction which the defendant had negligently placed in the highway (Butterfield v. Forrester, 11 East, 60), so, on the other hand, the defendant's failure to discover and avoid plaintiff's prior negligence may create a liability for an injury inflicted without actual knowledge of the presence or disability of the person injured. And this, it is alleged, was the true cause of action in Davies v. Mann, 10 Mees. & W. 546. See also cases cited in div. VII., subd. b, infra.

But it should be observed that in the situation presented in Davies v. Mann, 10 Mees. & W. 546, "knowledge itself was a duty," and it was for the breach of this duty that the defendant was held liable. He was upon the highway, where persons and animals were liable to be present, and it was his duty to be on the lookout for them; but, instead, he drove at a speed that prevented his discovery of the helpless donkey that lay in the road. It is only when this duty to know exists that a liability for an injury ignorantly inflicted can arise; and the duty to know exists, ordinarily, only when the duty of watchfulness is imposed; and the obligation to be on the lookout for persons arises only in places where they are reasonably to be expected. But, as persons are not reasonably to be expected where their presence makes them trespassers, the duty of watchfulness, and consequently the duty to know, does not exist as to persons in such places. Accordingly, those authorities holding that a railroad company may be liable for injury to a trespasser, although his presence and situation were not discovered, are forced to impose upon railroad companies the duty of maintaining a lookout for such persons. And it is for the breach of this unusual duty that these decisions hold railroad companies liable for injuries ignorantly inflicted. Smith v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. 114 N. C. 728, 25 L. R. A. 287, 19 S. E. 863, 923.

VII. Duty to discover another's peril or disability.

a. At places where people are likely to be present.

May one be relieved from responsibility for an injury done to a person under some disability, in the performance of an otherwise lawful act, upon the ground that he had no knowledge of the disability of such other person, when by the exercise of ordinary care the situation or condition of that person might have been discovered?

The general current of authority answers this question in the negative, where the duty of watchfulness against such result exists as to people generally. When this duty exists, its breach is negligence, for which a liability arises. And in those jurisdictions where the question of liability is determined by the application of the doctrine of proximate cause to the negligence of both parties it would make no difference that the injured party was himself negligent, if his negligence was not concurrent with that of the party inflicting the injury.

But, while the language of some of the authorities seems to impose upon railroad companies in particular an increased obligation to be on the lookout at crossings where there is a probability of children and infirm persons being present, and entitled to their especial care in avoidance of injury, the duty, so far as the obligation to discover their presence is concerned, seems not to be different in kind from that owing to persons generally. The duty of increased care arises only when one knows, or is bound to know, of another's helplessness. And the question here is whether the law requires of one the exercise of ordinary care to discover such helplessness or disability, and thereby imposes the duty of such increased care toward persons thus situated, although actual knowledge of their situation or condition is wanting, if, by the exercise of ordinary care, it might be discovered. Some of the cases cited pertain to the duty owing to children, as to whom the same rule governs as is applied in cases of physical infirmity or other disability.

As to the duty of railroad companies to discover children upon their tracks, see note to Bottoms v. Seaboard & R. R. Co. 25 L. R. A. 784. And for authorities as to the duty of railroad companies to maintain a lookout from their trains for persons generally, whether at crossings or elsewhere, see note to Smith v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. 25 L. R. A. 287.

First, as to the duty to maintain a lookout along highways and at railroad crossings.

Drivers of vehicles are required not only to make a vigilant use of their senses to discover anyone exposed to danger, but so to control the movements of their teams as to avoid doing him injury, to the extent of their power, when discovered. Therefore, where the driver of a vehicle runs down an aged and lame pedestrian, who is seen by him when 15 feet distant, and probably could have been seen at a greater distance, the question of his negligence is for the jury. Barker v. Savage, 45 N. Y. 191, 6 Am. Rep. 66.

And where one who is unobservant drives over a child in the highway, when he might have avoided the injury if he had maintained a reasonable lookout, as it was his duty to do, he is liable for the damage inflicted. Murphy v. Orr, 96 N. Y. 14; Birkett v. Knickerbocker Ice Co. 110 N. Y. 504, 18 N. E. 108; Barrett v. Smith, 128 N. Y. 607, 28 N. E. 23; Elze v. Baumann, 2 Misc. 72, 81, 21 N. Y. Supp. 782; Cowan v. Snyder, 1 Silv. Sup. Ct. 396, 5 N. Y. Supp. 340; Sykes v. Lawlor, 49 Cal. 236; Summers v. Bergner Brewing Co. 143 Pa. 114, 24 Am. St. Rep. 518, 22 Atl. 707; Stringer v. Frost, 116 Ind. 477, 2 L. R. A. 614, 9 Am. St. Rep. 875, 19 N. E. 331; Vaughn v. Scade, 30 Mo. 600.

This is true, not only at cross walks, but elsewhere. The driver of a vehicle is bound to be watchful at all points, and, if he drives over a child, whom he does not see because he is looking backward, and conversing with another, he is guilty of negligence. Moebus v. Herrmann, 108 N. Y. 349, 2 Am. St. Rep. 440, 15 N. E. 415.

If the driver of a vehicle knows that a child, idiot, or lunatic, is in the highway, he is bound to a proportionate degree of watchfulness; and what would be ordinary neglect in regard to one supposed to be of full age and capacity would be gross neglect as to a child, or one known to be incapable of escaping danger. Robinson v. Cone, 22 Vt. 213, 54 Am. Dec. 67.

Where a driver, if he had been on the lookout, could have seen a child two years old leaving the curb, when he was 25 or 30 feet distant, he was negligent in not seeing him: or, if he was looking, and saw the child, and recklessly kept on, regardless of its known ignorance and helplessness, he would likewise be liable. But if the child rushed suddenly from the curb in front of the horses he would not be negligent in not avoiding the injury. Satinsky v. Mutual Brewing Co. 187 Pa. 57, 40 Atl. 821.

The rights of a woman sixty-three years of age, feeble, and of defective eyesight, to walk across a public street, are not subordinate to the rights of one driving thereon. And there can be no urgent necessity which will justify one driving in such a careless and reckless manner as to endanger the persons or lives of those who are properly and lawfully upon the street, and who themselves are in the exercise of due care. Eaton v. Cripps, 94 Iowa, 176, 62 N. W. 687.

In view of the fact that persons may be expected to cross a street car track at any point on the line, and at any time, the law imposes upon motormen the duty of exercising ordinary care to discover persons and avoid injuring them. Persons operating street cars are bound to know that men, women, and children have an equal right to use the highway, and will be upon it. It is their duty, therefore, to be on the lookout, and to avoid injury to persons who, because of some disability, are liable to injury if the car is not stopped. Thiel v. South Covington & C. Street R. Co. 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1590, 78 S. W. 206; Levy v. Dry Dock, E. B. & B. R. Co. 35 N. Y. S. R. 769, 12 N. Y. Supp. 485.

To be on the watch is no more than ordinary care under such circumstances. If, therefore, by being on the lookout, the driver of a street car, by the exercise of ordinary care, can discover the presence of a child on the track in time to avoid injuring it, it is his duty to do so. Passamanek v. Louisville R. Co. 98 Ky. 195, 32 S. W. 620.

Street railways have no exclusive right "to the use of the part of a street covered by their track, but all persons have the right to use the street for the purposes for which streets are ordinarily used; and, from this fact, such companies may expect that other persons will use the street, as they have the right to do, and it is therefore incumbent upon them to ascertain whether the track be clear." Hence, though a child under two years of age suddenly enters upon the track but a short distance in front of a car, yet, if an injury to it may be avoided by the exercise of proper care after the driver sees it, the railway company will be liable. Galveston City R. Co. v. Hewitt, 67 Tex. 479, 60 Am. Dec. 32, 3 S. W. 705.

The driver of a street car, who sees an object on the track at sufficient distance ahead to enable him to stop his car to avoid injury, and can ascertain the same to be a human being by checking his horses and driving slowly, but who, supposing the object to be a bundle of hay or sack of oats, drives recklessly over it, which proves to be a drunken man, is guilty of wilful injury. Werner v. Citizens' R. Co. 81 Mo. 368.

It is culpable negligence for the motorman of a street car company to run over a man lying in an unconscious condition upon the track in the night time, where the headlight of the car enables the motorman to see 25 feet ahead of him, and the accident can be avoided by the exercise of ordinary care. McKeon v. Steinway R. Co. 20 App. Div. 601, 47 N. Y. Supp. 374.

Where a gripman in charge of a car testified that he did not see the plaintiff, a cripple, until she was about 5 feet from his car, when it was too late to stop the car before a collision, yet, if he had seen her as soon as two witnesses who called to her, he might have stopped the car in time to avoid the injury, it was held that the evidence presented a fair question for the jury whether the gripman could not have seen the plaintiff sooner than he did if he had been as vigilant as he ought to have been; and the court quotes the following statement of the law as to the duty of watchfulness on the part of street car drivers: "In a large, populous city, where all descriptions of vehicles are constantly passing and repassing, as well as persons on foot, including the aged and infirm, as also children who are young and wanting in prudence and discretion, it is the duty of drivers of cars, not only to see that the railroad track is clear, but also to exercise a constant watchfulness for persons who may be approaching the track. Unless he does so, he does not exercise that ordinary care and prudence which the law imposes on him." Baltimore Traction Co. v. Wallace, 77 Md. 435, 26 Atl. 518.

If the motorman of a street car, by the exercise of ordinary care, can see that his car has frightened a horse, which thereby has become unmanageable, and that there is danger of a collision, the company will be liable if the car is not stopped in time to avoid injury. Lexington R. Co. v. Fain, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 2243, 80 S. W. 463; Ellis v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 160 Mass. 341, 35 N. E. 1127.

All railroad companies are under an imperative obligation, upon approaching a road crossing, to use due care and caution to avoid injury to others lawfully traversing the highway; and to the extent that they fail to employ that care and caution they are responsible for injuries resulting from such omissions. There is a failure of such duty where a train is backed up over a crossing in a populous locality, without a bell being rung or other signal being given, and in charge of a brakeman who is at the time on the platform between two cars, where he cannot see a child upon the track, or have notice so as to apply the brakes. Byrne v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 83 N. Y. 620, 104 N. Y. 362, 58 Am. Rep. 512, 10 N. E. 539; Lortz v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 7 App. Div. 515, 40 N. Y. Supp. 253.

If the presence of a person with his foot caught in a frog at a switch at a crossing might have been discovered, by the exercise of ordinary care, in time to avoid injury, the railroad company is liable. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Crockett, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1989, 79 S. W. 235.

It is the duty of an engineer to see that persons at a crossing act on the notice given by the ringing of the bell, and if he runs his train backwards he is not excusable because he does not, or cannot, see a person on a trestle adjoining the crossing, whither she had run to escape the sudden movement of the train toward her while crossing the track. Robinson v. Western P. R. Co. 48 Cal. 409.

Railroads are required to exercise "a high degree of care for the protection and safety of travelers upon the highway at and in proximity to public crossings in cities. It is their positive duty to keep a lookout for such travelers, and to use every reasonable precaution consistent with the proper operation and management of their trains to avoid injuring them." The negligence of an engineer with respect to persons in peril at such places is measured not by what he knew, but by what any reasonably prudent and careful engineer would or should have known and done under similar circumstances. Therefore, where an engineer opened the steam cocks of his engine, and began to move the same, while plaintiff was trying to calm a frightened horse near the crossing, and thereby the horse became more frightened, and sprang down an embankment, and plaintiff was thrown from his buggy and injured, it was held error to instruct the jury that the railroad company's liability depended upon whether the circumstances within the knowledge of the engineer admonished him of plaintiff's danger. Inabnett v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 69 Ark. 130, 61 S. W. 570.

An engine driver operating an engine along a public thoroughfare, where old and infirm persons, children, and drunken persons are liable at all times to be present, is required to exercise more diligence than at other portions of the road, although such persons be negligent. What might be justifiable at other places might be such gross negligence at a street crossing as to amount to wilful misconduct. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Hutchinson, 47 Ill. 408.

Whether a railroad company is required to maintain a lookout or not, it is its duty to use reasonable care and diligence to prevent accidents at intersections of its right of way with city streets; and where a person with his foot caught in the track could have been discovered if a lookout for danger to persons on the track had been maintained, and the cars could have been stopped in time to prevent the accident, the question of the company's negligence is for the jury. Goodrich v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 103 Iowa, 412, 72 N. W. 653.

A woman, not in charge of a child, undertook to carry it across a railroad track, but stumbled and fell, and the child was thrown upon the track before an approaching train and injured. The train was backing on a public street in a closely built part of the city without a lookout being maintained, and those in charge of the train were in such position that they could not see any considerable distance in the direction of the motion. It was held that the evidence of the railroad company's negligence was sufficient to go to the jury. North Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Mahoney, 57 Pa. 187.

In Yoakum v. Mettash (Tex. Civ. App.) 26 S. W. 129, a man who had fallen in a fit upon the railway track at a crossing was run over and killed, and it was contended that the law does not impose upon railway companies the duty of keeping a reasonable lookout for persons "upon their tracks." But the court held that, the deceased having gone upon the track at a private crossing, where he had a right to be, the authorities all agree that those in charge of the train were required to exercise ordinary care, not only to protect him when discovered in a helpless condition upon the track, but also to ascertain whether or not he was upon the track in such condition.

A contrary rule seems to be laid down in Western Maryland R. Co. v. Kehoe, 83 Md. 434, 35 Atl. 90, where it is said that, while railroad companies are under an imperative obligation, upon approaching a road crossing, to use due care and caution to avoid injury to others lawfully "traversing the highway," yet this duty is "only coextensive with the correlative right of the individual to use the highway for purposes of transit," and is not applicable to a person who has been thrown upon the track through negligent driving, and is lying there when run over by a train.

And in Indiana a boy who lies down at a railroad crossing, and goes to sleep, with his leg over one rail, and who is of sufficient age to appreciate the danger, although not a trespasser, is guilty of contributory negligence, and cannot recover for injuries from being run over by a passing train, if those in charge of the train do not discover him. Because the engineer did not see the boy, it is said, he was not chargeable with wilful or wanton injury, and the lad's contributory negligence was a complete answer to any charge of simple negligence. Krenzer v. Pittsburg, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 151 Ind. 587, 68 Am. St. Rep. 252, 43 N. E. 649, 52 N. E. 220.

In the opinion upon a rehearing in the case last cited the doctrine of Davies v. Mann, 10 Mees. & W. 546, is, in terms, approved; but the court says: "In every case, one who has himself contributed to his own injury must suffer the consequences of his own want of due care, unless it should appear that the one injuring him knew of his condition in time to have avoided the injury, and could with ordinary care have avoided it." The duty of being on the lookout in places where persons may be reasonably expected to be present, to prevent an action, which imperils human life, resulting in injury to others, is thus repudiated, as a care that is not due to helpless persons if they have been guilty of negligence. The duty of care as to such persons, the court holds, arises only "with knowledge," and then only because the absence of such care would amount to "wilful injury;" for it is said, "In order to charge the company with responsibility, there must have been either wilfulness or wantonness on its part, or else negligence; and in the latter case the plaintiff must himself have been free from contributory negligence." It will be perceived that the doctrine of this case, like that of the preceding Maryland case, is directly opposite to that of Davies v. Mann, which both courts assume to approve. For both courts deny recovery to the plaintiff for doing substantially the same thing that the owner of the donkey did in the English case, viz., placing himself in a helpless condition in the highway, where he would be subject to injury, unless others, while exercising ordinary care, should observe and avoid him. It is true, in the Maryland case, that, in being thrown from his carriage, the man fell a few feet away from the highway; but the court bases its opinion upon the fact that he was "lying upon the track," instead of being in the act of passing over it, when the train struck him. The dissenting opinion of McCabe, J., in the Indiana case is more in line with the doctrine of Davies v. Mann, as interpreted by the preponderance of authority. He says: "Even though the child be held responsible and guilty of negligence in falling asleep upon the railroad track with one leg across the rail, yet that negligence is shown by the findings of the jury to have been antecedent and prior to the established negligence of appellee's engineer. For 300 feet before reaching the child thus sleeping on the track, the engineer had a clear, unobstructed view of the child's situation and peril, and, as the findings show, could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided running his engine over and crushing his leg. That being the case, the plaintiff's negligence was not proximate, and not a proximate cause of his injury, and did not proximately contribute thereto, according to the long-established legal principles both in this country and in England." It is evident that if the child asleep at the crossing was in a place where persons might reasonably be expected to be present, then the exercise of ordinary care required that defendant be on the lookout for persons at such place; and if, with such lookout, the child might have been discovered, and his injury avoided, his negligence in going to sleep on the track was not the proximate cause of his death, but the subsequent negligence of the defendant was such cause. This is the very question which Davies v. Mann, 10 Mees. & W. 546, determines, and its position is supported by the greater weight of authority.

As is well said in one of the leading works on Negligence, "The rule that a plaintiff is, as matter of law, negligent if he fails to see what he was bound to look for and ought to have seen, is rigidly enforced; and the same rule must, in common justice, be applied to the defendant." 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 5th ed. § 484.

And the testimony of those operating a train that they did keep a lookout, but did not discover a helpless person upon the track, is not conclusive, although it is not contradicted by other witnesses. If a man who is required to watch in order to see an object says he did watch, but did not see it, when the object was there to be seen, and visible, and there was no obstruction to sight, and plenty of light, the court or jury is not bound to find that he did keep a lookout, but did not discover the object. Gunn v. Ohio River R. Co. 42 W. Va. 676, 36 L. R. A. 575, 26 S. E. 546. See further, cases cited under div. VI., subd. a, supra.

Second, as to duty to maintain lookout at places where persons are likely to be present, other than the highway and at crossings.

"When there is reason to apprehend that the track may not be clear notwithstanding the right of the company to have it clear, persons operating a train cannot act upon the presumption that the track is clear, without being responsible for the consequences." Therefore, some vigilance is required of a railroad company to discover trespassers on its tracks between streets in a town or city; and if an injury to a little child on a railroad track, between crossings in a city, might have been avoided if the engineer, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have discovered it in time to stop the train, the company is liable. Frick v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 75 Mo. 595; Bellefontaine & I. R. Co. v. Snyder, 18 Ohio St. 309, 98 Am. Dec. 175; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Lewis, 79 Pa. 33; *Kay v. Pennsylvania R. In such case, it is said, by Justice Andrews, in Barry v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 92 N. Y. 289, 44 Am. Rep. 377, supra, that the railroad company "is an actor at the time in creating the circumstances which imperil human life," and, therefore, owes to the people crossing its tracks the duty of exercising care in the movement of its trains.

And in Kay v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 65 Pa. 269, 3 Am. Rep. 628, supra, Justice Agnew says: "Conceding the right of the railroad company to the exclusive use of its tracks over the lot, as the learned judge held, the true question is whether the circumstances created a different duty. . . . Duties grow out of circumstances, the authorities tell us, and that which in one case would be an ordinary and proper use of one's rights may, by a change of circumstances, become negligence and a want of due care. . . . In the present case the negligence charged consisted of a positive act of carelessness, in sending a car round a curve out of sight, on a descending grade, at a place where persons might be expected to be, from the permissive use suffered by the company. It was the duty of the court, therefore, to have submitted the facts to the jury for their determination whether there was negligence or not."

But according to some authorities, upon a similar state of facts, the railroad company is not liable, unless the injury was wilful, or was inflicted maliciously, as with gross and reckless carelessness. Morrissey v. Eastern R. Co. 126 Mass. 377, 30 Am. Rep. 686; Wright v. Boston & A. R. Co. 142 Mass. 296, 7 N. E. 866; Byrnes v. Boston & M. R. Co. 181 Mass. 322, 63 N. E. 897; *Griswold v. Boston & M. R. "Where a number of children, ranging in age from six to fifteen years, are, with the knowledge and without the disapproval of the employees of a railroad company in charge of its trains, permitted to board and ride upon the trains while they are passing over a side track through a playground of the children to a point beyond, and while they are returning from such point to the main line of the road, the children alighting from the trains at the limits of the playground both going and returning; and this custom is a continuous one, engaged in whenever the trains enter the playground,—it is the duty of the employees of a train, who are aware of this custom, to anticipate that when the train enters the playground the children will attempt to ride upon it and alight from it at the point where they have been accustomed to do so; and they are under a further duty, consequent upon the first, to take proper measures to prevent injury to such children." Ashworth v. Southern R. Co. 116 Ga. 635, 59 L. R. A. 592, 43 S. E. 36.

The opinion in the last-cited case refers to the following cases in which railroad companies were held under similar circumstances to the exercise of care to discover persons on their tracks: St. Louis S. W. R. Co. v. Abernathy, 69 L. R. A.

28 Tex. Civ. App. 613, 68 S. W. 539; Thompson v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 11 Tex. Civ. App. 307, 32 S. W. 191; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Popp, 96 Ky. 99, 27 S. W. 992; Tully v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 2 Penn. (Del.) 537, 82 Am. St. Rep. 425, 47 Atl. 1019.

Where a railroad trestle has been in constant and daily use as a walk-way for some years by a large number of persons in the vicinity, and such use is well known to the railroad company and its employees, it is the duty of the company to use reasonable care to discover, and not to injure, persons it may reasonably expect to be on its track at such point, whether they are trespassers or licensees, and although at each end of the trestle is placed, in conspicuous letters, the warning, "Caution. Keep off the bridge." Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Rodgers, 100 Va. 324, 41 S. E. 732; Cassida v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 14 Or. 551, 13 Atl. 438; Patton v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 89 Tenn. 370, 12 L. R. A. 184, 15 S. W. 919; Hooker v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 76 Wis. 542, 44 N. W. 1085.

A man of the age of seventy-seven years, and, feeble in mind, was found by one of defendant's employees walking between tracks in its tunnel. Upon the direction of the employee, he attempted to take a position close to the side of the tunnel, to get out of the way of an approaching car, and fell into a conduit. The employee then undertook to lift him out of his perilous position, but before he could do so the car came upon them, and, the man refusing to put his head down in the conduit while the car passed over him, he received injuries from which he died. There was evidence that, if the motorman had maintained a lookout ahead, he would have discovered the men in time to prevent the accident. It also appeared that, while defendant maintained the sign "No admittance" at the entrance of the tunnel, it was used by numbers of people daily to the knowledge of defendant's motormen. It was held that defendant was negligent in not discovering the perilous position of the men in time to stop the car. "Whenever the motorman or engineer, in the operation of its cars, before reaching a point along the line of its railway, has reasonable ground to expect or anticipate the presence of persons so near the railroad track as to endanger them, then the law, through its high regard for the preservation of human life, requires and demands such operatives to be on the alert, and to keep a lookout for the realization of the anticipation or expected presence of the person. . . . On the other hand, the operatives of a railway are entitled to the presumption that there is a clear track, and, while care and caution should be exercised in the operation of their trains, they are not responsible to trespassers for failure to be on the alert to discover them, in the absence of any reasonable grounds for the expectation or anticipation of their presence on the track." Fearons v. Kansas City Elev. R. Co. 180 Mo. 208, 79 S. W. 398.

b. Whether duty exists as to trespassers.

Upon the duty of railroad companies to maintain a lookout for persons generally, including trespassers, see notes, Duty as to persons exposed to danger on railroad tracks, 6 L. R. A. 243; Railroad company; duty owed to intruders and trespassers, 10 L. R. A. 139; Railroad company; duty to avoid injury to tres- passers on its premises, 18 L. R. A. 248; and Duty to maintain lookout on railroad train, 25 L. R. A. 287.

If a trespasser is injured through the proper and usual use of premises, when the owner is without knowledge of his presence, the fault would seem to be his own, for the owner has not been guilty of any wrong in such use of his own property. But does the owner of property owe any duty to a trespasser to use ordinary care to discover his presence, and the fact that because of some disability he is unconscious of his peril, or unable to escape from it, and on that account to endeavor to avoid the infliction of injury, when the ordinary use of his property is calculated to have such result? The conclusive answer to this question would seem to be, that the owner has the right to presume that persons will not be found where they have no business to be, and to rely upon that presumption until he has actual knowledge of their presence. The authorities which deny the existence of a duty to discover the presence of trespassers reach that conclusion from three different standpoints or premises, while another line of authorities affirms the existence of such duty:

First. The rule approved by the preponderance of authority, is that the duty of exercising ordinary care to avoid injury to another is due to trespassers as well as to other persons, but that such duty does not arise as to trespassers until their presence or disability is discovered, and hence no duty exists to discover their presence. Purcell v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 109 Iowa, 628, 77 Am. St. Rep. 557, 80 N. W. 682, 117 Iowa, 667, 91 N. W. 933; Thomas v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 93 Iowa, 248, 255, 61 N. W. 967; Western Maryland R. Co. v. Kehoe, 83 Md. 435, 35 Atl. 90; Omaha & R. Valley R. Co. v. Cook, 42 Neb. 577, 60 N. W. 899, Opinion on rehearing, 42 Neb. 905, 62 N. W. 235; Donahoe v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 175 Mo. 470, 74 S. W. 1002; Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Vaughan, 93 Ala. 209, 30 Am. St. Rep. 50, 9 So. 468; Pannell v. Nashville, F. & S. R. Co. 97 Ala. 298, 12 So. 236; Southern R. Co. v. Bush, 122 Ala. 470, 26 So. 168; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Hill (Ark.) 86 S. W. 303; Esrey v. Southern P. R. Co. 88 Cal. 399, 26 Pac. 211, 103 Cal. 541, 37 Pac. 500; Becker v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 110 Ky. 474, 53 L. R. A. 267, 96 Am. St. Rep. 459, 61 S. W. 997; Vanarsdall v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1666, 65 S. W. 858; Anderson v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 87 Wis. 195, 23 L. R. A. 203, 58 N. W. 79; New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. Kelley, 35 C. C. A. 671, 93 Fed. 745.

In Sheehan v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 22 C. C. A. 121, 46 U. S. App. 498, 76 Fed. 201, where recovery was denied to a boy injured by a railroad train running over him while his foot was caught in a cattle guard, it is held that, as to trespassers, the duty of a railroad company is not "pre-existing, but arises at the moment of discovery, and is negative in its nature,—a duty which is common to human conduct, to make all reasonable effort to avert injury to others from means which can be controlled. . . . It excludes all inquiry respecting the character of the roadbed, cattle guard, locomotive, brake appliances, . . . or of the speed or manner of running the train up to the moment of notice, because no breach of positive duty is involved. It is confined to the evidence relating to the discovery, by the engineer and fireman of the plaintiff's peril, and to the efforts then made to avert the injury, and, out of that, to ascertain whether, in any view which may justly be taken, it is shown that these men or the engineer, in disregard of the duty which then confronted them, neglected to employ with reasonable promptness the means at hand for stopping the train."

Since a railroad company is not bound to watch for trespassers on its tracks, it is not chargeable with negligence in not discovering a boy trespasser blinded with smoke and cinders from a passing train, although he might have been discovered in time to avoid a collision. Masser v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 68 Iowa, 602, 27 N. W. 776.

Nor for its failure to discover a girl, who has seated herself upon the track in the nighttime, and there fallen asleep, or been taken suddenly ill. Parish v. Western & A. R. Co. 102 Ga. 285, 40 L. R. A. 364, 29 S. E. 715.

The fact that a person walking on a railroad track is suddenly overcome by sickness, and then rendered helpless, does not impose upon the company any greater degree of care than it owes to persons in full vigor of mind and body, which is to guard against injury to them, after it is made aware of their peril. It is not bound to anticipate their presence on the track. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Thompson, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 815.

Neither does the fact that a trespasser on the track is deaf alter the rule, if those in charge of the train causing the injury are not aware of his disability. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cooper, 7 Ky. L. Rep. 102; Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Stroud, 64 Miss. 784, 2 So. 171; Carrier v. Missouri P. R. Co. 175 Mo. 470, 74 S. W. 1002.

Though the engineer of a train is reading instead of being on the lookout, and in consequence runs over a man asleep on the track, the railroad company is not liable, although if the usual lookout had been kept the engineer would have discovered the trespasser, and could easily have prevented the accident. Williams v. Southern P. R. Co. 72 Cal. 120, 13 Pac. 219.

In Newport News & M. Valley Co. v. Howe, 3 C. C. A. 121, 6 U. S. App. 172, 52 Fed. 362, it is said that an engineer who fails to keep a sharp lookout upon the track is not wanting in due care with respect to a man asleep upon the track, because of the presumption, upon which the engineer has a right to rely, that no one would be so grossly negligent in courting death.

Neither is there any reason for anticipating the presence of an infant, more than of an adult, lying on a railroad track, at a point where he has no right to be. Goodman v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 63 L. R. A. 657, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1086, 77 S. W. 174; McMullen v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 132 Pa. 107, 19 Am. St. Rep. 591, 19 Atl. 27.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Logsdon, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 457, 81 S. W. 637, it is held that elsewhere than in towns and cities, or where for any reason the presence of persons on the track should be anticipated, a railroad is under no more obligation to keep a lookout for a child trespasser than for an adult, and is bound to use all reasonable care to prevent injury only after the peril of either is discovered. And it is said: "If infants were made an exception to the rule, and railroad companies were required to keep a lookout for them at all places along their track, on account of their helplessness, the same principle would have to be applied to idiots, lunatics, epileptics, the deaf, the blind, and the like. This would destroy the rule and make it inconsistent with itself, for, if the presence of no persons is to be looked for on the track, the presence of persons infirm or unable to take care of themselves is not to be anticipated, and the defendant cannot be required to guard against a danger which is not to be anticipated by a person of ordinary prudence."

The fact that a man sixty years of age, decrepit, hard of hearing, and with defective sight, might have been discovered walking on a railroad trestle in time for the company's employees to stop the train which ran him down, if a proper lookout had been maintained, will not render the company liable, if the injured party was not in fact seen until too late to avoid injury. Maloy v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 84 Mo. 270.

Neither is the company liable for an error of judgment on the part of the engineer, in failing to identify an object on the track as a sleeping man until it is too late to stop the train. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. Kelly, 35 C. C. A. 571, 93 Fed. 745; Murch v. Western N. Y. & P. R. Co. 78 Hun, 601, 29 N. Y. Supp. 490.

Failure to stop a train upon first sight of an object, which the engineer then thought to be something other than a human being, but which, at length, was discovered to be a child, will not fix the liability of the railroad company. "The test of responsibility is, did the striking of the child by the train occur after the engineer had seen,—not might or ought to have seen,—that is, discerned or distinguished, the girl. Until the girl had been seen—discerned to be a human being—the engineer was under no obligation to the trespasser to check or stop his train, whatever may have been his obligation to the passengers who were being hauled by him." Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. v. Williams, 69 Miss. 640, 12 So. 957.

In an action for injuries received by a man who negligently sat down between two cross-ties of a railroad track, and went to sleep, with his head resting on his hand, and inclined toward the rail nearest him, evidence is not admissible to show that the track at the place of the accident, and for a long distance on either side of such place, is level and straight, so that an object on it no larger than a man's hat may be seen for 400 or 500 yards. Denman v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 26 Minn. 357, 4 N. W. 605.

What appears to be a lucid and accurate statement of a railroad company's relation to trespassers upon its tracks is found in Seaboard & R. R. Co. v. Joyner, 92 Va. 354, 23 S. E. 773, where a man was lying on the track with his head in the hollow of his arm; and it is said that a railroad company has the exclusive right to the uninterrupted enjoyment of its roadbed, track, and other property. It owes no special duty to mere trespassers; but, when it is said that it owes to trespassers "only the duty of ordinary care, it is intended merely to say that trespassers are not entitled to that provident circumspection which, as far as possible, foresees and forestalls danger. That high degree of duty is owed to passengers only,—but, where the danger of the trespasser is discovered, it then becomes the duty of the railroad company to avoid the infliction of injury, without regard to the fact that the trespasser was himself guilty of contributory negligence. It is then incumbent upon the company to do all that can be done, consistently with its higher duty to others, to save the trespasser from the consequences of his own improper act." This statement of the law is approved in Tucker v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 92 Va. 549, 24 S. E. 229; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Dunnaway, 93 Va. 29, 38, 24 S. E. 698.

In Blankenship v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 94 Va. 449, 457, 27 S. E. 20, the rule making railroad companies liable for injury to a trespasser after his peril was discovered, "or by ordinary care and caution might have been discovered," which is supported by some authorities, is construed to mean, not that it is the duty of a railroad company to keep a lookout for trespassers, but that, where it has such notice or belief that someone may be in danger as ought to put a prudent man on the alert, it then becomes the duty of the company to be on the lookout. This case may be said, therefore, to overrule Tyler v. Sites, 88 Va. 470, 13 S. E. 978, 90 Va. 539, 19 S. E. 174, where it is said, without qualification, that "a railroad company is bound to keep a reasonable lookout for trespassers upon its track."

The distinction made in the Blankenship Case is important, though it is difficult to discover its application under the circumstances there presented. It is this,—that, while a railroad company does not owe to a trespasser the duty to discover his presence upon the track, yet, where the attention of those operating a train is arrested by seeing an indistinguishable object on the track, which may be a human being, it then becomes their duty to discover what that object is, and whether, because of some disability, if a human being, it will be necessary to stop the train to avoid injury. The point is not always so clearly made, but the principle finds general recognition in the decisions, which, in the language of Lord Denman in Colchester v. Brooke, 7 Q. B. 377, is that everyone in the conduct of that which may be harmful to others, if misconducted, is bound to use due care and skill, even as to a wrongdoer. See in support of the rule, cases cited under div. VI., b, supra, and div. VII., c, infra.

And further, if the disabled trespasser is in a place where the presence of persons may be reasonably expected, and by the exercise of ordinary care he might be discovered, and the infliction of injury avoided, then the failure to discover him is negligence. Fearons v. Kansas City Elev. R. Co. 180 Mo. 208, 79 S. W. 304. And see cases cited under the last preceding division of this note.

Second. The duty to discover a trespasser's disability is likewise denied in those jurisdictions which repudiate the doctrine that such care is due to one who has exposed himself to the risk of injury. In such jurisdictions the only duty owing a trespasser is to refrain from wilful or wanton injury. And this is true whether he happens to be suffering from some disability or not.

As to trespassers, the liability of a railroad company is measured by the conduct of its employees after they become aware of their presence upon the track. That liability, however, after such knowledge, cannot be fixed by the negligence of such employees, and this for the reason that, as to such negligence, the contributory negligence of appellee (trespasser) would defeat his right of recovery. No liability can arise, therefore, for the failure of a railroad company to discover a trespasser upon its right of way, though he is suffering from some disability. Palmer v. Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. 112 Ind. 250, 254, 14 N. E. 70.

A trespasser upon a switch track laid through a narrow archway in a mill, from which there is no means of escape from a train running thereon, cannot recover for injuries from collision with a train run through the arch at an excessive speed, although persons are in the habit of passing through the arch, since the railroad company is not required to anticipate their presence. Parker v. Pennsylvania Co. 134 Ind. 673, 23 L. R. A. 552, 34 N. E. 504.

A railroad company owes no duty to discover a trespasser who has his foot caught in its track, and it cannot be held liable for running over him in ignorance of his situation. It has the right to run its trains without reference to such intrusion, and, even after the trespasser is seen upon the track by those in charge of a train, they may act upon the presumption that he will step aside in time to avoid a collision, unless it is also obvious that, owing to his condition or circumstances over which he has no control, he cannot extricate himself from the danger which menaces him. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Monday, 49 Ark. 257, 4 S. W. 782; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Phillips, 112 Ind. 59, 2 Am. St. Rep. 155, 13 N. E. 132.

Where it appears that the person injured by a railroad train was lying upon the track, the burden is upon the plaintiff, and not upon the defendant, to prove that the presence of the deceased might have been discovered in time to avoid injury, and that the railroad company willfully or recklessly killed him. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Townsend, 69 Ark. 380, 63 S. W. 994; Parish v. Western & A. R. Co. 102 Ga. 285, 40 L. R. A. 364, 29 S. E. 715.

Third. Another line of authorities recognizes the rule that the previous negligence of a party, exposing him to danger, is not an excuse for an injury through another's negligence, if by the exercise of ordinary care the injury might have been avoided, but holds that trespassers are not within the rule, because a party who infringes upon the rights of others absolves them from using ordinary care and diligence toward him. Hence, it is held, with the cases cited above, that the only duty owing a trespasser is to refrain from wilful or wanton injury. As in the cases above cited, the rule is applied without regard to the existence of any disability. Mason v. Missouri P. R. Co. 27 Kan. 83, 41 Am. Rep. 405; Kansas P. R. Co. v. Whipple, 39 Kan. 531, 18 Pac. 730; Morrissey v. Eastern R. Co. 126 Mass. 377, 30 Am. Rep. 686; Grissold v. Boston & M. R. Co. 183 Mass. 434, 67 N. E. 354; Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Cline, 111 Ill. App. 416; Johnson v. Truesdale, 46 Minn. 345, 48 N. W. 1136; Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Hummell, 44 Pa. 375, 84 Am. Dec. 457; Cauley v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. 95 Pa. 398, 40 Am. Rep. 664; 60 L. R. A.

Brague v. Northern C. R. Co. 192 Pa. 242, 43 Atl. 987; Smalley v. Southern R. Co. 57 S. C. 243, 35 S. E. 489.

A child seven years of age, asleep upon a railroad track, being a trespasser, the engineer's duty is measured and covered by his abstention from wilful or wanton negligence. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. v. Williams, 69 Miss 631, 12 So. 957.

This seems formerly to have been the rule in New York. For instance, in Tonawanda R. Co. v. Munger, 5 Denio, 255, 49 Am. Dec. 239, 4 N. Y. 349, 53 Am. Dec. 384, which was an action for killing an animal trespassing on defendant's track, it is said that "a man is under no obligation to be cautious and circumspect toward a wrongdoer." But it is further said that "injuries inflicted by design are not thus to be excused. A wrongdoer is not necessarily an outlaw, but may justly complain of wanton and malicious mischief."

A boy injured while lying on his back on a railroad track, between two coal cars, with his legs over one rail, cannot recover damages from the railroad company where his presence was not known until after the injury. McMullen v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 132 Pa. 107, 19 Am. St. Rep. 591, 19 Atl. 27.

In Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Cline, 111 Ill. App. 416, it is held that, although one is compelled to leave the highway in order to get around a freight train standing at the crossing, he is a trespasser; and, since the railroad company does not owe him the duty of ordinary care, it is not liable for backing a train upon him without a lookout, where his foot is caught in the track.

A strong dissent from the doctrine of the foregoing cases is pronounced by Chief Justice Agnew, though speaking for the court, in a case where a trespassing child was killed by a train running through a populous district at an excessive speed. He says: "Does no duty rest upon a railroad company because it is running upon its own track, unfenced and unguarded? Surely we must not disregard the habits, character, and condition of a people accustomed to run thoughtlessly and heedlessly into danger. We must take into account the feebleness of age and helpless infancy, the infirmity of mind and body of many living on a railroad track, their want of reflection and unthinking heedlessness, their want of apprehension of danger, and entire absence of injury they suppose they do to the hard, rough track of a railroad; the many motives they have to do an act which, though a trespass, is seemingly to them no cause of complaint. Surely the courts have not lost their power to declare what is ordinary prudence and care in the use of its track by a railroad company merely because the track is its own, and no one may rightfully trespass there. The circumstances which qualify this right must be taken into account and submitted to a jury under proper instructions." This authority, it will be seen, imposes upon railroad companies the reasonable duty of exercising ordinary care, even as to trespassers, in places where people are likely to be present. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Lewis, 79 Pa. 33.

Fourth. In Maryland, North Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and West Virginia the frequency with which railroad tracks are used as a highway, and the consequent reasonableness for expecting the presence of persons in such places, seem to have led the courts of those states to hold that if, in the performance of the general duty of railroad companies to keep a vigilant lookout for animals or other obstacles upon their tracks, a trespasser may be discovered in time to avoid injury, then the failure so to discover him is negligence.

A man goes upon a railroad track at a time and place when no danger is nigh and while there, by some accident or providential cause, becomes insensible, and so remains perhaps, for hours, until the time for a train comes around. "Although he originally goes on the track wrongfully, it is under circumstances threatening no direct injury, nor, being on the track, does he do anything 'positive or negative to contribute to the immediate injury.' . . . If the engineer on the approaching train keeps that lookout which is required of him at all times, not only to secure the safety of the train, but to avoid injury to any animal or person on the track, this person lying there in open view must be discovered. Not to discover him is, under the circumstances, negligence, and that negligence is the proximate cause of the injury; whilst the negligence of the party in going on the track is only a remote cause." Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Symptkins, 54 Tex. 620, 38 Am. Rep. 632.

In Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Harvin (Tex. Civ. App.) 54 S. W. 629, where a man hard of hearing, who was walking on a railroad track, was run down by a train while the engineer and fireman were looking backward instead of forward, the court approved an instruction to the jury, "that it is the duty of the employees of a railway company operating its train to use reasonable care to discover and to avoid injuring persons who may be upon its track, the degree of such care being such as a person of ordinary prudence and caution would commonly exercise under like circumstances, and varying as the known probability of danger may vary along the different portions of the route over which trains are run; and a failure to use such care by its employees is negligence."

In later decisions the Texas courts have refused to extend the rule of the foregoing cases to persons going to sleep upon a railroad track, but just why the duty should be imposed as to one class of trespassers, and not to another, is not apparent. St. Louis S. W. R. Co. v. Shiflet, 94 Tex. 131, 53 S. W. 945; Smith v. International & G. N. R. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 78 S. W. 556.

Railroad companies being required to keep a lookout for live stock, and to use ordinary care to prevent injury to it, certainly the same care should be required so far as children, deaf and other disabled persons are concerned, if not as to others. While public interest and necessity demand that a railroad company have sole possession of its track, yet, since people live and move along the route, and do go upon the track, and children, in their thoughtlessness and indiscretion, will go upon it, and stock will wander upon it, sheer necessity demands that those in charge of a train shall, by keeping a reasonable lookout, use ordinary care to discover animals and persons on the track, to save both them and passengers from injury. Gunn v. Ohio River R. Co. 42 W. Va. 676, 36 L. R. A. 575, 26 S. E. 546.

Under a statute of Tennessee requiring railroad companies to keep a constant and vigilant lookout for objects on their tracks, the failure to discover and give warning to a sleeping boy upon the track, where he could have been seen for $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile distant, renders the railroad company liable for his injuries. East Tennessee & G. R. Co. v. St. John, 5 Sneed, 524, 73 Am. Dec. 149.

And, even under circumstances not within the statute, it is held, in Patton v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 89 Tenn. 370, 12 L. R. A. 184, 15 S. W. 919, that where a person walking on a trestle was killed by being run down by a detached section of a freight train, the railroad company was negligent in not having some one on the lookout on the detached cars. "Where cars are being moved by gravitation, and therefore with comparatively little noise, we think the duty quite clear that a railway company should have someone on the lookout for the purpose of warning persons on the track. . . . At crossings and points where, by license, express or implied, the track is used as a walk way, the more imperative the duty. But the duty is not altogether relaxed by the fact that this injury probably occurred at a point where the public had no rights."

The adoption of the above rule in North Carolina has been in repudiation of the rule of the earlier cases in that state. In Herring v. Wilmington & R. R. Co. 32 N. C. (10 Ired. L.) 402, 51 Am. Dec. 395, it appeared that the engineer of a railroad train might have seen two little negroes lying on the track asleep at a distance of from 200 yards to $\frac{1}{2}$ mile, but did not actually discover them until within 25 or 30 yards of the place where they were lying, when it was too late to stop the train before running over them. It was held that the railroad company was not liable for the neglect to keep a lookout, whereby the children might have been discovered; nor was it responsible for the engineer's failure to use the appliances at his command to stop the train until he actually saw the children asleep on the track. And in Manly v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 74 N. C. 655, it is held that running a train over a child of ten years, asleep upon the track, is not negligence, where the child's presence was not discovered by the engineer until 150 feet distant, and he then supposed it to be a hog, and blew the whistle, but, upon discovering it was a human being, reversed the engine, and endeavored to stop the train, but without avail.

But in Deans v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 107 N. C. 686, 22 Am. St. Rep. 902, 12 S. E. 77, the court repudiates the rule of the above cases, and holds that it is the duty of an engineer to keep a careful lookout along the track to discover obstructions, whether at a crossing or elsewhere, and that if thereby the engineer, in the exercise of due diligence, might have discovered a drunken man lying apparently helpless upon the track, in time to stop the train before it reached him, and failed, through negligence, to make such discovery the railroad company was liable for the damage sustained.

The doctrine of the case last cited is reaffirmed in Pickett v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 117 N. C. 616, 30 L. R. A. 257, 53 Am. St. Rep. 611, 23 S. E. 264, which directly raises the question whether a railroad company is liable for the death of a man who deliberately lies down upon its track, and either carelessly or intentionally falls asleep there, unless the engineer of the train running over him actually sees him lying there in time to stop the train by the reasonable use of appliances at his command. In a well-considered opinion, the court expressly repudiates the doctrine that the duty of a railroad company to keep a vigilant lookout before its trains does not exist as to trespassers on its track, and holds that if a person thus asleep is injured through the failure to maintain such lookout, when otherwise he could have been discovered, and the catastrophe avoided, the railroad company is liable. The position of the court is well stated in the following language of the opinion: "When this court declared it the duty of an engineer to exercise reasonable care in looking out for animals on the track, it became equally a duty as to all those classes of persons who, if actually seen by him, would be entitled to demand that he use all the means at his command to avert injury to them. . . . As we hold that the duty on the part of the engineer of watchfulness to protect life is an ever-present one, attending him everywhere, and extending to the people in the remote country as well as in the towns, it necessarily follows that the opportunities that grow out of duty performed are coextensive with the duty prescribed, and may arise wherever it exists. We are of opinion that when, by the exercise of ordinary care, an engineer can see that a human being is lying apparently helpless, from any cause, on the track in front of his engine, in time to stop the train by the use of the appliances at his command, and without peril to the safety of persons on the train, the company is liable for any injury resulting from his failure to perform his duty." To the same effect are Smith v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. 114 N. C. 755, 25 L. R. A. 287, 19 S. E. 863, 923; Norwood v. Raleigh & G. R. Co. 111 N. C. 240, 16 S. E. 4; Upton v. South Carolina & G. Extension R. Co. 128 N. C. 173, 38 S. E. 736; Carter v. Southern R. Co. 135 N. C. 498, 47 S. E. 614.

An idiot may recover for injuries sustained from being run over by a railroad train, if the engineer saw him, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have seen him, and had actual knowledge, or reasonable ground for the belief, that, on account of some mental or physical infirmity, he could not assume that the idiot would step off the track in time to avoid injury. Daily v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 106 N. C. 301, 11 S. E. 320.

In Maryland, likewise, the decisions upon the question are conflicting. In Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. State, 33 Md. 542, it is held that a public notice at the entrance of a railroad viaduct, for persons to keep off, does not relieve the railroad company from the duty to exercise ordinary care to keep a lookout from its trains, and to give the usual warning to one trespassing on the track, and about to enter the viaduct. But in Western Maryland R. Co. v. Kehoe, 83 Md. 434, 452, 35 Atl. 90, it is said that, "until the employees are made aware of the peril arising from an act of negligence on the part of the plaintiff, they are under no obligation to assume that he will be negligent, or will be in a dangerous place which he has no right to occupy; and consequently they owe him no duty to anticipate that he will be where he ought not to be, or to guard in advance against the possible, or even probable, results of his unknown wrongful occupancy of the tracks." Therefore a railroad company is not negligent in not discovering a person lying beyond the limits of the highway, with his leg across a rail of its track, whither he has been thrown from his buggy, as a result of his reckless driving. Finally, in Baltimore Consol. R. Co. v. Armstrong, 92 Md. 554, 54 L. R. A. 424, 48 Atl. 1047, it is said: "The difference between the modification of the general principle recognized as proper in Maryland C. R. Co. v. Neubaur, 62 Md. 391, and that sanctioned by this court in the recent cases, is simply that in the former case the defendant was held liable if he could, by the exercise of reasonable care after he became aware of the plaintiff's peril, have averted the accident, and in the latter cases he was held liable if he could have prevented it after he became, or ought to have become, aware of the peril. There is no difference in principle between these two forms of instruction to the jury, for it cannot be seriously contended that when the defendant is in a position from which he ought to see, or by the exercise of reasonable care could see, the plaintiff's peril, he may avert his face or close his eyes and not see it, and then escape liability for an injury resulting from such conduct on his part."

c. What is sufficient notice of peril or disability.

The notice which imposes the duty of using precautionary means to avoid injury to a person in peril need not amount to positive knowledge. The duty may arise before the presence of the person is discovered, where there are circumstances indicating the probability of danger to human life, such as would induce action by a person of ordinary prudence. It has been so held where a locomotive engineer sees persons running toward the track, and signaling him to stop, though a person on the track is not seen by him. Upon the same principle, it would seem that, when a person is seen in a place where he is liable to be injured by another's action, ordinary care requires that a watch be kept of his movements; and if thereby it becomes apparent that the person is under some disability, which prevents him caring for his own safety, due effort must be made to avoid injury. And the same is true where an object in the path of danger is discovered, but doubt exists as to whether it is animate or inanimate. But, as to the sufficiency of the notice in such cases to require a resort to precautionary measures, the authorities are not agreed, even in those jurisdictions imposing the duty of ordinary care to avoid the consequences of another's negligence. And no such obligation exists, of course, toward trespassers, in those states which hold that the only duty owing such persons is not wilful or wantonly to injure them. In any event the notice must be in time to allow a resort to preventive effort.

When persons in charge of a railroad train discover the peril of a person on the track, "or are in a position where they ought to have discovered it,—a position in which the circumstances, movements, or condition of the person injured would manifest to a vigilant observer that such person is unaware of his peril, or, if aware of it, is unable to extricate himself,—a culpable omission to use the means in hand to prevent an accident, when a prompt resort thereto might have prevented it, without endangering the freight or passengers being transported on the train, will be regarded as reckless or intentional negligence. On the other hand, the rule does not apply where the manifestation of the peril and the catastrophe are so close in point of time as to leave no room for preventive effort." Fraser v. South & North Ala. R. Co. 81 Ala. 185, 60 Am. Rep. 145, 1 So. 85; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Coleman, 86 Ky. 556, 6 S. W. 438, 8 S. W. 875; Robbins v. Springfield Street R. Co. 165 Mass. 30, 42 N. E. 334.

In an action against a railroad company for running over a deaf-mute on its track, the question is not whether the man was bereft of any of his faculties, but whether there was enough in his appearance to indicate any such infirmity on his part to the engineer of the train. Tyler v. Sites, 90 Va. 539, 19 S. E. 174.

If there is anything disclosed in the conduct or appearance of a person on a railroad track which raises a suspicion that he is deaf, or blind, or helpless, then the obligation on the part of the trainmen immediately arises to use all necessary and proper care to avoid injuring him, and to stop the train if necessary. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Murphy, 17 Ohio C. C. 223; Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Stroud, 64 Miss. 784, 2 So. 171; Omaha & R. Valley R. Co. v. Cook, 42 Neb. 577, 60 N. W. 899.

"It makes no difference how short an interval occurs between the negligent act of the plaintiff, in going upon the trestle and that of the defendant, if the latter has time to discover the danger and avert it by the exercise of ordinary care." Clark v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 109 N. C. 430, 14 L. R. A. 749, 14 S. E. 43; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Weisen, 65 Tex. 443.

The moment that an aged man is seen upon a railroad trestle over 8 feet in height his peril is manifest and imminent, a warning that he is taking no heed for his own safety, and the railroad employees in charge of a train are required to exercise reasonable care to avoid a collision. They are not permitted to speculate whether he will jump from the bridge, or lie down, or in some other way get out of harm's way. Purcell v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 109 Iowa, 628, 77 Am. St. Rep. 557, 80 N. W. 682, 117 Iowa, 687, 91 N. W. 933; Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Vaughan, 93 Ala. 209, 30 Am. St. Rep. 50, 9 So. 468.

An engineer's discovery of a woman running toward a train and waving her hands excitedly, at a distance of 1,000 feet ahead, after having previously seen children playing near the track, is sufficient notice that the life of a human being is in danger, and that the train should be stopped, or its speed materially checked, although the presence of a child actually on the track is not discovered until too late to avoid injury. Donahoe v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 83 Mo. 543.

Where an engineer sees an object upon the track in sufficient time to stop the train, but mistakes it for an abandoned cross-tie, and disregards the signals of two men running on either side of the track toward the engine, and waving their hats, he not only fails to exercise reasonable care, but is guilty of reckless negligence, in not acting promptly upon the evidences of danger forced upon his attention, which a reasonably prudent man would have acted upon. Seaboard & R. R. Co. v. Joyner, 92 Va. 354, 23 S. E. 773.

Whether an outcry made by several persons upon a boy getting his foot caught in a railroad track at a crossing, and a signal given to the engineer to stop, are sufficient to give notice of the danger, and to render the railroad company negligent in not stopping the cars in time to avoid injury, is a question for the jury. Goodrich v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 103 Iowa, 412, 72 N. W. 653.

"The true test of the [locomotive] engineer's duty is involved in the question whether he has reasonable ground to believe, with all the knowledge of the surroundings which due diligence requires of him, that the life of a fellow man is in peril, and that the danger to his person can only be averted by stopping or reducing the speed of the train. When an engineer sees a man persistently putting himself in peril on a trestle or bridge, so that he can no more get off the track than one who is lying on it in an apparent stupor, except by exposing himself to danger, why is it not reasonable in him to act instantly on the natural inference that one whose conduct is so extraordinary is either drunk or bereft of reason from sudden terror?" Clark v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 109 N. C. 430, 445, 14 L. R. A. 749, 14 S. E. 43.

Where the motorman of a street car sees a boy approaching the track with the apparent intention of crossing in front of the car, and observes that the boy is unconscious of the approach of the car, notwithstanding his efforts to attract his attention, and that it is likely to hit him, it is not enough that he uses every effort to prevent injury when the boy gets upon the track, and he realizes that danger is imminent, but he should act as soon as he sees that an injury is probable, although not aware that the boy is deaf. When it is seen that a person in such situation pays no attention to the warnings given, ordinary care requires that the speed of the car be checked. Galveston City R. Co. v. Hanna (Tex. Civ. App.) 79 S. W. 639; Slonker v. Great Northern R. Co. 76 Minn. 806, 79 N. W. 168.

But in Stubenau v. Atlantic Ave. R. Co. 155 N. Y. 511, 63 Am. St. Rep. 698, 50 N. E. 277, it is held that the motorman of a street car was not negligent in not checking the speed of his car upon seeing little girls near the track start to run across it, nor until one of them fell before the car, where they had time to get across, if they had not fallen. To the same effect is Fenton v. Second Ave. R. Co. 126 N. Y. 625, 26 N. E. 967.

And in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Black, 89 Ala. 313, 8 So. 246, the engineer of a train discovered a man walking upon the track half a mile distant, but no signal was given until within about 200 yards, when the bell was rung, and within 100 yards the whistle was sounded. It then being discovered that the man did not get off the track, nor look around, the engineer concluded something must be the matter with him, and endeavored to stop the train, but it was too late to avoid a collision. It was held that the railroad company's liability dated not from the time the intestate was discovered upon the track, but from the time its employees learned he was ignorant of the approaching train. "If, after decedent's ignorance of his peril was brought to their knowledge, actual knowledge, for they owed the intestate no duty to find it out, they failed to apply all the instrumentalities at their command to stop the train and save him, then, and only in that event, is plaintiff entitled to a verdict." This case apparently conflicts to some extent with that of Frazer v. South & North Ala. R. Co. 81 Ala. 185, 60 Am. Rep. 145, 1 So. 85.

When persons in charge of a railroad train discover an object upon the track which there is reason to believe may be a human being, what is their duty?

A railroad company is liable for injuries sustained from running over a child six or seven years of age, who was lying on the railway track asleep, where the engineer and fireman saw him in time to stop the train, but neglected to do so because they supposed him to be a bunch of weeds. The evidence in this case showed that plaintiff could have been seen and recognized as a boy on the track at a distance of from 300 to 350 yards. Meeks v. Southern P. R. Co. 56 Cal. 513, 38 Am. Rep. 67.

A man lying insensible upon a railroad track, near a crossing, was discovered by those in charge of an approaching train at a distance of 400 yards, but thought to be an inanimate object. When, however, within 125 or 150 yards, it became apparent that the object was a man, the engineer did all that could be done to stop the train, but without avail. If the speed of the train had been checked, and the brakes put on at the "blow post," as a statute of the state required, the train could have been stopped in time to avoid the injury. It was held that, under these circumstances, it was a question for the jury as to when the engineer became aware, or might, by proper diligence, have become aware, that the object on the track was a man. Hankerson v. Southwestern R. Co. 59 Ga. 593, 61 Ga. 114, 72 Ga. 182.

Where a child upon a railroad track was seen by those in charge of a train in time to stop and save the child's life, but the engineer and fireman mistook it for an inanimate object, and debated what it really was until it was too late, and by exercising ordinary skill and caution they could have discovered the object to be a child, and have stopped the train in time to avoid an injury, the railroad company was held liable for the result. Isabel v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 60 Mo. 475.

If a locomotive engineer has sufficient notice or belief to put a prudent man on the alert, and he does not take such precautions as a prudent man would take under similar notice or belief, he is guilty of negligence. But the fact that the engineer sees what he supposes to be an inanimate object lying in the ditch at the side of the track is not alone sufficient to impose upon him the duty of taking steps to stop his train. Seaboard & R. R. Co. v. Joyner, 92 Va. 354, 365, 23 S. E. 773; Tucker v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 92 Va. 540, 24 S. E. 229; Murch v. Western N. Y. & P. R. Co. 78 Hun, 601, 29 N. Y. Supp. 490.

In Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Dunnaway, 93 Va. 29, 24 S. E. 698, a sleeping boy on the railroad right of way, with his head upon the track, was seen by an engineer in time to stop his train, but was thought to be a dog, and no signals were given, nor any attempt made to stop the train, until within 160 feet of him, when his identity was discovered, but it was then too late to prevent injury. It was held that, under the rule that the duty of a railroad company to avoid infliction of injury to a trespasser arises only "when the danger of the trespasser is discovered, or by ordinary care

As to trespassers, to whom a railroad company does not owe the duty of keeping a lookout, negligence cannot be predicated upon an engineer's error of judgment in taking a sleeping man upon the track, seen $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile distant, to be a coat, until within 150 feet of the object, when it is too late to stop the train. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. Kelly, 35 C. C. A. 571, 93 Fed. 745. And see Murch v. Western N. Y. & P. R. Co. 78 Hun, 601, 29 N. Y. Supp. 490.

When an object on a railroad track is thought by the engineer of a train to be a dog or a bundle, he is not under obligation to stop his train to make sure what the object is; and if he fails to identify the object as a child until too late to stop the train, the railroad company is not liable for the result. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. v. Williams, 69 Miss. 631, 12 So. 957.

VIII. Presumptions in absence of knowledge of disability.

a. Right to presume person in peril will help himself.

One has a right to presume, in the absence of knowledge to the contrary, that a person in peril is in the full possession of his faculties, and that, acting upon the natural instinct of self-preservation, he will get out of harm's way when he becomes conscious of the danger impending. To warrant such presumption, however, the circumstances must give support to the belief that such person's situation is known to him, and that he is able to extricate himself from his perilous position. Hence, there arise certain limitations upon the exercise of this presumption, which are considered in the next succeeding division of this note.

"In the absence of knowledge to the contrary, or some fact which ought to arouse suspicion that this is not true, employees operating a railway train may assume that a man seen at a public crossing, or elsewhere on the track, is in possession of all his senses, and that care for his own safety will induce him to use them, and to act on the warnings conveyed through them." International & G. N. R. Co. v. Garcia, 75 Tex. 589, 13 S. W. 223; Artus v. Missouri P. R. Co. 73 Tex. 191, 11 S. W. 177; Frazer v. South & North Ala. R. Co. 81 Ala. 185, 60 Am. Rep. 145, 1 So. 85; Southern R. Co. v. Bush, 122 Ala. 470, 26 So. 168; Dally v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 106 N. C. 301, 11 S. E. 320; Deans v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 107 N. C. 686, 22 Am. St. Rep. 902, 12 S. E. 77; Clark v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 109 N. C. 430, 143, 14 L. R. A. 740, 14 S. E. 43; Syme v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 113 N. C. 558, 18 S. E. 114; Maloy v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 84 Mo. 270; Candee v. Kansas City & I. Rapid Transit R. Co. 130 Mo. 142, 31 S. W. 1029; Jackson v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 157 Mo. 621, 645, 80 Am. St. Rep. 650, 58 S. W. 32; Louisville & N. K. Co. v. Cooper (Ky.) 6 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 5; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Hocker, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1398, 55 S. W. 438; Florida C. & P. R. Co. v. Williams, 37 Fla. 406, 20 So. 558; Green v. Southern P. Co. 122 Cal. 563, 55 Pac. 577; Murch v. Western N. Y. & P. R. Co. 78 Hun, 601, 29 N. Y. Supp. 490; Sims v. Macon & W. R. Co. 28 Ga. 93; Cogswell v. Oregon & C. R. Co. 6 Or. 417; Campbell v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 55 Kan. 536, 40 Pac. 997; Omaha & R. Valley R. Co. v. Cook, 42 Neb. 577, 905, 60 N. W. 899; Raines v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 39 W. Va. 50, 24 L. R. A. 226, 19 S. E. 565; Smalley v. Southern R. Co. 57 S. C. 243, 254, 35 S. E. 489; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hill (Tex. Civ. App.) 58 S. W. 255; Bump v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 38 App. Div. 60, 55 N. Y. Supp. 962; Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Miller, 149 Ind. 490, 49 N. E. 445; Ullrich v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 151 Ind. 358, 51 N. E. 95.

It is only when those in charge of a railroad train have reasonable ground to believe that a person on the track will not get off in time to avoid injury to himself, that they are bound to stop the train. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hill (Tex. Civ. App.) 58 S. W. 255; Chamberlain v. Missouri P. R. Co. 133 Mo. 587, 33 S. W. 437, 34 S. W. 842; Teel v. Ohio River R. Co. 49 W. Va. 85, 38 S. E. 518.

"If, however, the person on the track be deaf, and unable to hear the noise of the train, he cannot be expected to provide for his own safety so promptly and certainly as one in full possession of all his senses. This fact should, of course, make him the more careful to avoid being placed in a situation likely to render him liable to an injury from which others would be exempt. But what are the duties and responsibilities of the railroad company in such a case? If unaware of the person's infirmity, they cannot be expected to treat him differently from other like trespassers upon their track. They may presume that he will step off in time to prevent being struck by the train, and they would be required to give him only such warning as would reasonably alarm his fears and cause him to leave the track. But if the employees in charge of the train know that the party is deaf, and not able to hear the ordinary noise of the train, their duty becomes entirely different." International & G. N. R. Co. v. Smith, 62 Tex. 254; Tyler v. Sites, 88 Va. 470, 13 S. E. 978; Johnson v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 91 Ky. 651, 25 S. W. 754.

In Texas & P. R. Co. v. Roberts, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 111, 20 S. W. 960, the correctness of an instruction to the jury, that train operatives, upon ringing the bell and sounding the whistle, may presume that a person on the track will leave it in time to escape injury, is doubted; and it is said, whether such presumption is warranted depends upon the facts of each particular case.

If railroad employees in charge of a train see a man on the track at a distance sufficient to enable him to get out of the way before the train reaches him, and are not aware that he is deaf or insane, or from some other cause insensible of the danger, or unable to get out of the way, they have a right to presume that he will act on the motive of self-preservation, and get out of the way, and to go on without checking the speed of the train until they see he is not likely to get out of the way, when it would become their duty to give extra alarm by bell or whistle, and, if that is not heeded, then, as a last resort, to check its speed, or stop the train, if possible, in time to avoid disaster. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Wilkerson, 46 Ark. 513; Sibley v. Ratliffe, 50 Ark. 477, 8 S. W. 686.

In Omaha & R. Valley R. Co. v. Cook, 42 Neb. 905, 62 N. W. 235, affirming on rehearing 42 Neb. 577, 60 N. W. 899, it is said that it is not "in every case" the duty of a locomotive engineer to stop his train, or even to lessen its speed, on the discovery of a trespasser upon the track; and the court approves the following rule from Wharton on Negligence, § 389a: "An engineer who sees before him on the track a person apparently capable of taking care of himself has a right to presume that such person, on due notice, will leave the track if there be opportunity to do so; and the engineer will not in such cases be chargeable with negligence if, in consequence of such person not leaving the track, the train cannot be checked in time to avoid striking him. But it is otherwise with persons apparently not capable of taking care of themselves, such as very young children and persons lying helpless on the track."

Where a man sleeping on a railroad track, upon being aroused by the track walker, and warned of an approaching train, got partly up, leaned on his elbow, and assented to the suggestion in such a way as to indicate he understood the warning, and gave no appearance of being intoxicated or otherwise disabled, the track walker had the right to presume that he would take such measures to protect himself from injury as would be taken by any reasonable person under like circumstances. Virginia Midland R. Co. v. Boswell, 82 Va. 932, 7 S. E. 383.

Acting upon such presumption, a locomotive engineer is not required to check the speed of his train, merely because an apparently and presumably reasonable human being, though in fact deaf, is crossing at a point far enough in his front to enable him to stop it, if he chooses, before reaching such person. Dally v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 106 N. C. 301, 11 S. E. 320; Birmingham R. & Electric Co. v. Bowers, 110 Ala. 328, 20 So. 345; Johnson v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 91 Ky. 651, 25 S. W. 754.

A street car driver has the right to presume that a woman seen approaching the track, and not known by him to be deaf, will exercise her senses, and stop in time to avoid accident. Schulte v. New Orleans City & L. R. Co. 44 La. Ann. 509, 10 So. 811.

And the operators of a hand car and a flag-man at a crossing are not negligent in assuming that a person approaching the crossing is able to hear a warning shouted from the car, in the absence of knowledge of his deafness. Pliskowski v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. 121 Mich. 498, 80 Am. St. Rep. 518, 80 N. W. 241.

In Robbins v. Springfield Street R. Co. 165 Mass. 30, 42 N. E. 334, which was an action for injuries sustained by a man of nearly eighty years, partially deaf, and blind in one eye, through a street car running into his horse and wagon while he was attempting to cross the track, the following instruction to the jury was approved upon appeal: "A motorman—a man in charge of an electric car—has a right, as a general principle, to act upon the presumption that persons whom he sees before him in the street, with teams or on foot, are in the enjoyment of their senses and their faculties, because that is the ordinary experience with men. It is what is ordinarily true; and so he has a right to act upon this assumption of what is ordinarily true, and govern himself properly upon that assumption. But it does not follow from that, that in no case is he required to qualify his conduct in any way.

The motorman here handling this car would have a right to assume that the plaintiff was a man in the possession of all his ordinary faculties, if he did not know to the contrary, unless there was something in the conduct and management of the plaintiff which, with reasonable attention on the part of the motorman, would have informed him that there was some imperfection in regard to the plaintiff's condition."

The duty to avoid injury to a trespasser seen upon a railroad trestle, it has been held, arises not at the moment he is seen on the trestle by persons in charge of a train, but only when the peril of his position becomes known to them. If at the time the engineer first discovers a trespasser on a trestle, the latter's position is such that he can readily, and without risk of injury, step off to a place of safety, the engineer has the right to presume that he will do so, and to act on the presumption until it becomes apparent to him that the trespasser is ignorant of his danger. Southern R. Co. v. Bush, 122 Ala. 470, 26 So. 168; Ullrich v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 151 Ind. 353, 51 N. E. 95.

But generally no presumption can arise that a person upon a railroad trestle will be able to help himself; and it is the duty of those operating a train, upon discovering a person in such situation, to stop the train immediately. Clark v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 109 N. C. 430, 14 L. R. A. 749, 14 S. E. 43; Atlanta & C. Air Line R. Co. v. Gravitt, 93 Ga. 369, 26 L. R. A. 553, 44 Am. St. Rep. 145, 20 S. E. 550; Cook v. Central R. & Bkg. Co. 67 Ala. 533; Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Vaughan, 93 Ala. 209, 30 Am. St. Rep. 50, 9 So. 468; Peirce v. Walters, 164 Ill. 560, 45 N. E. 1068, Affirming 63 Ill. App. 562; Purcell v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 109 Iowa, 628, 77 Am. St. Rep. 557, 80 N. W. 682; Vanarsdall v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1666, 65 S. W. 858, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1432, 77 S. W. 1103; St. Louis S. W. R. Co. v. Bolton (Tex. Civ. App.) 81 S. W. 123.

1. Warning of danger generally necessary as basis for presumption.

The right to indulge the presumption that one will seek a place of safety from impending danger necessarily fails where the situation or conduct of the party in peril indicates that he is either unconscious of his danger, or is unable to save himself because of his helpless condition. In either of these situations, there is nothing upon which to base the presumption until proper effort is made to inform the subject of his danger. Therefore, if a person upon a railroad track appears unconscious of an approaching train, as that he is standing or walking with his back to it, or is lying upon the track, and he is discovered in time, it is the duty of the railroad company to sound the usual warning signals in sufficient time for such person to act upon them, and for the railway employees to observe their effect. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Smith, 62 Tex. 254; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Harvin (Tex. Civ. App.) 54 S. W. 629; Schlerhold v. North Beach & M. R. Co. 40 Cal. 447; Tennenbrock v. South Pacific C. R. Co. 59 Cal. 269, 272; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cooper (Ky.) 6 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 5; Poole v. North Carolina R. Co. 53 N. C. (8 Jones, L.) 340; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Triplett, 38 Ill. 69 L. R. A.

482; Masser v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 68 Iowa, 602, 27 N. W. 776; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Tinkham, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1784, 44 S. W. 439; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Hocker, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1398, 55 S. W. 438; Teel v. Ohio River R. Co. 49 W. Va. 85, 38 S. E. 518; Finlayson v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 1 Dill. 579, Fed. Cas. No. 4,793. But see Texas & P. R. Co. v. Roberts, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 111, 20 S. W. 960.

A railroad company cannot speculate upon the chances of its warning signals being heard by persons on its tracks, and excuse its omission to give them upon the ground that they would have been ineffectual. East Tennessee & G. R. Co. v. St. John, 5 Sneed, 524, 73 Am. Dec. 149.

The omission of such warning, however, cannot be deemed the cause of injury to a deaf man who knows before going upon the track of the approach of the train which injures him. McDonald v. International & G. N. R. Co. 86 Tex. 1, 40 Am. St. Rep. 803, 22 S. W. 939.

And the failure to give warning signals, or to check the speed of the train, will not render a railroad company liable for injury to a trespasser upon a trestle, where his presence was not discovered until the train was almost upon him. Tennenbrock v. South Pacific Coast R. Co. 59 Cal. 269.

And in Sibley v. Ratliffe, 50 Ark. 478, 8 S. W. 686, the court appears to approve an instruction that the omission to sound the whistle or ring the bell to give warning to a sleeping trespasser on the track must have been wilful and reckless to warrant a recovery.

While no exact rule can be laid down as to the precise distance at which it becomes the duty of a railroad company to give the usual danger signals when a person is discovered upon its track, the warning must be timely. Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Denson, 84 Ga. 774, 11 S. E. 1039; Wren v. Louisville, St. L. & T. R. Co. 14 Ky. L. Rep. 324, 20 S. W. 215.

It will be observed that the warning required by the above authorities is not that of the statutory signals which the law requires at crossings, but is included in the obligation to exercise ordinary care to avoid injury to persons in dangerous situations, when their peril is discovered. As to the duty of railroad companies in general to give statutory signals of the approach of trains at crossings, see notes, Giving the statutory signals as the measure of trainmen's duty at highway crossings, 15 L. R. A. 426; For whose benefit signals by approaching trains are required by statute at railway crossings, 17 L. R. A. 254; and Failure to signal for crossings, 21 L. R. A. 723.

2. Presumption may be repelled by circumstances.

If the person in peril, although not known to be deaf, gives no heed to the usual signals, in other words, acts directly contrary to the instinct of self-preservation; or if his situation otherwise indicates that he cannot, or will not, avoid the impending danger, any presumption that he will escape from his perilous situation is wholly unwarranted; and it becomes the duty of those coming into relation to him, if they perceive his conduct or situation in sufficient time, to make every reasonable effort to avoid injuring him. Bump v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 38 App. Div. 60, 55 N. Y. Supp. 962; Georgia Midland & G. R.

Co. v. Evans, 87 Ga. 673, 13 S. E. 580; Gunn v. Ohio River R. Co. 42 W. Va. 676, 36 L. R. A. 575, 26 S. E. 546; Wren v. Louisville, St. L. & T. B. Co. 14 Ky. L. Rep. 324, 20 S. W. 215; Robbins v. Springfield Street R. Co. 165 Mass. 30, 42 N. E. 334.

These limitations upon the exercise of the presumption in question obtain in those jurisdictions holding that the only duty due a person guilty of negligence is not wilfully to injure him, as well as in those where such negligence is held to be no excuse for an injury subsequently inflicted by another's negligence; and there seems to be no reason for any distinction between them in this regard.

If a person seen upon a railroad track is known to those in charge of a train to be, or from his appearance gives them good reason to believe that he is, insane, or badly intoxicated, or otherwise insensible of danger, or unable to avoid it, they have no right to assume that he will get out of the way, but should act upon the hypothesis that he may not or will not, and should use a proper degree of care to avoid injuring or killing him. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Wilkerson, 46 Ark. 513; Sibley v. Ratliffe, 50 Ark. 477, 8 S. W. 686; Anderson v. Hopkins, 33 C. C. A. 346, 63 U. S. App. 533, 91 Fed. 77.

The case of Anderson v. Hopkins seems to make a distinction between trespassers having the power to care for themselves and those suffering from some disability; and it is said that the rule that a trespasser is without relief for an injury received, unless it was wilfully or maliciously inflicted, does not apply where the person injured was perceived to be in a position of peril, from which, by reason of inability or inattention, he was not likely to extricate himself; and that a failure to exercise reasonable diligence to avoid injury to one perceived to be so situated is an actionable wrong, if harm results.

If persons in charge of a train are in doubt as to the condition or situation of a person on the track, it is their duty to resolve all reasonable doubts in favor of saving life. Clark v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 109 N. C. 430, 14 L. R. A. 749, 14 S. E. 43; Little v. Carolina C. R. Co. 118 N. C. 1072, 1077, 24 S. E. 514; Seaboard & R. R. Co. v. Joyner, 92 Va. 354, 365, 36 S. E. 773; Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Vaughan, 93 Ala. 209, 30 Am. St. Rep. 50, 9 So. 468; Purcell v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 109 Iowa, 628, 77 Am. St. Rep. 557, 80 N. W. 682.

The ordinary rule of all railroad companies is said to be, "In all cases of doubt take the side of safety." Dent, J., in Raines v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 39 W. Va. 50, 24 L. R. A. 226, 19 S. E. 565.

But this rule does not impose upon an engineer the duty of providing against what he has no reasonable ground to believe will happen. "The legal obligation is to take proper precaution to guard against what is the usual or justly expected consequence of one's acts; not against unexpected, unusual, or extraordinary results." Therefore, where an engineer checked the speed of his train upon discovering a man on a trestle, but resumed his course upon seeing him take a position which others had occupied with safety from passing trains, and the man was injured because he failed to hold his head back far enough, it was held that the railroad 69 L. R. A.

company was not liable. Little v. Carolina C. R. Co. 118 N. C. 1072, 1077, 24 S. E. 514.

The circumstances which may be deemed sufficient to repel the presumption, and impose the duty of active effort to avoid injury, where the person's disability is not previously known, may be classified as follows:

First. Those which make it apparent that the person in peril is unconscious of danger. Tanner v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 60 Ala. 621, 640; Frazer v. South & North Ala. R. Co. 81 Ala. 185, 60 Am. Rep. 145, 1 So. 85; Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Stroud, 64 Miss. 784, 2 So. 171; Murch v. Western N. Y. & P. R. Co. 78 Hun, 601, 29 N. Y. Supp. 490.

The engineer of a train cannot rely upon the presumption that a trespasser will save himself, after he has been in any manner advised, or he sees, that such person is unconscious of his peril, or so disabled that he cannot protect himself and avoid injury. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Judd, 10 Ind. App. 213, 37 N. E. 775.

The presumption that a person upon a street railway track will leave it before an approaching car reaches him cannot be indulged as to an infant of tender years; and, if its presence is discovered by the driver, it is his duty to exercise all the diligence then possible to avoid injury to it. Galveston City R. Co. v. Hewitt, 67 Tex. 473, 60 Am. Rep. 32, 3 S. W. 705; Omaha & R. Valley R. Co. v. Cook, 42 Neb. 577, 60 N. W. 899, 42 Neb. 905, 62 N. W. 235, 37 Neb. 435, 55 N. W. 943.

Neither is there any presumption that a child on a railroad track will heed signals of danger; and a locomotive engineer is bound to stop his train if he sees the child making no attempt to leave the track. Indianapolis, P. & C. R. Co. v. Pitzer, 108 Ind. 179, 58 Am. Rep. 387, 6 N. E. 310, 10 N. E. 70.

And in Campbell v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 55 Kan. 536, 40 Pac. 997, it is said that, if a man is lying or sitting upon a railroad track, apparently intoxicated or asleep, it is the duty of those in charge of a train to make an earlier effort to stop than would be required if the person were walking.

Although railway employees are unaware that a person walking upon the track is deaf, yet if, as ordinary, prudent men, they have reason to believe that an injury will occur unless the train is checked, it should be stopped at once. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cooper (Ky.) 6 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 5; Lexington & C. C. Min. Co. v. Huffman, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 775, 32 S. W. 611; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Tinkham, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1784, 44 S. W. 439.

While, as a general rule, a locomotive engineer may assume that a person walking upon the track is in possession of ordinary sight and hearing, yet, where the conduct of the traveler is such as to excite a doubt of this, the engineer is bound to use greater caution and to stop the train, if necessary to secure his safety. Clark v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 109 N. C. 430, 444, 14 L. R. A. 749, 14 S. E. 43.

The negligence of an intoxicated person in walking upon a railroad track will not excuse the subsequent negligence of the railroad company in running him down, where its employees discovered him on the track when the train was 900 feet distant, and at the distance of 200 feet the engineer noticed something unusual in his manner, but made no effort to check the speed of the train. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Robinson, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 121, 23 S. W. 433.

Likewise, the motorman of an electric car is required to qualify his conduct toward persons generally, if he perceives a very aged man attempting to drive across the track on the near approach of his car, and after the gong has been sounded. Robbins v. Springfield Street R. Co. 165 Mass. 30, 42 N. E. 334.

When the motorman of a street car sees that his efforts to attract the attention of a person approaching the track, by sounding the gong and hallooing to him, are unavailing, and that no attention is paid to the warnings, ordinary care requires that he at least lessen the speed of his car, and not attempt to run by such person, until satisfied that he is aware of the approach of the car, although not aware that he is deaf. Galveston City R. Co. v. Hanna (Tex. Civ. App.) 79 S. W. 639.

The driver of a vehicle is not warranted in continuing his course after shouting a warning to a pedestrian in the highway, where he sees his warning is not heeded, although he is not aware that the person in the highway is deaf. Smith v. Browne, Ir. L. R. 28 C. L. 1.

If an engineer sees two men on the track in front of his train, and one of them risks his safety in an effort to signal the foremost man to leave the track, the engineer will be guilty of a wilful wrong if he does not use ordinary care to stop the train, although without knowledge that the foremost man is deaf. Palmer v. Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. 112 Ind. 250, 14 N. E. 70.

Second. Circumstances which indicate a situation that may prevent the party in peril from extricating himself in time to avoid danger.

The presumption that persons upon the track, and apparently able to take care of themselves, will leave it upon the approach of a train, is not applicable where a girl having her foot caught between the rail and planking at a crossing is facing the train, and waving her hands wildly in an endeavor to signal the engineer to stop the train. While the engineer, in such case, may not be able to see the foot fast in the crossing, the facts that the person does not leave the track, and that her conduct indicates that something unusual has happened, require him to act on the instant; and his failure to stop the train in time to avoid injury, if it can be done, is negligence. Whether the engineer acted with reasonable promptness under the circumstances is a question of fact for the jury. Spooner v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 115 N. Y. 22, 21 N. E. 696.

Where a trespasser on a railroad track was on a bridge of considerable elevation, and could not, therefore, step out of danger, it was held proper to refuse to instruct the jury that an engineer is not bound to stop his train the moment he sees a person on the track, but has the right to presume that such person will leave the track in time to escape danger, and, without being negligent, may continue to run the train until he discovers that such person is heedless of danger. Peirce v. Walters, 164 Ill. 560, 45 N. E. 1068, Affirming 63 Ill. App. 562. That it cannot be presumed that a person in such a situation will escape to a place of safety, see div. IV., c. 3, supra; div. VIII. a, supra.

"Where it is apparent to an engineer, who is keeping a proper outlook, that a man is lying prone upon the track, or his team is delayed in moving a wagon over a crossing, it has been declared that the engineer, having reason to believe that life or property will be imperiled by going on without diminishing his speed, is negligent if he fails to use all the means at his command, consistent with the safety of the passengers and property in his charge, to stop his train and avoid coming in contact with the person so exposed. Deans v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 107 N. C. 686, 22 Am. St. Rep. 902, 12 S. E. 77; Bullock v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 105 N. C. 180, 10 S. E. 988. The same rule prevails where the engineer knows, or ought to know, that a human being has passed a milepost which marks the end of a trestle nearest to him, and can see that the person, despite his signal, persists in running along the track from which he cannot step aside, and from which he can escape instantly only by a perilous jump or unusual activity. The law expects him, when he sees a man still lying motionless, after he has given the alarm signal, to take precaution against the possibility of his being drunk, or, where one does not move his team at a crossing under similar circumstances, to act upon the idea that the wagon is fastened in some way." Clark v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 109 N. C. 443, 444, 14 L. R. A. 749, 14 S. E. 43.

Omaha & R. Valley R. Co. v. Cook, 42 Neb. 905, 62 N. W. 235, affirming on rehearing 42 Neb. 577, 60 N. W. 899, approves the following statement of the rule as to the duty of railroad employees to helpless persons discovered upon the track in time to stop the train, taken from Beach, Contributory Negligence, 203: "Nor is the company liable for a failure on the part of its employees to stop the train, on seeing a person walking on the track, even though there was time enough to do so, provided the proper signals of warning were given. The company may presume that the trespasser is in full possession of his senses, and that he will appreciate his danger and act with discretion. But an engineer who sees a helpless person incapable of moving, on the track, is guilty of negligence if he fails to make all prudent efforts to avoid the collision, and this without reference to the cause of the person's disability."

3. "Last moment" to which presumption may be indulged.

How long may the presumption that a person in peril will escape to a place of safety be indulged, in the light of countervailing circumstances?

According to some authorities, if a person discovered upon a railroad track is apparently in the possession of all his faculties, and not suffering from any disability, and is given warning of the approach of a train, the engineer has the right to act upon the presumption that he will get off the track, "until the last moment," and until it is too late to avoid contact. Indianapolis & V. R. Co. v. McClaren, 62 Ind. 572; Campbell v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 55 Kan. 536, 40 Pac. 997; Schexnaydre v. Texas & P. R. Co. 46 La. Ann. 248, 40 Am. St. Rep. 321, 14 So. 513; Nichols v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Ky.) 6 S. W. 339; Poole v. North Carolina R. Co. 53 N. C. (8 Jones, L.) 340; Herring v. Wilmington & R. R. Co. 32 N. C. (10 Fred. L.) 402, 51 Am. Dec. 395; Norwood

v. Raleigh & G. R. Co. 111 N. C. 236, 16 S. E. 4; Birmingham R. & Electric Co. v. Bowers, 110 Ala. 328, 20 So. 345; Raines v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 39 W. Va. 50, 24 L. R. A. 226, 19 S. E. 565; Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Judd, 10 Ind. App. 213, 37 N. E. 775; Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Miller, 149 Ind. 490, 49 N. E. 445.

This seems a harsh rule, and cannot be said to meet the requirement that ordinary care must be used to avoid the consequences of another's negligence. Indeed, it comes perilously near to authorizing the wanton killing of persons discovered upon a railroad track, whether at crossings or elsewhere. Accordingly, the concurring opinion of Martin, Ch. J., in the case of Campbell v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 55 Kan. 536, 40 Pac. 997, supra, construes the "last moment" to mean "the last moment in which it would, or ought to, seem practicable to stop the train" before collision; and that for a slight error of judgment on the part of the engineer, the railroad company ought not to be held responsible. Thus qualified, the rule seems both reasonable and humane, and is supported by authority. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Daniel, 89 Ga. 463, 15 S. E. 538; Savannah, T. & I. of H. R. Co. v. Bryan, 94 Ga. 632, 21 S. E. 57; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Wilkerson, 46 Ark. 513; Sibley v. Ratliffe, 50 Ark. 477, 8 S. W. 686; Clark v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 109 N. C. 430, 14 L. R. A. 749, 14 S. E. 48; Callaway v. Walters, 63 Ill. App. 562, Affirmed in 164 Ill. 560, 45 N. E. 1068; Orr v. Cedar Rapids & M. C. R. Co. 94 Iowa, 423, 431, 62 N. W. 851; Purcell v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 109 Iowa, 628, 631, 77 Am. St. Rep. 557, 80 N. W. 682; Omaha & R. Valley R. Co. v. Cook, 42 Neb. 577, 60 N. W. 899, 37 Neb. 435, 55 N. W. 943; Heddies v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 77 Wis. 228, 20 Am. St. Rep. 106, 46 N. W. 115.

The qualification of the rule is aptly expressed in Galveston City R. Co. v. Hewitt, 67 Tex. 473, 480, 60 Am. Rep. 32, 3 S. W. 705, where it is said that the presumption may be indulged "so long as danger does not become imminent, but no longer."

And, as applied to cases where such disability is not previously known, "the last moment" to which the presumption can be indulged is when, from all the circumstances, there is such an indication of bodily infirmity, or of disabled condition, or of imminent peril, that to a person of ordinary prudence the infliction of injury seems probable, if proper effort is not made to avoid it. Shearn & Redf. Neg. 4th ed. § 99; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Wilkerson, 46 Ark. 513; Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Stroud, 64 Miss. 784, 2 So. 171; Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Murphy, 17 Ohio C. C. 223; Heddies v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 77 Wis. 228, 20 Am. St. Rep. 106, 46 N. W. 115; Murch v. Western N. Y. & P. R. Co. 78 Hun. 601, 29 N. Y. Supp. 490; Meeks v. Southern P. R. Co. 56 Cal. 513, 38 Am. Rep. 67; Seaboard & R. R. Co. v. Joyner, 92 Va. 354, 23 S. E. 773; East Tennessee & G. R. Co. v. St. John, 5 Sneed, 524, 73 Am. Dec. 149; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hill (Tex. Civ. App.) 58 S. W. 255; Bump v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 38 App. Div. 60, 55 N. Y. Supp. 962.

While a locomotive engineer, seeing a child approaching the track in broad daylight with the apparent purpose of crossing it, has the right to presume that he will stop in a place of safety, and not attempt to pass in front of the train, "he cannot rest on such an assumption so long as to allow his engine to reach a point where it will become impossible for him to control his train or give warning in time to prevent injury to the traveler, supposing the traveler to continue in his course." Heddies v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 77 Wis. 228, 20 Am. St. Rep. 106, 46 N. W. 115.

Likewise, persons operating an engine are not permitted to speculate as to the identity of an object on the track until it is too late to stop the train, when by the exercise of ordinary care they might discover that it is a child. Isabel v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 60 Mo. 475.

"Upon discovering one upon the track, the engineer should give the proper alarm; and if, in a reasonable time after doing so, the person does not leave the track, and the engineer has reasonable ground to think he is not going to do so, then, if he can by the use of all reasonable means stop the train and save the man, he must do so." Wren v. Louisville, St. L. & T. R. Co. 14 Ky. L. Rep. 324, 20 S. W. 215.

When it is discovered that an aged man walking on a railroad track, and making every effort to get out of the way of an approaching train, will not effect his escape in time to avoid injury, it is the duty of the engineer to stop, or sufficiently slacken the speed of the train, so as to give him more time to get entirely out of danger. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Welsen, 65 Tex. 443.

Where a boy trespasser, blinded by the smoke and cinders from a passing train, is discovered backing upon a railroad track before an approaching train, it is the duty of those in charge of the train to give warning, and to stop the train as soon as possible. If, however, such person is not discovered in time to stop the train before a collision, the railroad company is not liable for his injury. Masser v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 68 Iowa, 602, 27 N. W. 776.

But it is apparent that the "last moment" rule can have no application where the person in danger is obviously lacking in capacity to care for his own safety, or is known to be suffering from some disability, or is in a situation, which prevents him from hearing the warnings given him, or disables him from acting upon them if heard. Such a situation demands immediate resort to the means at hand to avoid injury, and the omission of such effort is culpable negligence, if not wilful wrongdoing. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Smith, 62 Tex. 254; Deans v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 107 N. C. 686, 22 Am. St. Rep. 902, 12 S. E. 77; Smith v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. 114 N. C. 728, 25 L. R. A. 287, 19 S. E. 863, 923; Pickett v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 117 N. C. 616, 30 L. R. A. 257, 53 Am. St. Rep. 611, 23 S. E. 264; Omaha & R. Valley R. Co. v. Cook, 42 Neb. 577, 905, 60 N. W. 899; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Wilkerson, 46 Ark. 513; Donahoe v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 83 Mo. 543; Kenyon v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 5 Hun, 479.

If a person seen lying on the track is asleep or drunk, or known to be insane, or otherwise insensible to danger, or unable to avoid it, it is the duty of the engineer of a train to resolve all doubts in favor of the preservation of life, and immediately use every available means, short of imperiling the lives of passengers on his train, to stop. Deans v. Wilmington & W.

R. Co. 107 N. C. 686, 22 Am. St. Rep. 902, 12 S. E. 77; Clark v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 109 N. C. 430, 14 L. R. A. 749, 14 S. E. 43; Seaboard & R. R. Co. v. Joyner, 92 Va. 354, 365, 23 S. E. 773; Campbell v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 55 Kan. 536, 40 Pac. 997; Garsa v. Texas Mexican R. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 41 S. W. 172; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Dunnaway, 93 Va. 29, 24 S. E. 698; Wren v. Louisville, St. L. & T. R. Co. 14 Ky. L. Rep. 324, 20 S. W. 215.

It is the imperative duty of a locomotive engineer to endeavor to stop his train upon discovering a person upon a high trestle from which it is obviously out of his power to escape except by going forward to the end. Such a situation does not warrant the presumption that the person will be able to take care of himself. Atlanta & C. Air-Line R. Co. v. Gravit, 93 Ga. 369, 408, 26 L. R. A. 553, 44 Am. St. Rep. 145, 20 S. E. 550; Peirce v. Walters, 164 Ill. 560, 45 N. E. 1068, Affirming 63 Ill. App. 562; St. Louis S. W. R. Co. v. Bolton (Tex. Civ. App.) 81 S. W. 123.

A locomotive engineer who discovers a trespasser upon a trestle in front of his train is not permitted to speculate as to such person's chances of reaching the end before the train does, or whether he will jump, or lie down, or in some other manner get out of harm's way, a moment after it becomes evident that he is insensible of his danger, or incapable of providing for his safety. Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Vaughan, 93 Ala. 209, 30 Am. St. Rep. 50, 9 So. 468; Purcell v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 109 Iowa, 628, 77 Am. St. Rep. 557, 80 N. W. 682.

"The true test of the engineer's duty is involved in the question whether he has reasonable ground to believe, with all the knowledge of the surroundings which due diligence requires of him, that the life of a fellow-man is in peril, and that the danger to his person can only be averted by stopping, or reducing the speed of, the train." When an engineer sees a man on a trestle or bridge, so that he can no more get off the track than one who is lying on it in an apparent stupor, except by exposing himself to danger, he is not warranted in making a hurried calculation as to the relative speed of the man and the train, and in omitting to check the speed of the train, in the belief that the man will reach the end of the bridge before he is overtaken. Clark v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 109 N. C. 430, 14 L. R. A. 749, 14 S. E. 43.

Even though the railroad employees believe that a person seen on a trestle will be able to make his escape, and for that reason fail to take precautions to avoid injury that subsequent developments show to have been necessary, the railroad company will be liable for its failure to stop the train until too late to avoid injury. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Varnarsdell, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1432, 77 S. W. 1103.

Naturally, a directly opposite view to the last cited case is taken by those authorities holding that the only duty owing a trespasser is to refrain from wilful or wanton injury. Accordingly, in Indiana, where that rule obtains, it is held that a complaint alleging that defendant's employees saw the person injured on a trestle 15 feet high, and 100 feet from the end, and trying to effect his escape, at a distance of 2,000 feet, and in sufficient time to stop the train, and avoid injury, but failed to stop until after running such person down and killing him, does not state a cause of action, since the engineer had the right to presume that such person would get off the trestle, and the right to continue that presumption until the point making it perilous to continue was reached; and the complaint failed to state at what point the peril became reasonably manifest, or that at such point the engineer failed to make every possible effort to stop the train. And the court says: "If the engineer acted on the presumption that the deceased could and would get to a point of safety, and so acted until it became too late, by the use of the means within his control, to avoid running upon him, such reliance could not be considered wilfulness." Ullrich v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 151 Ind. 358, 51 N. E. 95.

And where a man on a railroad trestle had knowledge of the approach of a train, and was so near the end that he could, if he chose, step off to a place of safety, but, after starting back, turned and attempted to run across in the face of the train, and the engineer thereupon did all he could to stop the train,—it was held, that "if, at the time the actual circumstances, brought to the knowledge of the engineer, made it apparent to him that the deceased did not intend to leave the trestle, it was then too late to apply successfully the preventive means at hand to avoid the injury, wilfulness and wantonness, equivalent to an intention or willingness to inflict injury, cannot be imputed from a failure to stop the engine." And it is said that proof of such gross negligence as amounts to wantonness and recklessness is necessary to overcome the effect of the contributory negligence of the injured party, and authorize a recovery. Southern R. Co. v. Bush, 122 Ala. 470, 26 So. 168.

SENATE of the State of California.

(.....Cal.....)

1. The court cannot supervise the exercise by the legislature of its constitutional power to expel a member.

2. Allegations in a petition by persons expelled from a state legislature to secure reinstatement, that they were expelled without hearing or opportunity for defense, will not be taken as true, even against a demurrer, where the record of the proceedings, of which the court takes judicial notice, shows that charges were preferred, referred to a committee which reported an investigation, and that the charges were true, and that the report was taken up and considered by the body, at which time petitioners had an opportunity to be heard in their own behalf.

3. The state legislature has power to adopt any procedure for the expulsion of members, and to change it at pleasure.
4. A member of the legislature has, in the absence of constitutional provision, no right to a trial and opportunity to be heard upon charges made, before being expelled therefrom.
5. A member of the state legislature is not protected by the Federal Constitution from the exercise by that body of its constitutional right to remove him therefrom.
6. The title to a public office is held subject to the constitutional provision giving the right of removal.
7. The constitutional power of the state legislature to expel a member is not restricted by the further provision that a member who accepts a bribe is guilty of felony, upon conviction of which he shall be forever disqualified from holding any office or public trust; and therefore conviction is not a prerequisite to his expulsion from the legislative body.
8. A resolution expelling a member from the legislature is not a bill of attainder forbidden by the Constitution.

PETITION for a writ of mandamus to compel the Senate of the State of California to restore petitioners to membership therein. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George D. Collins, H. V. Morehouse, J. E. Alexander, F. C. Jacobs, and William F. James for petitioners.

Mr. U. S. Webb, Attorney General, for respondent:

The supreme court of the state of California has no jurisdiction to issue a writ of mandamus in this proceeding. The jurisdiction of the supreme court over the subject-matter of the action is to be determined by express statutory enactment. And jurisdiction goes no further than the wording of the statute or Constitution allows.

Mandamus will not lie from one branch of the government to a co-ordinate branch, for neither is inferior to the other, and such proceeding would amount to the sovereign issuing a mandamus to himself.

Shaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an original proceeding in mandamus to compel the senate of the state of California to admit the petitioners as members thereof. The case was submitted to this court upon a general demurrer to the petition, and the writ denied.

The petitioners were duly elected senators of the state from the respective districts which they represent, and each duly qualified and acted as a member of the senate at the thirty-sixth regular session until the 27th day of February, 1905, when they were by the senate expelled therefrom for malfeasance in office, consisting of taking a bribe to influence their conduct as senators. 69 L. R. A.

Since then they have not been allowed to sit as members of the senate nor to participate in its proceedings. It is alleged in the petition that in the proceedings expelling the petitioners the senate did not give them a hearing, nor afford them a trial upon the charges made, nor permit them to make any defense thereto; that the charges of bribery upon which they were expelled are false; and that neither of them has been convicted of such crime.

Even if we should give these allegations their fullest force in favor of the pleader, they do not make a case justifying the interposition of this court. Under our form of government the judicial department has no power to revise even the most arbitrary and unfair action of the legislative department, or of either house thereof, taken in pursuance of the power committed exclusively to that department by the Constitution. It has been held by high authority that, even in the absence of an express provision conferring the power, every legislative body in which is vested the general legislative power of the state has the implied power to expel a member for any cause which it may deem sufficient. In Hiss v. Bartlett, 3 Gray, 473, 63 Am. Dec. 768, the supreme court of Massachusetts says, in substance, that this power is inherent in every legislative body; that it is necessary to enable the body "to perform its high functions, and is necessary to the safety of the state;" that it is a power of self-protection, and that the legislative body "must necessarily be the sole judge of the exigency which may justify and require its exercise." In this state the power does not depend on implication; it is expressly given; or, as the power would exist without the express grant, perhaps it is more accurate to say that it is expressly recognized and limited. The Constitution provides that the senate "shall determine the rule of its proceeding, and may, with the concurrence of two thirds of all the members elected, expel a member." Article 4, § 9. If this provision were omitted, and there were no other constitutional limitations on the power, the power would nevertheless exist, and could be exercised by a majority. The only effect of the provision is to make the concurrence of two thirds of the members elected necessary to its exercise. In all other respects it is absolute. The legislature is a co-ordinate department of the state government. By article 3 of the Constitution it is provided that one department of the state shall not exercise the functions of either of the other departments, except as in that instrument expressly directed and permitted. There is no provision authorizing courts to control, direct, supervise, or forbid the exercise by either house of the power to expel a member. These powers are functions of the legislative department, and, therefore, in the exercise of the power thus committed to it, the senate is supreme. An attempt by this court to direct or control the legislature, or either house thereof, in the exercise of the power, would be an attempt to exercise legislative functions, which it is expressly forbidden to do.

Even if the court should attempt to usurp this legislative function, there is no means whereby it could carry its judgment into effect and give the relief demanded. The thirty-sixth session of the legislature has adjourned sine die; it is a thing past, and cannot be reconvened upon the mandate of the judicial power. Const. art. 3. The senate could not reinstate the petitioners as members of that session except when lawfully in session. Nor can the body which composed the thirty-sixth session be again called together except in special session and at the behest of the governor. Const. art. 4, § 2, art. 5, § 9. The next regular session of the senate will be composed of different persons and will be a different body from that now supposed to be before the court. The court is without power to issue its final process against a body not lawfully served with its original process, and which has not submitted itself to its jurisdiction. Moreover, before the next session convenes, the terms of all the petitioners except Wright will have expired. The court cannot issue any effective mandate to reinstate the petitioners as members of the senate.

We think it is proper to say further, out of respect to a co-ordinate department of the government, that, notwithstanding the arbitrary action apparently charged against the senate by the language of the petition, we cannot give the statements therein contained their full force. Ordinarily, when a case is submitted on a demurrer, all the facts stated in the pleadings demurred to are taken as true. To this rule there are some exceptions, one of which is important here. Only those facts are admitted by a demurrer which it is necessary to allege in the pleading. It is not necessary to allege facts of which the court will take judicial notice. Such facts will be considered by the court although not pleaded. 12 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 1; 1 Chitty, Pl. 215, 217, 218; People ex rel. Drake v. Mahaney, 13 Mich. 481; Mullan v. State, 114 Cal. 581, 34 L. R. A. 262, 46 Pac. 670; Bliss, Code Pl. 177, 194. Those allegations of a pleading which are not necessary, and which are contrary to the facts of which judicial notice is taken, are not admitted by a demurrer, but are to be treated as a nullity. 12 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 1; 1 Chitty, Pl. 215; Mullan v. State, 114 Cal. 581, 34 L. R. A. 262, 46 Pac. 670; Ohm v. San Francisco, 92 Cal. 449, 28 Pac. 580. The courts take judicial notice of the public and private official acts of the legislative department of the state. Code Civ. Proc. § 1875, subd. 3; Mullan v. State, 114 Cal. 581, 34 L. R. A. 262, 46 Pac. 670; Davis v. Whidden, 117 Cal. 623, 49 Pac. 766. Among these official acts are included the proceedings by which the petitioners were expelled and which are entered upon the journal of the senate. We are therefore bound to take notice that charges were preferred against the petitioners in the senate, and were referred by it to a committee for investigation; that the committee reported that it had made the investigation, and that the charges were true, and recommended that the petitioners be expelled; that this report was taken up and considered by the senate; that the petitioners, being then members, had upon such consideration an opportunity to present, or have presented arguments in their behalf; and that the resolution expelling them was regularly offered and adopted by the senate. There being no direct allegation to the contrary, we must presume that the petitioners had notice of these proceedings, and that they were allowed as members to participate therein. In view of these facts, we cannot consider the allegations of the petition as imputing to the senate the arbitrary and unfair treatment of the petitioners which might be inferred from the language used, but will rather consider them as a statement of the conclusion of the pleaders that the proceedings taken, of which we take judicial notice, did not constitute a trial or hearing, and did not give them the opportunity to be heard in their own behalf, which they believe they were entitled to have.

There is no averment that the manner of the proceeding was contrary to the rules established. And even if it were as abrupt as the interpretation of the pleading most favorable to the petitioners would imply, the matter would be immaterial. The senate has power to adopt any procedure, and to change it at any time and without notice. It cannot tie its own hands by establishing rules which, as a matter of power purely, it cannot at any time change and disregard. Its action in any given case is the only criterion by which to determine the rule of proceeding adopted for that case. There is no constitutional provision giving to the petitioners the right to have a trial and opportunity to be heard upon the charges made against them in the senate other than that which they have received.

The 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States does not affect the case, nor have its provisions been violated by the action of the senate. While it is true that, so far as private persons are concerned, the right to hold a public office duly conferred upon an individual has many of the attributes of private property, and is protected by the law of the land, yet, as between the office holder and the sovereign power, such right is not violated when the proper governmental authority, acting in pursuance of a power expressly given to it by the fundamental law, has removed such person from the office. Re Carter, 141 Cal. 319, 74 Pac. 997. The sovereign power which created the office can also fix the terms upon which it is held, and can delegate the power of removal. The title is held subject to the conditions thus imposed. The relations between the body politic and its officers are not in this particular essentially different from those existing between a private person and his servants. Although there may be a difference as to the liability for damages for a dismissal without cause, the right or power to dismiss always exists. The senate having expelled the petitioners in the manner prescribed by the Constitution, in the exercise of the power therein given, it is not true that they have been deprived of the right to the office without due process of law.

With respect to the possible abuse of such power, the case is analogous to that of the President of the United States with respect to officers of the United States subject to arbitrary removal by him. In regard to this the Supreme Court of the United States says that the only restraint upon the abuse of the power "must consist in the responsibility of the President, under his oath of office, to so act as shall be for the general benefit and welfare." Shurtleff v. United States, 189 U. S. 317, 47 L. ed. 832, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 535. The same is true of the power of the senate here under consideration. The oath of each individual member of the senate, and his duty under it to act conscientiously for the general good, is the only safeguard to the fellow members against an unjust and causeless expulsion. This is the only practical rule that can be adopted as to those unrestricted governmental powers which are necessary to the exercise of governmental functions, and which must be lodged somewhere. Each department of the state is necessarily vested with some power which is beyond the supervision of any other department; and in such cases the only protection against abuse is the conscience of the individual in whom the power is vested. The decisions holding that, where a power is given to remove an officer "for cause" without requiring any previous notice or any hearing, such notice must nevertheless be given and a hearing had, have been disapproved in this state. Re Carter, 141 Cal. 319, 74 Pac. 997. But, in any event, they clearly have no application to the present case, where the power to remove is, as we have seen, inherent and necessary to the exercise of the functions of the body possessing it, and are given without limitation or restriction.

It is claimed that the power to expel for bribery is, by § 35, art. 4, limited to those cases in which the member has been convicted of the crime defined in that section. The section provides that any member of the legislature who is influenced in his official action by any reward or promise thereof is guilty of a felony, and that upon conviction he shall be forever disqualified from holding any office or public trust. It is obvious that this section was not intended to have any effect whatever upon the power to expel members of the legislature given by § 9 of the same article. The two provisions are entirely independent, and are made for different objects and purposes. The power to expel is given to enable the legislative body to protect itself against participation in its proceedings by persons whom it judges unworthy to be members thereof, and affects only the rights of such persons to continue to act as members. The provision of § 35 defines a certain crime, and prescribes the effect of a judgment of conviction thereof upon the subsequent status as a citizen of the person found guilty. A resolution of the senate expelling a member, whether for bribery or for some other offense, or improper conduct, is not the equivalent of the conviction of the person of the crime set forth in the charges against him.

The proposition that a resolution or other action of the senate resulting in the expulsion of a member is in substance a bill of attainder, and therefore a violation of § 16, art. 1, of the state Constitution, and of § 10, art. 1, of the Constitution of the United States, is scarcely worthy of notice. The charges upon which a member is expelled may or may not constitute a charge of crime, but the resolution expelling him has not the force of law, and it cannot by any stretch of construction be denominated a bill of attainder. At common law "a bill of attainder was a legislative conviction for an alleged crime, followed by a prescribed punishment therefor, with judgment of death." And, even where a milder punishment was inflicted, its effect was an extinction of civil and political rights and capacities. Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. 363.

The resolution of expulsion has no effect upon the rights of the member expelled further than to terminate his right to sit as a member of the legislative body, and it bears no just resemblance to a bill of attainder.

We find no ground upon which the application of the petitioners can be supported, and we are of the opinion that the writ was properly denied.

Howard M. STEELE, Appt.

(77 Conn. 688.)

1. Livery-stable keepers are not within the rule that common carriers of passengers are bound to exercise extraordinary care for the safety of their passengers.
2. Whether or not a livery-stable keeper is liable to a patron for an injury due to a defect in the neck yoke of the carriage furnished by him depends upon whether it was discoverable by the exercise of such care as is usually exercised by persons of ordinary prudence in the conduct of such business.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Hartford County in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

In any business involving the personal safety and lives of others what is due care,—reasonable diligence? Clearly nothing less than the most watchful care and the most active diligence. Anything short of this is negligence and carelessness, and would furnish clear ground of liability if an injury was thereby sustained.

Hall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for $750 for injuries received by the plaintiff Sarah L. Stanley from the overturning of a carriage hired of the defendant. The amended complaint alleges that the defendant was a livery-stable keeper; that he let to the plaintiffs a carriage and a pair of horses, with a driver; that the carriage and its appliances were defective, in that the pole, neck yoke, and pole straps were of insufficient strength and out of repair, and that the driver was incompetent; that the neck yoke became detached from the collar of one of the horses, and the driver lost control of the team, and the pole broke, and the carriage was overturned; that the accident was caused by the unskillful handling of the horses, and by the failure of the defendant to exercise due and proper diligence in furnishing a safe driver and safe harnesses and appliances.

The facts showing the cause of the accident are these: A part of the harness or appliances furnished by the defendant was a neck yoke, consisting of a wooden bar about 3 feet long, which, by a leather loop at the middle, is attached at right angles to the end of the carriage pole. Fitted to each end of the neck yoke is a metal cap or thimble, through a slot or opening on the surface of which a strap passes around the neck yoke and is connected with the horse collar, and by this attachment to the pole the carriage is held back and turned. On the underside of each of said thimbles is a small hole, countersunk for a screw to go through into the neck yoke, to prevent the thimble from slipping off. The head of the screw upon the right-hand thimble was too small for the countersink, so that, when screwed down, the top of the screw head was below the outer surface of the thimble, and only the outer edge of the screw head held the thimble. While driving down a slight grade a part of this screw head broke off, and the thimble slipped over the broken screw head and off the neck yoke, and the pole was thereby let down; and the carriage, coming against the horses, frightened them and they ran away, throwing the plaintiff from the carriage and seriously injuring her.

It is claimed, among the reasons of appeal, that the trial court, in deciding that the defendant was negligent in not having discovered the defect in the neck yoke which was the cause of the accident, erred in holding him to too high a degree of care, and also erred in finding and in refusing to find certain facts. A statement of the evidence and rulings in the case is made a part of the record, as provided by § 797 of the General Statutes of 1902.

Concerning this defect from the smallness of the screw head in the thimble, the trial judge says in the finding: "A casual observer might not have seen it, but a person whose duty it was to exercise due care to see that the harness and carriage were in a safe condition, so that the security of his passengers might be preserved, would have seen it, and ought to have seen it. Said defect was not hidden, but it was plain to be seen by the eye, and could have been seen by the defendant, who was present when said team was furnished the plaintiff, if he had used ordinary care in examining the equipment." The finding states that "the defendant testified that, had he noticed the screw, he never would have used the yoke, while his foreman testified the screw was so small a blind man could see that." As to the degree of care required of the defendant, the trial judge says in his finding: "Hadley v. Cross, 34 Vt. 586, 80 Am. Dec. 699, states the rule which I adopt: 'In any business involving the personal safety and lives of others, what is due care,—reasonable diligence? Clearly, 69 L. R. A.

nothing less than the most watchful care and the most active diligence; anything short of this is negligence and carelessness, and would furnish clear ground of liability if an injury was thereby sustained.' "

An examination of the evidence shows that the plaintiffs endeavored to prove at the trial that the defect in the neck yoke was that the thimble which came off had not been fastened to the neck yoke at all, and that the plaintiffs' witnesses who examined the neck yoke after the accident testified that there was no screw in the end of the neck yoke where the thimble had come off. After the neck yoke and thimble had been produced in court, showing the screw still in it, and the broken screw head, the court says that it had "grave doubts" whether that was really the yoke in question. It having been proved to be the yoke in use at the time of the accident, the case evidently turned upon the question of whether due care upon the part of the defendant required him to so carefully inspect the neck yoke as to discover that the head of the screw through the underside of the thimble was so small as to be insufficient to hold the thimble on, and that the screw head was liable to break, and allow the thimble to slip over it and off the yoke. The defendant endeavored to prove that the pole and neck yoke were new, were purchased by him from a reputable dealer, were examined by him in the usual and proper manner, and that such a slipping of the thimble from the neck yoke was very unusual, and to prove by several witnesses, among whom was the defendant's foreman, that the defect in the fastening of the thimble was not discoverable upon an ordinary inspection of the neck yoke. From the evidence before us upon this apparently controlling question in the case, the trial judge, in deciding it, evidently gave considerable weight to what he in effect says in the finding was the testimony of the defendant's foreman, namely, that the screw in the thimble was so small that any person who could see would have discovered the defect. It is conceded by the plaintiff's counsel, and it appears from the evidence before us, that the defendant's foreman did not so testify. On the contrary, it appears that he testified that the defect was not apparent upon inspection of the pole and yoke. The only witness who used language at all similar to that ascribed in the finding to the defendant's foreman was one Dunbar. He was called by the defendant to identify the neck yoke produced in court as the one which he brought back to the stable after the accident. His remark on cross-examination, after he had identified the yoke by the screw which was in it, "A blind man can see that," was evidently his statement of how readily anyone could see the screw in the yoke after the accident, and contradicted the plaintiffs' witnesses that there was no screw to be seen in the yoke when they examined it after the accident. When testifying as to the appearance of the yoke when it was put onto the carriage, this witness said there was nothing to indicate the defect that the screw head was too small for the countersink, and that it would not be seen. The trial court therefore erred in considering as evidence, in deciding a material question in the case, testimony which was not in fact given.

We are also of opinion that by the rule adopted the trial court held the defendant to too high a degree of care upon the question of whether he ought to have discovered the defect in the fastening of the thimble to the neck yoke. In the case of common carriers of passengers, the highest degree of care which a reasonable and prudent man would use in that business is required. As to a common carrier of passengers by stage-coach, this rule "applies alike to the character of the vehicle, the horses and harness, the skill and sobriety of the driver, and to the manner of conducting the stage under every emergency or difficulty," and the stage owner is held liable "for the smallest negligence in himself or his driver." Derwort v. Loomer, 21 Conn. 245, 253; Stokes v. Saltonstall, 13 Pet. 181, 10 L. ed. 115. Hadley v. Cross, 34 Vt. 586, 80 Am. Dec. 699, referred to by the trial court as laying down the correct rule as to the degree of care required of the defendant, was an action against a livery-stable keeper for an injury caused by a defect in a wagon hired of the defendant; but the rule of diligence adopted in that case was that applicable to common carriers of passengers. The opinion states that it was conceded that the rule of duty and diligence to be applied was that applicable "to coach owners or other passenger carriers" who furnished drivers as well as teams; the plaintiff claiming that the defendant was liable for a defect which was not visible, and could not be discovered by the most careful examination, and the defendant that he was only liable for the want of due care. The court points out the difference between the liability of common carriers of passengers and of goods, and says that the former is only liable for the want of due care, but that that term, when applied to carriers of passengers, means the same as the terms "extraordinary care" and "the highest diligence," and cites as settling the law on the subject the case of Ingalls v. Bills, 9 Met. 1, 43 Am. Dec. 346, which was an action against a common carrier of passengers. But public carriers owe to their passengers a degree of care and 60 L. R. A.

protection which is not exacted of those who do not hold themselves out as serving the public in that capacity. 6 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 534; Seaver v. Bradley, 179 Mass. 329, 88 Am. St. Rep. 384, 60 N. E. 795. And while the proprietors of stage-coaches, hacks, and omnibuses, who hold themselves out to the public as general conveyers of passengers from place to place for hire with their own drivers, may be included in the class known as public or common carriers of passengers, livery-stable keepers, whose business it is to care for the horses and carriages of others, and to let their own horses and carriages either with or without drivers, are not common carriers of passengers, within the legal meaning of that term. Cooley, Torts, § 638; Payne v. Halstead, 44 Ill. App. 97; Siegrist v. Arnot, 86 Mo. 200, 56 Am. Rep. 424; Erickson v. Barber Bros. 83 Iowa, 367, 49 N. W. 838; Copeland v. Draper, 157 Mass. 558, 19 L. R. A. 283, 34 Am. St. Rep. 314, 32 N. E. 944. By merely carrying on such a livery-stable business the proprietors of it do not hold themselves out as undertaking, for hire, to carry indiscriminately any persons who may apply, either to certain places, or to such places as they may desire to be carried to. Furthermore, those who hire carriages from livery-stable keepers are not necessarily conveyed by the vehicles, horses, and drivers chosen by the proprietor, but may, in a measure, protect themselves by selecting the particular carriage, horse, and driver they wish to hire. The rule of law which requires "the strictest and highest degree of diligence of a public carrier of passengers" is not applicable to a mere livery-stable keeper. "Such livery-stable keeper," says the court in Payne v. Halstead, 44 Ill. App. 97, "is not a common carrier, . . . and does not assume the duties and obligations of such a carrier. He is at most a private carrier for hire. . . . Such a one undertakes to possess the skill adequate to the undertaking, and promises to exercise due diligence and care in its performance, but ordinary skill, diligence, and prudence are all that the law exacts from him. . . . The highest degree of diligence is the rule as to public carriers of passengers, and public policy forbids its relaxation; but a private carrier for hire may discharge himself from liability for accident by showing that he exercised the usual skill, care, and diligence ordinarily exercised by those engaged in the same pursuit, to furnish a safe coach, harness, and horses, and a competent and careful driver."

In determining in the present case the question of the liability of the defendant for the accident resulting from the defective fastening of the thimble to the neck yoke, the proper inquiry was, Was such defect discoverable by the defendant by the exercise of ordinary care,—that is, by such care as is usually exercised by persons of ordinary prudence in the conduct of such livery-stable business?

There is error, and a new trial is ordered.

City Council of AUGUSTA et al., Plffs. in Err.,

v.

Joseph S. REYNOLDS, Solicitor General.

(.....Ga.....)

- *1. A fair occupying 75 or 80 feet in width and 4 blocks in length of an important business street in a city, and consisting of numerous tents, inclosing shows and exhibitions, in front of which are stationed men blowing horns and talking through megaphones to attract attention, together with various other stands, booths, structures, Ferris wheels, merry-go-rounds, and other devices for amusement of the public and profit to the owners; which fair a company of the state militia is permitted to station on the street for a week,—is a public nuisance of a most aggravated nature.
2. There is nothing in the charter of the city of Augusta which permits the city authorities to grant the use of its streets for the operation of an enterprise of the nature above indicated.
3. A court of equity has jurisdiction, at the instance of the solicitor general, to restrain by injunction the erection of a public nuisance.

(May 10, 1905.)

ERROR to the Superior Court for Richmond County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in a suit to enjoin the alleged obstruction of a public street. Affirmed.

Statement by Cobb, J.:

An information was filed in behalf of the state by the solicitor general of the Augusta circuit, upon the petition of named parties, complaining of the city council of Augusta and John D. Twiggs, Jr., as captain of the Oglethorpe Infantry, a company of the state militia. The petition alleged, in substance, as follows: For several years past it has been customary from time to time to hold street fairs or carnivals in the city of Augusta. The city council has granted the defendant Twiggs permission to hold one of such fairs during the first week in May, 1905, on Broad street, which is 180 feet wide, and is the principal business street and thoroughfare in the city. Seventy-five feet of the street in width and 4 blocks in length will be occupied by the tents, buildings, and structures of the fair. The fair will consist of tents, inclosing shows and exhibitions, structures, stands, Ferris wheels, merry-go-rounds, "shoot the chutes," the "loops," and various and sundry devices and constructions and obstructions, and will monopolize the portion of the street in which it is placed. These obstructions will seriously interfere with the use of the street by the public for traffic, travel, and business, and will occasion great hurt and annoyance to the citizens in general. The carnival will consist of a large number of separate shows and exhibitions, each in a separate tent or inclosure, besides numerous stands or booths for the sale of articles of merchandise. Criers or "spielers" will be stationed in front of each tent, show, stand, or booth, who, by the use of horns, megaphones, bells, drums, and similar instruments, will attempt to attract crowds of people in the street to each place. Admission will be charged by the proprietors to the said shows and exhibitions. It is alleged that the city council of Augusta has no authority, under its charter, to permit such an obstruction of its streets as will be made by the carnival; that, the nuisance not being completed, the statutory remedy for the abatement of nuisances is not applicable, and that a separate proceeding would have to be instituted to abate each show or exhibition; and that for these reasons a court of equity has jurisdiction to enjoin the erection of the obstructions composing the fair. The prayer was for such an injunction. The case was heard on demurrer to the petition. The judge granted an interlocutory injunction, and the defendants excepted.

Messrs. O. Henry Cohen and Austin Branch, for plaintiffs in error:

The structures which it is alleged were about to be erected were not of a character, extent, and duration, nor for a purpose, which would constitute them nuisances per se, and only nuisances per se should be enjoined at an interlocutory hearing.

The right of the public in a street is a relative, and not an absolute, one, and Cobb, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. Streets are primarily intended for the use of travelers, and a municipal corporation has no power, in the absence of express legislative authority, to allow a street to be used for any other purpose. Pol. Code 1895, § 745. Any permanent structure in a street which materially interferes with travel thereon is a public nuisance. Permanent structures which do not interfere with travel, and which are erected for public purposes, such as telegraph and telephone poles, and the like, are permissible. But no permanent structure of any character which interferes in the slightest degree with the right of travel upon the street is ever permissible where such structure is erected for purely private purposes. Temporary obstructions in a street are permissible under certain circumstances, even where the obstruction is for the benefit or convenience of an individual. A merchant may temporarily obstruct a passage along a street, either in receiving goods from a carrier on the street, or delivering goods to such carrier. A householder may temporarily obstruct a street in moving his effects out of or into his house. It is impossible to enumerate all the cases in which the temporary obstruction of a street may be allowed, but the general rule is that, if the purpose for which the obstruction is created is lawful, and the obstruction exists only for such a time as is reasonably necessary to accomplish the purpose which brings about the necessity for the obstruction, such an obstruction would not be a public nuisance. What would be a reasonable time is to be determined according to the circumstances of each case. If the obstruction continues for a time that is not reasonably necessary for the accomplishment of the purpose, then it 69 L. R. A.

becomes a public nuisance. What would be an unreasonable time in cases where goods are being received into or delivered from a place of business, or where household effects are being carried into or out of a place of residence, might not be an unreasonable time where the obstruction is made necessary on account of buildings being erected upon property abutting the street. In all cases the obstructions to public travel should be removed as soon as the reason for the obstruction has ceased. To continue to obstruct a public street with those things necessary in case of the erection of a building upon abutting property after the building has reached a stage where such obstructions are no longer necessary in carrying on the work would render the person so continuing the obstruction liable as the maintainer of a public nuisance. Any temporary obstruction in a public street is presumptively a public nuisance, and it is incumbent upon the persons responsible for the presence of such obstruction to show that it was placed in the street in furtherance of a lawful and legitimate purpose, and has not been continued any longer than was reasonably necessary for the accomplishment of this purpose. Persons who have places of business or residences upon lots abutting upon the street may temporarily obstruct the street under those circumstances, where it is necessary to completely enjoy the rights and privileges incident to ownership of property so situated. Persons who own vacant lots abutting upon a street may temporarily obstruct the street whenever necessary to improve such property by the erection of buildings thereon, but no such necessity can ever exist when upon the property to be improved there is ample room for the deposit of all material to be used in the building and the carrying on of all work essential to its construction.

The question to be determined in the present case is whether a street fair of the character described in the petition would be such an obstruction of a public street as would make it a public nuisance. It would not be a permanent obstruction, for it is only to continue one week. Being a temporary obstruction only, it is to be determined whether it results from a lawful purpose. The obstruction is purely for private gain. The fact that the promoter of the enterprise is a military company which is a part of the state militia does not make it one inaugurated for a public purpose. It is to occupy not more than one half of the street. But the public is entitled to the whole of every street as against anyone who places obstructions therein for other than a lawful purpose. Com. v. Ruggles, 6 Allen, 588; 1 Wood, Nuisances, 3d ed. § 250. The power over streets, given to municipal corporations under the ordinary grants in municipal charters, does not authorize the municipal authorities, even by express ordinance, to permit the erection in streets of temporary obstructions for purely private gain. The enterprise described in the petition is not in any sense a public enterprise. It is merely a scheme of private individuals for pecuniary gain, and the use of the street, either in whole or in part, has not as a basis any purpose which the law would recognize as lawful, in the absence of express legislative authority permitting it. In other words, the enterprise sought to be carried on in the street would, if permitted, be nothing more or less than a public nuisance, and a public nuisance of a most aggravating character. See Rea v. Carlile, 6 Car. & P. 636; State v. Laverack, 34 N. J. L. 204; 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 499, 500; Elliott, Roads & Streets, 2d ed. § 648. There are some old English cases which hold that a fair in a highway was permissible, but an examination of those cases will show that the ruling in each was based upon the existence of an immemorial custom. See Elwood v. Bullock, 13 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 330; King v. Smith, 4 Esp. 109. Besides, the old English fairs were very different enterprises from the one described in the present petition.

2. It is therefore to be determined whether there is any authority in the charter of the city of Augusta for permitting a portion of one of its streets to be used for the purpose of a street fair of the character described in the petition. The charter of Augusta contains the ordinary grants in reference to the laying out and control of streets. Blome's Code of Augusta, pp. 308, 455. Those powers do not authorize such a use of the street, and it was not seriously contended in the argument that they did. It is, however, strenuously insisted that, under the act of 1898 (Acts 1898, p. 131) amending the charter of Augusta, the municipal authorities have power to permit such a use of the streets. Taken as a whole, the act seems to be limited to a delegation of power to deal with the streets for railroad and depot purposes. But there is some very broad language in the act, and for the purposes of this case it will be treated as conferring the broader power to deal with the streets for any purpose. The act declares: "When, in the opinion of the city council of Augusta, the whole, or any part of a street, has ceased to be of general utility or use as a street, the city council, in its discretion, may permit platforms, gangways, tracks, or other structures to be constructed upon such level, and with such width, height, length, and 69 L. R. A.

of such material, as it may prescribe and approve, and on such terms and conditions as it may designate; or the city council of Augusta, in its discretion, may declare the same vacant and abandoned as a street, and donate the same to a use which, in their opinion, will be of advantage or utility to the commercial or business interests of the city, on such terms as the city council may prescribe." It is claimed that this confers upon the city authorities the power to vacate a street and use the land for any purpose that may be beneficial to the commercial interests of the city. Let this be conceded. The further contention is made that the power to vacate altogether and for all time carries with it the power to vacate in part and for a limited time. But the exercise of this power is dependent upon the city council having reached the conclusion that the street is no longer of public utility, and before the power to vacate can be exercised it must appear that it is the opinion of the council that the street is no longer of public utility. It not only does not appear that it is the opinion of the city council that the portion of Broad street where permission was granted to hold the street fair has ceased to be of public utility, but it appears from the petition that Broad street is the principal and most important business street in the city, and the use of the street for the fair was limited to one week. The present record does not present any such case as is contemplated by the act of 1898, even under the liberal construction contended for. The council has not exercised any authority based upon an opinion that the portion of Broad street in question has ceased to be of public utility, or will not be of public utility during the week the fair is to be held; but it has simply authorized private individuals, for their own pecuniary benefit, to use a large portion of an important business street, and thereby deprive the public, for several days, of the right to use that portion of the street for traffic or travel. There is absolutely nothing in the act of 1898, or in any other provision of the charter of Augusta, which can be properly construed as authority for the city authorities to permit such a use of one of its streets.

3. The jurisdiction of courts of equity, on the information of the proper public officer in behalf of the public, to restrain the erection or continuance of a public nuisance, is well settled. Columbus v. Jaques, 30 Ga. 506; Lofton v. Collins, 117 Ga. 434, 61 L. R. A. 150, 43 S. E. 708.

Henry E. HOWES et al., Respts.,
v.

Abraham BARMON et al., Appts.

(.....Idaho.....)

- *1. A license is a personal privilege to do certain acts upon the lands of another, but creates no estate therein, is revocable at will, and may rest in parol, while an easement is an estate in real property, and its grant falls within the statute of frauds.
2. Where B. is erecting a two-story building, and proposes to H. & K., who own and occupy a two-story building on the adjoining lot, that he will build a stairway on the side of his building next to H. & K.'s building, and that they may use the same for ingress and egress to and from the second story of their building, in consideration of H. & K. allowing B. to erect a porch on a 5-foot strip of a vacant lot adjoining the back end of B.'s building, and each party agrees thereto, and enters upon the use so agreed upon,—Held, that the permission to use such stairway does not amount to the grant of an easement, but constitutes a license only, and is revocable by the licensor.
3. A court of equity will not grant the aid of specific performance where the party invoking its aid has not parted with any consideration or property, and no irreparable damage is suffered, and no fraud is inflicted upon him, and where he is in statu quo at the time of the commencement of his action.
4. Unless the evidence be clearly to the contrary, a court will presume that a parol agreement to impress real property with a servitude was made with a knowledge of the provisions of the statute of frauds, and was therefore intended as a license only, and not as an easement.

Ailshie, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case the trial court entered a decreed for the specific performance of a parol contract to grant a perpetual easement in a stairway maintained in appellants' building. The principal facts, upon which the decree was entered are briefly as follows: In the month of November, 1899, the respondents, Howes & King, were the owners of lot 6 and the south one half of lot 8 in block 21 in the city of Wallace, on which stood a two-story brick building, the ground floor of which was occupied by them as a store building, and the second floor as a dwelling. About this time the appellants purchased the north half of lot 8, which adjoins the Howes & King property on the east, and began to erect a two-story brick building, 50 feet square. Prior to this time Howes & King had maintained a back stairway to their building, with the landing on the vacant lot purchased by the Barmons, and, in passing from the street to and from their stairway, they passed over this vacant lot. When the Barmons began to build, they tore away the landing, and, of course, left Howes & King without any means of ingress or egress to and from the second story of their building. At this juncture the respondent Howes and the appellant Abraham Barmon had some discussion over the construction of a stairway by the Barmons, and the future use thereof by Howes & King. Up to this time the Barmons had planned to build their stairway on the east side of their building. Howes and Barmon do not agree as to what conversation took place between them with reference to the stairway and the future use thereof, and we therefore quote from the finding of the trial court on that point. He finds "that, during the time of the construction of said building, these defendants offered to give the plaintiffs the use forever of the front stairway leading to the upper story of their said building, and connecting with the upper story of the building so occupied by the plaintiffs and their families, for the consideration of a strip of land of 5 feet on the north part of the south one-half of lot 8, block 21, and plaintiffs agreed to said proposition." This finding of the court is followed by a finding that in the month of November, 1899, in pursuance of said contract, the plaintiffs went into the possession and use of the stairway, and the defendants at the same time went into the possession and use of the 5-foot strip off the north end of the south half of lot 8. This strip of land was contiguous to, and immediately south of, the Barmon premises, on which the building was erected. The record shows that, after the conversation took place between Howes and Barmon, the plans for the Barmon building were so modified as to run the stairway up on the west side of the building, and next to the Howes & King building, instead of on the east side, as originally planned. No written agreement of any kind was entered into, and after the building was completed the stairway was used by the Barmons and their tenants, and also by Howes & King and their tenants. On the other hand, the Barmons, by means of posts, erected a porch 5 feet wide and 50 feet long (the full length of their building) to the second story of the building, and used that, in connection with their residence in the second story of that building, until a few days prior to the commencement of this action. Matters ran along in this manner until about the 14th day of June, 1902, when the Barmons tore away the porch, and ceased to use the same, and notified Howes & King that it was their intention to revoke the license previously granted to them to use the stairway; and they thereupon proceeded to lock up the front entrance and close up the entrance from the top of the stairway into the Howes & King building. The respondents thereupon commenced this action, and secured a temporary injunction against the appellants, restraining them from closing up the stairway or interfering with their free use thereof. The Barmon property was purchased in the name of Fannie Barmon, the wife of the defendant Abraham Barmon, and at all times has stood upon the records in her name, and is claimed by her as her separate property. A great portion of the briefs of counsel has been devoted to the discussion of the evidence on that question, and the law applicable thereto. The court found, however, that the property was the community property of the defendants, and we are inclined to think there is sufficient evidence in the record to justify that finding. It is not necessary for us, however, to discuss the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings, for the reason that, in the view we take of this case, the findings of fact do not support the legal conclusions that the court has drawn from them.

The appellants claim that the privileges exercised by each over the realty of the other were merely mutual licenses, revocable by either at will. On the other hand, the respondents claim that these transactions amounted to mutual contracts for conveyances by good and sufficient deeds,—a title from Howes & King to the Barmons to the 5-foot strip of ground immediately south of the Barmon building, and a conveyance from the Barmons to Howes & King of a perpetual easement in the stairway ascending from the street to the second story of their building.

It is difficult to ascertain from the great mass of conflicting decisions just when a license to use or impose a servitude upon the real property of another ceases to be a mere license revocable at will, and ripens into the certainty and dignity of an easement. Still there are some primary and fundamental principles, well established, which underlie this class of cases, a reference to which should afford a reasonably safe guide.

It is settled law that a license creates no estate in lands, and may therefore rest in parol. Johnson v. Skillman, 29 Minn. 95, 43 Am. Rep. 192, 12 N. W. 149; Mumford v. Whitney, 15 Wend. 380, 30 Am. Dec. 60; Great Falls Waterworks Co. v. Great Northern R. Co. 21 Mont. 487, 54 Pac. 963; Cook v. Stearns, 11 Mass. 533; Clark v. Glidden, 60 Vt. 702, 15 Atl. 358; Wood v. Leadbitter, 13 Mees. & W. 838, 16 English Ruling Cases, 54; Jones, Easements, §§ 63, 68. On the other hand, an easement is an interest or estate in real property, and is subject to the operation of the statute of frauds. Rev. Stat. 1887, § 6007; 14 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1144; Pifer v. Brown, 43 W. Va. 412, 49 L. R. A. 497, and note, 27 S. E. 399; Clark v. Glidden, 60 Vt. 702, 15 Atl. 358; Jones, Easements, § 65. Where the contract or agreement, whether it be called a license or an easement, looks to the acquirement of a right of passage, as in this case, over a stairway, and rests entirely in parol, it is clear, under all the authorities, that the licensee or grantee must have entered into possession, expended money, and made improvements in such manner and to such an extent that a refusal to enforce the agreement in specific terms would work a fraud upon the licensee or grantee. 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 412; 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1146; Baltimore & H. R. Co. v. Algire, 65 Md. 337, 4 Atl. 203. See note to Pifer v. Brown, 49 L. R. A. 497. It is also true that the alleged part performance relied on to take the case out of the statute of frauds must be founded on, and referable solely to, the specific terms of the agreement. Johnson v. Skillman, 29 Minn. 95, 43 Am. Rep. 192, 12 N. W. 149; Wheeler v. Reynolds, 66 N. Y. 227; Wiseman v. Lucksinger, 84 N. Y. 31, 38 Am. Rep. 479. In this case the respondents had parted with nothing whatever. They paid no consideration for the perpetual easement they claim to have purchased. They were out nothing for the construction of the stairway, and the evidence shows that they never at any time have assisted in maintaining or keeping up the stairway, or keeping the same cleaned or lighted; nor did the respondents offer to show upon the trial what agreement, if any, they made with reference to the maintenance of the stairway, or the care and lighting of the same, or the width thereof, or the character of the stairway which should be constructed or maintained. It is true that the appellants entered into the possession and use of the 5-foot strip of land which respondents contend was to be given as a consideration for this easement. But it is not contended anywhere that the use of this strip of land was of any greater value for the same period of time than was the right to pass over the stairway for a like period of time. These rights appear to have been mutual and interchangeable, and one would apparently offset the other. This arrangement or agreement should be interpreted and dealt with in the light of the circumstances under which the parties acted. It is clearly apparent from the testimony of both Howes and Barmon that, whatever conversation or agreement they had, it was merely in the light and spirit of an exchange of neighborly courtesies, and was never given the consideration which the parties would attach to a contract which looks to one party parting with the fee to his property, and the other to burdening his realty with a perpetual servitude. As an instance of this, the title to the property stood on the records in the name of Mrs. Barmon at the time of the agreement, and yet no contract was made with her, and nothing appears to have been said in reference to the transfer of title, or whether or not the property was community property, or the separate property of the wife.

There is no reason shown in this case, that we can discover, why the aid of a court of equity should be invoked in behalf of the plaintiffs. If the court should refuse to decree them a perpetual easement in this stairway, they would be in no worse position than they would have been in the first place, had the Barmons erected their building without permitting plaintiffs to use their stairway. In that event Howes & King would have been under the necessity of erecting a stairway by means of which to reach the second story of their building. They have parted with no consideration for the use of this stairway, nor have they lost any property or right by reason of having neglected to build a stairway themselves. If they are refused a decree in this case, they will only be left in the same position they originally occupied. This is a case where a refusal by the court to grant plaintiffs a decree will leave them absolutely in statu quo. But courts of equity grant relief in such cases upon the principal theory that the parties cannot be placed in the position they originally occupied, and therefore equity will compel them to live up to their agreements. Here the reasons for equitable interposition do not seem to exist, and we do not think it would be either just or con-scionable for a court to encumber the appellants' property with a perpetual servitude, which the evidence shows would depreciate the property from 10 to 25 per cent. The privileges granted by appellants to respondents were evidently of a purely personal character, and would not have been conferred on a stranger to the licensors, even though he had had title to the Howes & King property. But if the easement should be decreed as contended for, it would run with the Howes & King property, and would pass to their grantees, whoever they might be. After the perusal of a great number of conflicting and inharmonious decisions, we have been unable to find any case where the courts have held a license such as this irrevocable on the ground alone that the licensee had been let into possession; but in such cases, where specific performance has been required, the courts have uniformly rested their decisions upon the grounds that the licensee had not only been let into possession, but that he had made expenditures or erected valuable improvements, for which he could not be adequately compensated in damages. Lawrence v. Springer, 49 N. J. Eq. 289, 31 Am. St. Rep. 702, 24 Atl. 933; Wheeler v. Reynolds, 66 N. Y. 227; notes to cases hereinbefore cited. The modern decisions seem strongly inclined to hold a parol agreement looking to encumbering real property with a servitude as a mere license, revocable at will, and this we think the much safer rule. While this court is not now prepared to go to the extent announced in Crosdale v. Lanigan, 129 N. Y. 604, 26 Am. St. Rep. 551, 29 N. E. 824, still the language there used by the New York court appeals to us as both safe and just, when they say: "The courts in this state have upheld with great steadiness the general rule that a parol license to do an act on the land of the licensor, while it justifies anything done by the licensee before revocation, is nevertheless revocable at the option of the licensor; and this, although the intention was to confer a continuing right, and money had been expended by the licensee upon the faith of the license. This is plainly the rule of the statute. It is also, we believe, the rule required by public policy. It prevents the burdening of lands with restrictions founded upon oral agreements easily misunderstood." See also Johnson v. Skillman, 29 Minn. 95, 43 Am. Rep. 192, 12 N. W. 149; Cronkhite v. Cronkhite, 94 N. Y. 323; St. Louis Nat. Stockyards v. Wiggins Ferry Co. 112 Ill. 384, 54 Am. Rep. 243; Wood v. Michigan Air Line R. Co. 90 Mich. 334, 51 N. W. 263. This seems to grow out of the proposition that, since a parol license to impress real property with a servitude cannot be perpetual or irrevcable, on account of the prohibitions of the statute of frauds, and the parties not having complied with the requirements of the statute, they will be presumed to have dealt in conformity with law, and therefore to have intended a license rather than an easement.

The trial court evidently concluded in this case that the acts and conduct of the parties amounted to an executed contract for a perpetual easement over the appellants' property, but we are clearly of the opinion that it only amounted to a license revocable at will. It follows that the judgment must be reversed, and it is so ordered. The cause is remanded, with directions to enter judgment in accordance with the views herein expressed. Costs awarded to appellants.

- *1. Where a motion for a new trial has been made, and the statement used on such motion contained an assignment and specification of errors, and an appeal is taken from the order denying the motion, and the original brief of appellant contains no enumeration of errors relied on, but refers to the transcript and discusses such errors, and prior to the argument in the appellate court a supplemental brief is filed by appellant, making a specific enumeration of such errors, the same will be regarded as a substantial compliance with the rules of this court, and the case will be examined on the merits.
2. Section 4427, Rev. Stat. 1887, gives to an aggrieved party an exception to the ruling of the court in granting or overruling a motion for a new trial, and on appeal from such order the appellant is entitled to have the assignment and specification of errors contained in his statement used on the hearing of such motion examined and considered by the appellate court.
3. A deed absolute on its face cannot be delivered to the grantee therein named, to be by him held in escrow; and a delivery which purports to be such will operate as absolute and freed from all parol conditions, and title will vest at once.

show that a deed delivered to the grantee and absolute on its face shall take effect only upon the performance of some condition or the happening of some contingency unexpressed therein.

6. In such case the vesting of title is determined by the legal effect of the terms of the grant, and cannot be controlled by parol evidence.
7. A grantor cannot by warranty deed, absolute on its face, and free from conditions or restrictions, convey such a title to his grantee as will enable the grantee to pass a good title to a specific corporation, and at the same time attach such parol conditions to the deed upon its delivery as to preclude the grantee from transferring an equally good title to any other person or corporation.
8. Where B. executes a warranty deed free from any conditions or qualifications as to the vesting of title, and delivers it to the grantee, W., accompanied with a contemporaneous parol agreement to the effect that W. shall form a corporation and deed the property to such corporation, and thereupon pay B. $1,000 cash and deliver to B. $5,000 worth of first-mortgage bonds of the corporation secured on the property so deeded, and the deed is placed in the hands of the grantee to facilitate such transaction, —Held, that the delivery was absolute, and title vested at once in the grantee.
9. Even though a valid delivery of a deed had not been made at the time of its execution, still the grantor may thereafter ratify the wrongful taking of the deed by the grantee after the grantor has acquired complete knowledge of the facts of the transaction, and thereby perfect the title.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Canyon County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to quiet title to certain real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. N. M. Ruick and W. E. Borah, for appellant:

There is no rule of pleading and practice which will permit an allegation that a deed was delivered under the terms of a written contract, and proof of the fact that it was delivered under an oral contract, when the question of delivery is not an incident, but goes to the vital controversy in the case, and to the very validity of the deed itself.

If a writing imports upon its face to be a complete expression of the whole agreement, it is to be presumed that the parties have introduced into it every material item and term; and parol evidence cannot be admitted to add another term to the agreement, although the writing contains nothing on the particular one to which the parol evidence is directed.

Messrs. O. O. Haga and Hawley, Puckett, & Hawley, for respondent:

Appellant has assigned no error in this court on which he relies or seeks a reversal of the judgment entered against him, contrary to the established rules of practice and the rules of this court.

On petition for rehearing.

Respondent and Willard White were partners, associated together under the contract of September 7, 1899; the testimony in question consists of admissions and declarations made by one partner to the other during the partnership, and concerning the very matter for which the parties were associated together.

The utmost good faith is due from every member of a partnership towards every other member; and if any dispute arises between partners touching any transaction, by which one seeks to benefit himself at the expense of the firm, or the other member or members, "he will be required to show not only that he has the law on his side, but that his conduct will bear to be tried by the highest standard of honor."

Appellant stands in the shoes of White. White repeatedly stated to his partner and associate Whitney, the man to whom it was his duty fully and truthfully to disclose the facts, that the deed was given to him in trust; that there were restrictions thrown around it; that it was not to be used until the conditions of the contract of December 25th had been complied with.

The rule excluding parol testimony to show conditions attached to a deed was not intended to be binding on the grantee so as to bar him from showing that there were conditions intended which were, in fact, against his interest.

The admissions and declarations against interests made by White are admissible to show that he took the deed of January 25th, 1900, with certain restrictions and conditions.

If Beery conveys to White on condition that White shall convey to a corporation, which shall execute certain bonds, make certain payments to Beery, and construct certain improvements upon the land; and then, if White declines to carry out the conditions, refuses to convey to the corporation, refuses to pay the money or issue the bonds but transfers the property to Dewey in direct violation of the conditions on which the transfer was made, and the latter takes with full notice of the conditions, —cannot Beery, or those claiming under him, maintain an action under § 4538, Rev. Stat. 1887, against the pretended claim of Dewey?

Appellant is estopped, by the established rules of estoppel, from asserting title in himself.

Atlashe, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A motion was made in this case to strike from the files the "supplemental brief of appellant," upon the grounds that the same was filed without permission of court having been obtained, and for the further reason that there is no authority in law, or any rule of this court, for the filing of a supplemental brief. It appears that within the time prescribed by the rules of this court the appellant served his brief upon the respondent, but the original brief filed by appellant contains no enumeration of errors relied on for a reversal of the judgment. The original brief, however, discusses errors complained of, and refers to the page and folio of the transcript containing the same. Appellant made a motion for a new trial in the lower court, and his statement on motion for new trial contains specific assignments of error covering nine pages of the transcript, and are directed at both the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings, decision, and judgment of the trial court, as well as errors of law occurring at the trial in the admission and exclusion of evidence. After the service of the original brief, and prior to the calling of the case for oral argument, appellant prepared, served, and filed what he termed a "supplemental brief of appellant," in which he specifically enumerates the errors relied on for a reversal of the judgment; and 69 L. R. A.

it is this brief that respondent seeks to have stricken from the files.

Respondent has furnished us with a great many authorities to the effect that a failure on the part of the appellant to assign errors is fatal to the appeal, and that in such a case the appellate court cannot, and will not, examine the transcript for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not error has been committed. Purdy v. Steel, 1 Idaho, 216, holds that "all exceptions taken in the court below will be treated as waived, unless the matters so excepted to are assigned as error in this court;" and from the opinion in that case it seems that no assignment of error was ever made, either in the trial court on motion for a new trial, or contained in the statement, or enumerated in the brief in this court. United States v. Tidball, 3 Ariz. 384, 29 Pac. 385; Putnam v. Putnam, 3 Ariz. 182, 24 Pac. 320; and Charouleau v. Shields (Ariz.) 76 Pac. 821, are all from the Arizona supreme court, and rest upon the peculiar statutes of that territory. An examination of these cases discloses the fact that there is a statute in Arizona requiring the assignment of errors to be filed with the clerk of the trial court prior to the printing of the transcript, and the supreme court has held that such statute is mandatory. Haas v. Pueblo County, 5 Colo. 125, holds that a failure to file any assignment of errors in the appellate court, either at the time of filing the transcript or thereafter, is fatal, and that the appeal will be dismissed. There a court rule requires the appellant to assign errors at the time of filing the transcript of record, and provides that the appeal or writ of error will be dismissed for failure to do so. Rehberg v. Greiser, 24 Mont. 487, 62 Pac. 820, 63 Pac. 41, is from the supreme court of Montana, and is a case where the appeal was dismissed for failure to set out any specification of errors, and is founded on a rule very similar to paragraph 1 of rule 6 of this court (22 Mont. xxx., 57 Pac. vi.); but the court there held that the filing of such an enumeration of errors was not jurisdictional, and in the course of the opinion referred to the fact that in other cases the court had disallowed motions to dismiss for such failure. It was held, however, that the particular case then under consideration did not present such facts as would justify them in disallowing the motion. Broveli v. Bianchi, 136 Cal. 612, 69 Pac. 416, simply holds that upon an appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial, where "the evidence is not pointed out in the brief of appellant, and no suggestion made as to the respects wherein the evidence fails to support the findings," the court "will not endeavor to discover the respects wherein the evidence is insufficient, but will presume that it supports every material finding of fact." Schroeder v. Schmidt, 74 Cal. 459, 16 Pac. 243, holds that an "error [committed] in granting a nonsuit . . . cannot be reviewed on an appeal from an order refusing a new trial, unless it was excepted to on the trial, and specified as error in the statement or bill of exceptions." The numerous other authorities cited by respondent on this point are practically to the same effect as those just reviewed. It does not appear from these authorities that the courts are inclined to refuse to examine a case on appeal where the errors have been assigned and specified in the statement on motion for new trial and are contained in the transcript on appeal, even though they are not specifically enumerated in the brief. In this case, however, appellant has substantially complied with the rule in filing his supplemental brief, enumerating the errors, prior to the case being called for argument in this court.

Respondent also contends that the appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial cannot be considered in this court, on the ground that it has not been urged or assigned as error on appeal. Section 4427, Rev. Stat. 1887, allows an aggrieved party an exception as a matter of law to an order denying his motion for a new trial; and, since the appellant had assigned his errors in the statement and bill of exceptions used on the hearing of the motion, and had pointed out the insufficiency of the evidence to support certain findings as well as the errors of law committed at the trial, he is entitled now, upon his appeal from such order, to have those assignments of error examined and considered in this court. It is true that some of the courts, to whose decisions counsel have called our attention, have established a contrary rule; but our appellate practice is cumbersome enough at best, and we are not inclined to place such a construction on the statute and hold to such a technical observance of the rules of this court as will make appeals any more difficult of prosecution than they are at present. For the foregoing reasons, respondent's motion will be denied, and the case will be examined on its merits.

This action was commenced by plaintiff, W. G. Whitney, praying for a decree of the court quieting his title in and to lots 1, 2, 3, 5, and 6, in section 22, township 7 N., R. 1 west, Boise meridian, and situate in Boise and Canyon counties, and for a perpetual injunction against the defendant thereafter asserting any claim whatever in or to the premises described. The defendant answered, denying plaintiff's right and title, 69 L. R. A.

and setting up title in himself, in and to an undivided one-half interest in the premises described in the complaint. In order to properly understand this case, it is necessary to recite somewhat at length the history of the dealings and transactions between the plaintiff, Whitney, Willard White (defendant's grantor), and I. R. Beery (the grantor to both the plaintiff and White). The contract out of which all subsequent troubles seem to have grown was entered into on the 7th day of September, 1899, between the plaintiff, Whitney, and Willard White, and is as follows:

"This agreement witnesseth:

Whereas, W. G. Whitney and Willard White having acquired a dam, log storage and power site on the Payette river, at a point called the Black Rock Canyon about 6 miles above the town of Emmett, in Canyon county, Idaho, and,

Whereas, it is proposed to secure sufficient funds with which to erect a dam at said site, about 30 feet in height with a view to creating a large water power to be used in sawing lumber, elevating water upon both sides of the Payette river, for the purpose of irrigation, and for generating electric power to be utilized for railway and such other purposes as may be found feasible.

Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises, each of the parties hereto agrees to give his best efforts to the immediate accomplishment of the above-mentioned project, and does agree that the parties hereto are to own an equal interest in such undertaking, share and share alike.

It is further agreed that, in the event the said White shall fail to raise sufficient funds to construct said dam, or fails to make such progress as shall be satisfactory to said Whitney within one year from the date hereof, the said White agrees to assign all his right, title, and interest in the same to said Whitney.

Witness our hands and seals this 7th day of September, 1899.

Witnessed by: W. Garret Whitney.
Ben I. Bloch. Willard White.

According to the testimony, White, in pursuance of the terms of the contract of September 7th, went east for the purpose of raising money and procuring a contract for the proposed dam site, and on the 28th day of December of the same year entered into a contract with I. R. Beery, of Minneapolis, Minn., as follows:

This agreement made and entered into this 28th day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-nine.

Between I. R. Beery, of Minneapolis, Minnesota, the party of the first part, and Willard White of Boise, Idaho, party of the second part,

Witnesseth, that the said party of the first part for and in consideration of the covenants and agreements on the part of the said party of the second part hereinafter contained, agrees to sell and convey unto the said party of the second part, and the said second party agrees to buy, all those certain lots, pieces, and parcels of land, situate in the counties of Canyon and Boise, in the state of Idaho, and more particularly described as follows, to wit: Lots one (1), two (2), three (3), five (5), and six (6) of Section twenty-two (22), Township seven (7) North, Range one (1) West, B. M., for the sum of $6,000.

And the said party of the second part in consideration of the premises agrees to pay to the said party of the first part the sum of $6,000, to wit:

One thousand dollars in cash on or before February 1st, 1900, and $5,000 in first-mortgage bonds in a corporation to be formed for the purpose of developing a power plant at a point upon the above-described property known as the Black Rock Canyon, said bonds to be issued upon said property and upon such improvements as shall be placed thereon.

And the said party of the second part agrees to pay all state and county taxes or assessments of whatsoever nature which are now or may become due on the premises above described.

In the event of failure to comply with the terms hereof by the said party of the second part, the said party of the first part shall be relieved from all obligations in law or equity to convey said property, and the said party of the second part shall forfeit all right thereto at the option of the party of the first part. And the said party of the first part, on receiving such payment at the time and in the manner above mentioned, agrees to execute and deliver to the said party of the second part or to his assigns a good and sufficient deed for the conveying and assuring to the said party of the second part the title to the above-described premises free and clear of encumbrances other than the taxes hereinbefore mentioned. And it is understood that the aforesaid stipulations are to apply to and bind the heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns of the respective parties, and that the said party of the second part is to have immediate possession of said premises.

In witness whereof, the said parties have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written.

I. R. Beery,
Willard White.

Thereafter, and on the 25th day of January, 1900, I. R. Beery and wife made and executed their warranty deed to the entire tract of land and premises described in the complaint in this action, and in such deed named Willard White as the grantee, and on the date of its execution the deed was placed in the hands of the grantee, White, at the city of Minneapolis, and was thereafter by White brought back to the state of Idaho, and has ever since been in White's possession and control. As to whether or not the deed of January 25th was ever actually delivered within the contemplation of law is a vital question in this case.

The next important step in the course of these transactions occurred on April 25, 1900, when Beery and White entered into a new agreement, which by its terms provided that it should take the place of the former agreement, of date December 26th. The important part of the agreement of April 25th, and that which has any special bearing upon the matters in controversy in this action, is as follows:

Witnesseth, that whereas, I. R. Beery, party of the first part, is the equitable owner of the real property hereinafter described, while Willard White, party of the second part, holds the legal title thereto by virtue of a deed heretofore executed by the said I. R. Beery, and wife, under an agreement heretofore entered into by and between said Beery and said White, and

Whereas, it is desired by the parties to enter into a new and different agreement at this time in relation thereto,

Now, therefore, for and in consideration of the mutual covenants hereinafter contained, and to be by said parties paid, kept, and performed, it is agreed: That said Willard White has this day become the owner, absolute, of the equitable as well as the legal title to a one-half interest, undivided, in the property hereinafter described, for the consideration of seven hundred and fifty dollars ($750.00), $150 of which said gross sum has this day been paid, the receipt whereof by said Beery is hereby acknowledged; $100 is to be paid on or before May 15th, 1900, and the remainder of said sum of $750, to wit, $500, is to be paid on or before January 1st, 1901.

Thereafter, and on the 13th day of May, 1901, the plaintiff, Whitney, secured from Beery a quitclaim deed to the lands and premises in controversy, the title to which he seeks to quiet by this action, and which title is derived from Beery through the medium of this deed alone. On the 7th day of August, 1901, White executed and delivered a quitclaim deed of an undivided one-half interest in and to the property described, to R. M. Cobban and George H. Casey, and on September 27, 1902, Cobban and Casey by a quitclaim deed conveyed their undivided one-half interest to the defendant, Dewey. Dewey traces his title through a chain of quitclaim deeds back to the warranty deed executed by Beery and wife on January 25, 1900.

At the trial the court permitted the plaintiff to introduce the testimony of I. R. Beery and other witnesses, showing a parol agreement and understanding had between White and Beery at the time of the execution of the deed of January 25th, and by the terms of which agreement it is contended that the deed of January 25th was delivered upon conditions thereafter to be performed and complied with by the grantee, White, and on the failure to perform which no title should pass under the deed. The defendant objected to the introduction of this class of testimony, upon the grounds that the complaint alleges that the deed was placed in the hands of White with the understanding that the same should take effect and pass title from Beery to White only upon a compliance by White with the terms and conditions of the contract of December 26th, and that to permit parol testimony would be to contradict a written contract, and for the further reason that parol evidence is not admissible for the purpose of showing the terms and conditions under which a deed, absolute on its face, was delivered into the possession of White. The substance of the evidence given on this point is fairly stated by the grantor, Beery, in his testimony, as follows: "Mr. White first visited me about the 26th of December, 1899, when this contract was executed. Then he returned on the 25th of January, at the time we made the deed. At this time I executed and delivered to him this deed, placed it in his possession personally at the time he was in Minneapolis, and he carried it back to Idaho. I placed it in his hands so that the matter could be closed up promptly in connection with the transferring of the property to the corporation that was contemplated; these bonds were to be paid, and an issue of bonds on this property and power plant and ditches, etc., contemplated. I was to be paid when the matter was consummated and the bonds ready to be issued. The deed was placed in his hands to facilitate the matter, and so that we all could save time. He could pay me when he used the deed, just as though I sent the deed to him to hold. It was a matter of trust with me." Other witnesses testified to subsequent statements made by White to the same effect.

The deed of January 25th from Beery to White was without any condition or reservation whatever expressed on the face of the instrument, and, so far as can be gathered from the indenture itself, it is absolute. It is admitted that this deed was delivered by the grantor into the personal and manual possession and control of the grantee, and passed completely from the control and direction of the grantor. The contention made by plaintiff on this point is about as follows: That, under the agreement of December 26th, White was expected to form a corporation for the construction of a big dam on the Payette river, with its site upon the lands in controversy, for the purposes of power and irrigation, and that, as soon as the corporation should be organized, the title to this property should be conveyed to such corporation, and thereupon Beery should be paid the sum of $1,000, and delivered $5,000 worth of first-mortgage bonds to be issued by such corporation in full payment for the property. And the plaintiff contends that the deed of January 25th was executed and delivered under the terms and conditions of the agreement of December 26th, and that it was mutually understood and agreed between the grantor and grantee at the time that the corporation should be formed, and that accordingly this deed was delivered to White in order to facilitate the transaction, and enable White to immediately convey the property to the corporation and perfect the title, and qualify the corporation to issue the bonds in payment of the balance of the purchase price. As above observed, this deed was delivered to the grantee, and contained upon its face no conditions whatever precedent to the vesting of title. Appellant insists that the facts disclosed in this case show an absolute delivery of the deed, and that parol evidence was inadmissible to attach any condition to the vesting of title under such a deed.

It is a well-settled principle of law that a deed cannot be delivered by the grantor to the grantee therein named to be held by the grantee in escrow. If such thing be done, the result is that title vests at once in the grantee. The holder of an escrow must be a third party, who for such purpose becomes the agent of both the grantor and grantee. In 13 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 504, the writer of the text says: "A deed cannot be delivered as an escrow to the grantee, and a delivery which purports to be such will operate as an absolute one. This rule, however, applies only to those deeds which are upon their face complete contracts requiring nothing but delivery to make them perfect, and does not apply to those which upon their face import that something besides delivery is necessary to be done in order to make them complete." The writer cites many authorities in support of that text. In 1 Devlin on Deeds, § 314, it is said: "A deed cannot be delivered to the grantee as an escrow. If it be delivered to him, it becomes an operative deed, freed from any condition not expressed in the deed itself, and it will vest the title in him, though this may be contrary to the intention of the parties. One of the grounds upon which this rule is based is that parol evidence is inadmissible to show that the deed was to take effect upon condition." The author thereupon proceeds to quote as a part of the text, and with approval, from the opinion of Harris, J., in Lawton v. Sager, 11 Barb. 349, in whose opinion the following language is used: "Whether a deed has been delivered or not is a question of fact, upon which, from the very nature of the case, parol evidence is admissible. But whether a deed, when delivered, shall take effect absolutely or only upon the performance of some condition not expressed therein, cannot be determined by parol evidence. To allow a deed absolute upon its face to be avoided by such evidence would be a dangerous violation of a cardinal rule of evidence." In Braman v. Bingham, 26 N. Y. 492, the court of appeals said: "The reason given for the rule excluding parol evidence of a conditional delivery to the grantee applies to all cases where the delivery is designed to give effect to the deed, in any event, without the further act of the grantor. 'When the words are contrary to the act, which is the delivery, the words are of none effect.' Co. Litt. 36a. 'Because then a bare averment, without any writing, would make void every deed.' Williams v. Greene, Cro. Eliz. pt. 2, p. 884. 'If I seal my deed and deliver it to the party himself, to whom it is made, as an escrow upon certain conditions, etc., in this case, let the form of the words be what it will, the delivery is absolute, and the deed shall take effect as his deed presently.' Shep. Touch. 59; Wyddon's Case, Cro. Eliz. pt. 2, p. 520; Cruise's Dig. title 33, Deeds, chap. 2, § 80. If a delivery to the grantee can be made subject to one parol condition, I see no ground of principle which can exclude any parol condition. The deed having been delivered to the grantee, I think the parol evidence that the delivery was conditional was properly excluded." The authorities to the foregoing effect might be multiplied, of which the following appear to be some of the leading cases: Blewitt v. Boorum, 142 N. Y. 357, 40 Am. St. Rep. 600, 37 N. E. 120; Darling 69 L. R. A.

v. Butler, 10 L. R. A. 469, 45 Fed. 332; Miller v. Fletcher, 27 Gratt. 403, 21 Am. Rep. 359; Richmond v. Morford, 4 Wash. 337, 30 Pac. 242, 31 Pac. 513; Hubbard v. Greeley, 84 Me. 340, 17 L. R. A. 511, 24 Atl. 799. In the latter case it was said: "An escrow is a deed delivered to a stranger, to be delivered by him to the grantee upon the performance of some condition or the happening of some contingency, and the deed takes effect only upon the second delivery. Till then, the title remains in the grantor. And if the delivery is in the first instance directly to the grantee, and he retains the possession of it, there can be no second delivery, and the deed must take effect on account of the first delivery, or it can never take effect at all. And, if it takes effect at all, it must be according to its written terms. Oral conditions cannot be annexed to it. It will therefore be seen that a delivery to the grantee himself is utterly inconsistent with the idea of an escrow. And it is perfectly well settled by all the authorities, ancient and modern, that an attempt to thus deliver a deed as an escrow cannot be successful; that, in all cases where such deliveries are made, the deeds take effect immediately and according to their terms, divested of all oral conditions."

Counsel for respondent contend that, while there was a manual delivery of the deed, there was no intention to pass title, and that on that theory of the case the evidence admitted was proper and competent to show such fact. While it is not directly contended that the grantee can hold a deed in escrow from his grantor, the argument of counsel, as applied to the facts of this case, would amount in the end to such a position. The leading authorities cited by respondent in support of this position are 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 154: Black v. Sharkey, 104 Cal. 279, 37 Pac. 939; Lee v. Richmond, 90 Iowa, 695, 57 N. W. 613; Steel v. Miller, 40 Iowa, 403; Bunn v. Stuart, 183 Mo. 375, 81 S. W. 1091; Hastings v. Vaughn, 5 Cal. 315. In 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 154, under the heading of "What is Delivery—(c) A Question of Intention," the author says: "The real test of delivery is this: Did the grantor, by his acts or words, or both, intend to divest himself of title? If so, the deed is delivered." By the foregoing language we do not understand the writer to mean that, where the question of the delivery of the deed arises, parol testimony may be introduced tending to show the intention of the parties to such an extent as to control the vesting of title contrary to the express written language of the deed itself, or, in other words, attach conditions to the deed; and, indeed the authorities cited by the author in support of the text do not go to such an extent. Counsel quote at length from Black v. Sharkey, 104 Cal. 279, 37 Pac. 939, where the court uses language that would indicate the view that evidence might be introduced to prove that the parties did not intend the deed should take effect according to its terms; but it should be observed that in that case the only question under consideration, and the only one decided, was whether or not parol evidence might be introduced to show that the deed which had been duly executed and was found in the possession of the grantee had ever been in fact delivered. The opinion in that case is by the court commissioners, and makes no reference to the former case of Mowry v. Heney, 86 Cal. 471, 25 Pac. 17. The latter opinion was by the court, and it was there expressly held that, "when an absolute deed has been delivered to the grantee, the title becomes vested free from any conditions, and its operation cannot be defeated by parol proof of an intention on the part of the grantor, known to the grantee, that it should not take effect except in event of the grantor's death; nor is parol evidence admissible to show that the delivery of the deed to the grantee was subject to any condition not expressed therein." We cannot, therefore, view the Black-Sharkey Case as in any way overruling or modifying Mowry v. Heney. Hastings v. Vaughn was to the same effect as the latter case. In Lee v. Richmond the Iowa court held that there had been no delivery of the deed, and that the instrument had reached the hands of the grantee, not by way of delivery as a consummation of the transaction, but for inspection and approval of another person; the court saying: "The deed was not to be regarded as delivered unless the settlement attempted was approved by Fulton, and, as it was not approved by him, there was never in law any delivery, and the deed is without effect." Steel v. Miller was a suit apparently founded on fraud in the transaction, and the court held that the minds of the parties had never met on the question of a delivery, and that no legal delivery ever took place. The evidence in the case appears, however, to be directed at the specific question of delivery alone. In Bunn v. Stewart a father appears to have executed deeds in favor of certain of his children and grandchildren, with the intention of retaining them until such future time as he saw fit to deliver them in the distribution of his estate, but later he became entangled in divorce proceedings, and placed certain of the deeds in controversy in the hands of two of the grantees with instructions to hold them until he called for their return, but the grantees, contrary to his instructions, placed them of record, and the supreme court of Missouri held upon that state of facts that no legal delivery ever took place.

The extent to which the intention of the parties enters into the act of delivery of a deed is very fairly stated by the author in 13 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 561, and the authorities cited in support thereof. It is beyond controversy that the evidence of delivery must come from without the deed. In other words, a deed never shows upon its face nor by the terms thereof a delivery, and parol evidence thereof must necessarily be admitted when the question of delivery arises. And it will, perhaps, often be difficult to accurately determine the exact extent to which the intention of the parties is admissible as to the ultimate result of divesting the grantor of title; but such testimony should never be considered by the court to the extent of governing and controlling the express terms of the instrument, where it is clear that a delivery has been made, even though the parties have mistakenly supposed the legal effect would be different. Of course, such evidence would be competent if it should be shown that under no circumstances, and in no event, and under no conditions was the title ever to pass from the grantor, because such a showing would disprove a legal delivery. It would show a failure to consummate the contract and sale of the property. But where it is the intention of the parties for the title to pass upon any contingency or in any event from the grantor to the grantee, and the deed is delivered to the grantee, absolute on its face, then the vesting of title becomes a question of law, and must date from the delivery, and, since the grantee cannot act as the agent of both himself and the grantor for the purpose of a second delivery, title must necessarily have passed upon the original delivery. This rule is very clearly stated by the New York court in Braman v. Bingham, 26 N. Y. 492, where it was said: "The reason given for the rule excluding parol evidence of a conditional delivery to the grantee applies to all cases where the delivery is designed to give effect to the deed, in any event, without the further act of the grantor." See also Hubbard v. Greeley, 84 Me. 340, 17 L. R. A. 511, 24 Atl. 799.

In this case, giving the respondent the most favorable construction that can possibly be placed upon the evidence, it was the intention of the grantor, Beery, to vest title in his grantee, White, so as to enable the grantee to transfer a perfect title to the proposed corporation. Beery expected to receive $5,000 worth of first-mortgage bonds of the corporation as a balance of payment of the purchase price of the property. Such bonds would have been valueless to Beery unless the corporation could secure a good and perfect title to the property on which the mortgage bonds were to issue. Now, then, the question arises, Could the grantor, Beery, by warranty deed, absolute on its face, convey such a title to his grantee as would enable the grantee to pass a good and perfect title to the corporation, and at the same time attach such parol conditions to the deed upon its delivery as to preclude his grantee from conveying and transferring an equally good title to any other person or corporation? We must answer this question unqualifiedly in the negative. If the grantor, Beery, desired to limit the right of his grantee to transfer this property to any particular person or corporation, it was necessary to express that limitation upon the face of the instrument. For the foregoing reasons, we are clearly satisfied that the court erred in receiving and considering the evidence offered for the purpose of showing a failure to vest title in the grantee.

There is another significant fact in this case, and one which alone would prevent the plaintiff from quieting his title under a quitclaim deed to the undivided one-half interest held by him, and that reason is found in the agreement of April 25th. It is there recited that the parties desire to enter into a "new and different agreement," and the agreement provides "that, whereas, I. R. Beery, party of the first part, is the equitable owner of the real property hereinafter described, while Willard White, party of the second part, holds the legal title thereto by virtue of a deed heretofore executed, . . . now, therefore, . . . it is agreed: That said Willard White has this day become the owner, absolute, of the equitable as well as the legal title to a one-half interest, undivided, in the property hereinafter described." It readily appears from the provisions of this agreement that whatever may have been the understandings and agreements between Beery and White at the time of the delivery of the deed, thereafter they adjusted those matters, entered into a new agreement, and Beery ratified and confirmed the delivery of the deed,—at least to the extent of an undivided one-half interest; and consequently, at the time of the execution of the quitclaim deed to Whitney, Beery had no right, title, or interest in and to such undivided interest in this property. Even though a valid delivery of the deed had not been made at the time of its execution, it is settled law that the grantor may thereafter ratify the wrongful taking of a deed after he has complete knowledge of the facts of the taking, and 69 L. R. A.

thereby perfect the title. 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 155, and authorities cited; 13 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 565, and notes.

It has been suggested that, since the appellant takes his title by quitclaim deed, he is for that reason chargeable with notice that the title of his grantor is doubtful, and that he is therefore not a bona fide purchaser. This appears to be conceded by counsel, but the same principle applies with equal force to the respondent, who takes title likewise by quitclaim deed. Under this line of authorities both parties would be equally chargeable with notice of defects in their grantor's title. 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 106, and notes; Leland v. Isenbeck, 1 Idaho, 469; Butte Hardware Co. v. Frank, 25 Mont. 344, 65 Pac. 4; Anderson v. Thunder Bay River Boom Co. 57 Mich. 216, 23 N. W. 776; Wetzstein v. Laregey, 27 Mont. 212, 70 Pac. 717; Dickerson v. Colgrove, 100 U. S. 578, 25 L. ed. 618. It is doubtful, however, if such a rule could or ought to prevail under the recording laws of this state.

Respondent contends that, even though it be conceded that title passed from Beery to White, nevertheless, under the partnership agreement of September 7th between White and Whitney, White was unable to part with any title to anyone other than Whitney himself. This contention is based upon that clause in the contract of September 7th reading as follows: "It is further agreed that in the event the said White shall fail to raise sufficient funds to construct such dam, or fails to make such progress as shall be satisfactory to said Whitney within one year from the date hereof, the said White agrees to assign all his right, title, and interest in the same to said Whitney." It is conceded that White did not raise the necessary funds within the time prescribed, but it is equally true that the two, White and Whitney, continued in the possession of the property, and to some extent operated upon the property, for considerable time after the expiration of the year. White never assigned his interest to Whitney, nor does it appear that Whitney ever demanded that he do so, except to demand that White convey to him an interest acquired under the deed of January 25th. The appellant in this case only claims an undivided one-half interest in the property. He is the successor in interest of White. The respondent acquired a quitclaim deed from Beery to the entire property. He must therefore, so far at least as is disclosed by this record, own the other undivided one-half interest in the property. They are therefore on equal footing. A rule which in equity would preclude White from acquiring an interest in the property to the exclusion of his partner, Whitney, would apply with equal force to Whitney. This is not an action by the plaintiff to compel White, or his grantor with notice, to assign any interest acquired under the partnership agreement, and as to whether or not an agreement such as the one above quoted, stipulating for assignment, could be made the basis upon which a court of equity would declare a forfeiture, is a matter on which we are not required in this case to express any opinion.

The judgment of the lower court will be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in harmony with the views herein expressed. So ordered. Costs awarded to appellant.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, the following response thereto was handed down May 31, 1905:

Respondent's petition for a rehearing in this case does not present anything new, or any question not originally considered by us, though it again discusses some questions which we did not deem it necessary to pass upon in the original opinion. The persistence with which counsel insists that we have mistaken both the law and the equities in this case has led us to again examine the case at length, and, after so doing, we are unable to see wherein the judgment of the trial court could be affirmed. It must necessarily be true that the court cannot see either the law or the equities of a case in the same light in which they are viewed by counsel for the losing party, and it may be, indeed, that sometimes the court mistakes them entirely. However, notwithstanding counsel's studied argument to the contrary, we are convinced that this is not a case where we have mistaken either.

We are asked in the petition to announce more definitely the position of the court as to what title White took under the deed of January 25th. The only interest the appellant claims, and for which he is litigating, is an undivided one-half interest in this property, and we have held that under the record he is entitled to such interest. Under the deed of January 25th, the entire legal title passed from Beery to White. Under the contract of April 25th, Beery recognized that the entire legal title had passed from him, and that all the interest he retained in the property was an equity. What that equity was is not recited, but we would infer from the record that it consisted in a vendor's lien for the unpaid purchase price. By that contract Beery parted absolutely with all of his equity in an undivided one-half interest in this property. It therefore follows that after the execution of the contract of April 25, 1900, both the legal title to the entire property and equitable title to an undivided one-half interest therein was vested in White, and that by the terms of that agreement White recognized a remaining equity in Beery to the other undivided half interest in this property, and for that equity agreed to pay the sum of $750 on or before January 1, 1901. White does not appear to have paid this sum, or to have received any further deed from Beery to his equity in this remaining half interest. On the contrary, Whitney appears to have received a deed from Beery for the entire tract of land on May 13, 1901. So far as the facts, therefore, disclosed by this record are concerned, we conclude that the appellant, Dewey, now owns an undivided one-half interest in the property as described in the deed taken by him, and Whitney the other one-half interest.

It is suggested that White acquired all the interest he obtained in this property while sustaining a fiduciary relation toward Whitney, his partner, under the agreement of September 7, 1899. This, we think, is correct, and it is equally true with reference to Whitney. But counsel contends that this relation had been terminated prior to the date on which Whitney acquired his deed. To this we cannot assent. The contract of September 7th was made for a period of one year, and yet respondent repeatedly admits in his testimony that they continued to do business in all respects as though it were still in force and effect from the date upon which it was executed until the 1st of April, 1901, and that all that then occurred looking to the termination of the partnership relation consisted merely in respondent notifying White that he was going to declare the matter off. It takes more than a notice of this kind to dissolve a partnership and terminate a trust or fiduciary relation existing between partners. If White acquired the entire title, one half thereof would undoubtedly have inured to the benefit of his partner, Whitney. If, on the other hand, he acquired only a one-half interest in the property, and in the meanwhile, and during the existence of that relation, and in pursuance thereof, his partner acquired the other half interest, then such interest and equities must offset each other, and the obligations resting upon them by reason of such relation will be met in that respect.

Again, it is insisted by counsel that White and his grantee are estopped to now assert title to this property on account of the declarations and statements made by White to Whitney and others after receiving the deed from Beery. These statements were of the same character as the testimony of Beery concerning the conditions imposed on White upon the delivery of the deed. It is not contended by appellant that the statements which are claimed to have been made by White after receiving this deed were not true. It would appear from this record that if he made these statements he was, as a matter of fact, only stating what had actually occurred. But the trouble is that the law will not permit parol testimony of such matters to defeat the vesting of title. If, therefore, the statements he made were true concerning such matters, they were not of such a character as to prejudice the respondent, or in any way to deceive him as to the facts or mislead him in his action or conduct. The respondent is presumed to have known, as a matter of law, that such conditions could not be attached to a deed upon its delivery to the grantee, and, having had full notice of the execution of the deed and of the agreements and contracts in relation thereto, he was, as a matter of law, neither deceived nor prejudiced by the statements or declarations so made. So long as he obtains his share as a partner in the fruits of the enterprise, he has no cause for complaint.

It should be further observed that it nowhere appears that any of these statements or declarations made by White were subsequent to the contract of April 25th. It would, appear, however, from the record that they must have been made prior to that time.

It seems to us from a reading of the record before us that respondent must have understood that he and his associate, White, were acquiring title by virtue of the deed of January 25th and contract of April 25th, or else he would not have continued to occupy and improve the property for a period of more than a year thereafter. They do not appear to have had any other contract or agreement whereby they could acquire the title to that property, as they had failed to make their payments under the contract of December 28th, and that contract had been superseded by the contract of April 25th. It does not seem reasonable that respondent would have spent a year's time and labor on this property unless he felt that he had title or legal and binding obligations whereby he, or he and his associate, could acquire title thereto.

Other questions were argued by respondent in his brief, and have also been presented in his petition for rehearing, but we do not think they properly arise upon this appeal, nor is the record in such a condition as to justify us in discussing them. Besides, a legal determination of some of the points urged would necessitate other parties to the action in order to give them any binding effect.

We find no reason for granting a rehearing in this case, and it will therefore be denied.

Sullivan, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to compel specific performance of a contract for the conveyance of real estate situated in Moscow, Latah county. It appears from the record: That the respondents are husband and wife, and that on the 7th day of January, 1895, the husband purchased the E. ½ of lots 4, 5, and 6 in block 2, Fry's addition to the town of Moscow, Latah county, and the consideration paid therefor was money acquired by the respondent Jay Woodworth subsequent to the marriage of the respondents. That on the 20th day of March, 1895, while respondents were residing on said premises and occupying the same as a homestead, the respondent Lillie I. filed her declaration of homestead upon said premises. That some time prior to the 30th day of August, 1901, the respondents had removed from Moscow, in the county of Latah, to Wallace, in the county of Shoshone, and that respondent Woodworth had listed said property for sale with real-estate agents residing and doing business in said town of Moscow at the price of $1,500; and on said last-mentioned date the appellant paid to said agents for the respondent $25 for a thirty-day option to purchase said premises, and thereafter, on the 20th day of September, the appellant took up said option, and orally promised the said agents to purchase said premises, and to pay the sum of $1,500 therefor, as follows, to wit: To assume a mortgage upon said premises executed by the respondents to the Vermont Loan & Trust Company to secure the payment of $950, together with interest thereon, and $550 in cash; and thereupon, with the consent of said agents, the appellant entered into the possession of said premises, and moved his family into the residence situated upon said premises, and has ever since occupied the whole of said premises as a residence, all of which was known to the respondents. That, instead of paying said $550 as agreed, the same was paid in payments as follows: November 1, 1901, $100; December 1, 1901, $175; January 4, 1902, $100; July 6, 1902, $100; September 16, 1902, $100; aggregating in all the total sum of $525. Said sums were paid over by the agents to the respondent Jay Woodworth. That after said payments were made the appellant personally demanded of Jay Woodworth a deed to said premises, and offered to pay him then and there the $25 still due on the purchase price, with interest on all deferred payments, and the said Woodworth promised to execute a conveyance to said premises as soon as he conveniently could. That after the appellant had entered into possession of said premises he made improvements thereon of the value of $250. That after appellant had so entered into the possession the respondent Lillie I. was informed of the improvements made thereon, and knew that said improvements had been made and possession taken by the appellant under the belief that he was the owner of said premises, and to all of which said Lillie I. made no objection, and consented thereto. Thereafter, in the month of March, 1903, the appellant again tendered the respondents the sum of $25, as the balance still due on the purchase price, and demanded of them that they execute to him a good and sufficient deed of conveyance to said premises, which demand the respondent then and there refused, and the respondent Jay Woodworth, when asked his reason for refusing to execute the deed, informed the appellant that he had consulted with attorneys, and they had advised him that he could not be compelled to make the deed. That the payments made by appellant, including the $525 referred to together with interest on said mortgage, taxes, and the improvements made by appellant, make a total of $1,181.57. Upon the foregoing facts, judgment was rendered in favor of the respondents, decreeing to them the possession of said premises, and granting to the appellant a judgment for $844.72; that being the balance after deducting the rental at the rate of $12.50 per month, with interest thereon, from the sum of $1,181.57, above mentioned. The case was decided upon the theory that a specific performance of the contract of sale could not be enforced, because of the provisions of our statute in regard to the conveyance of real estate by married women.

The question presented for decision is whether the respondents should be compelled to convey said property to the appellant under the facts of this case, it having been at one time occupied as a homestead. The sections of our statute in regard to the conveyance or encumbrance of a homestead by a married person, and the manner in which a homestead may be abandoned, are as follows:

"Sec. 2921. No estate in the homestead of a married person, or in any part of the community property occupied as a residence by a married person, can be conveyed or encumbered by act of the party, unless both husband and wife join in the execution of the instrument by which it is so conveyed or encumbered, and it be acknowledged by the wife as provided in chapter 3 of this title.

"Sec. 2922. No estate in the real property of a married woman passes by any grant or conveyance purporting to be executed or acknowledged by her, unless the grant or instrument is acknowledged by her in the manner prescribed in chapter 3 of this title, and her husband, if a resident of the territory, joins with her in the execution of such grant or conveyance."

"Sec. 3040. The homestead of a married person cannot be conveyed or encumbered unless the instrument by which it is conveyed or encumbered is executed and acknowledged by both husband and wife.

"Sec. 3041. A homestead can be abandoned only by a declaration of abandonment, or a grant or conveyance thereof, executed and acknowledged (1) by the husband and wife, if the claimant is married; (2) by the claimant, if unmarried."

Prior to the adoption of § 3041, above quoted, creditors of the homesteader often attached the premises homesteaded, and attempted to subject the same to the payment of the debt, on the ground of abandonment; and, in order to make the homestead more secure, a rule of evidence was established by the adoption of said section, and any litigant attempting to subject the homestead to the payment of his debt must show that the same was abandoned by a written declaration of abandonment, properly executed and acknowledged. The provisions of that section are not applicable to the case at bar. The case of Mellen v. McMannis (Idaho) 75 Pac. 98, decided by this court, is not in point. In that case it was not shown that the purchaser ever went into the possession of the premises or put any improvements thereon, or that Clark ever accepted the purchase price thereof, or that his wife ever knew anything about the sale or ever consented thereto.

Sections 3040 and 3041 are in the nature of rules of evidence, and are subject to the same legal principles as are conveyances falling under the statute of frauds, and the rules of equitable estoppel and waiver. We are aware that there is much conflict among the decisions of the question of how far the doctrine of equitable estoppel applies to married women. One of the leading decisions of the Pacific Coast states is that of Morrison v. Wilson, 13 Cal. 495, 73 Am. Dec. 593. See also cases cited in 1 Notes on California Reports, pp. 604, 605. In § 814. 2 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, it is stated as follows: "Upon the question how far the doctrine of equitable estoppel by conduct applies to married women, there is some conflict among the decisions. The tendency of modern authority, however, is strongly towards the enforcement of the estoppel against married women, as against persons sui juris, with little or no limitation on account of their disability. This is plainly so in states where the legislation has freed their property from all interest or control of their husbands, and has clothed them with partial or complete capacity to deal with it as though they were single. Even independently of this legislation there is a decided preponderance of authority sustaining the estoppel against her either when she is attempting to enforce an alleged right or to maintain a defense." The author cites modern English cases, as well as American, to sustain the text. In the case of Galbraith v. Lunsford, 87 Tenn. 89, 1 L. R. A. 522, 9 S. W. 365, in referring to Morrison v. Wilson, 13 Cal. 495, 73 Am. Dec. 593, the Tennessee court says that the case of Morrison v. Wilson, 13 Cal. 495, 73 Am. Dec. 593, "relied on so confidently by counsel for complainant, seems to not only deny the application of an estoppel in pais to a married woman, but goes so far as to hold that affirmative fraud on her part will not effect that result. It is sufficient to say of this case that it not only loses sight of the distinction referred to as to defective execution of a contract, but is directly opposed to our own adjudged cases, so far as the element of fraud is concerned." In Pilcher v. Smith, 2 Head, 208, it is said: "The legal disability of coverture carries with it no license or privilege to practise fraud or deception on other innocent persons."

The provisions of our statutes above quoted must not be so construed as to permit the respondent Lillie I. to reap the benefits of a fraud perpetrated on the appellant. It must be borne in mind that there is no conflict in the evidence in this case whatever. The legal disability of married women in this state has been almost entirely removed. They have been given elective franchise; they may hold office; and under the 2d section of an act approved March 9, 1903 (Sess. Laws 1903, p. 346), the wife is given the management, control, and absolute power of disposition of her separate property, with like effect as a married man may in relation to his real and personal property. It is true that said act was passed subsequent to the contract involved in this suit, but this only tends to show and support the doctrine laid down in 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 814.

As to the statute of frauds, § 6007, Rev. Stat., provides that no estate or interest in real property, other than for leases having a term not exceeding one year, nor any trust or power over or concerning it, or in any manner relating thereto, can be created, granted, assigned, surrendered, or declared otherwise than by operation of law, or a conveyance or other instrument in writing, subscribed by the party creating, granting, assigning, surrendering, or declaring the same, or by his lawful agent thereunto authorized in writing. It is conceded that no instrument in writing has been executed in this case. Section 6008, Rev. Stat., provides that the section above cited must not be construed to affect the power of a testator in the disposition of his real property by a last will and testament, nor to prevent any trust from arising or being extinguished by implication or operation of law, nor to abridge the power of any court to compel the specific performance of an agreement in case of part performance thereof. In the case at bar it is shown that the contract sued on is an executed contract, so far as appellant is concerned. Hence, so far as the statute of frauds is concerned, the trial court should have compelled the respondents to convey the property in controversy, by good and sufficient deed, to the appellant. Courts of equity will not permit the statute of frauds or the statute in regard to conveyance of married women to be a shield to protect fraud; and those statutes were not enacted to encourage frauds and cheats. The appellant had paid the price agreed to be paid for the property, had taken possession thereof, and expended $250 in improving the same, all of which was assented to by respondent Lillie I.; and, under the well-established rules of law applicable to the case, the appellant is the owner of the equitable title thereto. Because of the facts of this case, the principle that governs is more in the nature of an estoppel or waiver on the part of respondent Lillie I., and not the broad principle of abandonment, as suggested by the provisions of § 3041, Rev. Stat., above quoted. While the provisions of the sections above quoted were made for the protection of married woman, they were not intended to operate as a shield to relieve them against a fraudulent transaction, such as the one under consideration, and she is estopped by her own acts from interposing the provision of said sections as a valid defense to this action. The verbal agreement for the transfer of the homestead in question was assented to by both husband and wife, and was followed by change of possession, and permanent improvement placed thereon by the purchaser, and a payment of the purchase price. Those acts operated to transfer the equitable title to the appellant. That being true a court of equity will compel the respondents to convey the legal title to the appellant.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in conformity with the views herein expressed. Costs are awarded to appellant.

Allshie, J., dissenting:

If it should be conceded, which I am not now prepared to do, that the doctrine of estoppel in pais can be applied to a married woman in this state, still I do not think the conduct of the wife, as shown in this case, is sufficient to establish an estoppel against her. It is clear from the record that the appellant did not contract with the husband or part with his money upon any representation or action of the wife, and she cannot, therefore, be charged with any acts of fraud. It is equally clear, without citation of authority, that the wife should not be held for the fraudulent acts of her husband, in which she has not participated. For this reason, the judgment should be affirmed.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Stockslager, Ch. J., on May 13, 1905, handed down the following additional opinion:

Counsel for petitioner filed a lengthy petition setting up many reasons why a rehearing should be granted. The earnestness of the petition, and well-known ability of counsel representing her, prompted the court to hear further argument, and a rehearing was granted. Briefs were filed and arguments heard at the March term at Lewiston. The questions discussed are, first, as to the estoppel of Mrs. Woodworth; secondly, that of fraud on her part. These questions were discussed on the hearing, and were considered by the court from every standpoint before the opinion was finally agreed upon. We agree that the legislature of this state has uniformly dealt kindly, and we think fairly, in protecting married women in their property rights. In this legislation for her protection, it was not intended to shield her in any wrongful act. Under the facts in this case, which are fully stated in the opinion by Mr. Chief Justice Sullivan, I do not think she can escape the doctrine of equitable estoppel. Counsel for petitioner call our attention to a number of authorities, among them being § 813, Pomeroy's Eq. Jur., vol. 2. We quote the section from their brief: "The measure of the operation of an estoppel is the extent of the representation made by one party, and acted on by the other. The estoppel is commensurate with the thing represented, and operates to put the party entitled to its benefit in the same position as if the thing represented were true. With respect to the persons who are bound by, or who may claim the benefit of, the estoppel, it operates between the immediate parties and their privies, whether by blood, by estate, or by contract. A stranger who is not a party nor a privy can neither be bound nor aided. Since the whole doctrine is a creature of equity and governed by equitable principles, it necessarily follows that the party who claims the benefit of an estoppel must not only have been free from fraud in the transaction, but must have acted with good faith and reasonable diligence; otherwise no equity will arise in his favor." Applying this rule to the party claiming exemption from the doctrine of estoppel, what is her standing in a court of equity? She knew the defendant appellant entered into the possession of the property, put valuable improvements thereon, and paid all but $25 of the agreed purchase price, and then, when he demands a deed, comes into a court of equity and asks for relief under a plea that she had filed a homestead declaration on the property; he offering to allow plaintiff to take judgment for amount found due the plaintiff after deducting rental for the property for the time it was occupied by plaintiff, and she asking to be dismissed with her costs. Under the rule laid down by Mr. Pomeroy, above quoted, it is immaterial whether there was an allegation or proof of fraud on the part of the defendants or not. He says: "The party who claims the benefit of an estoppel must not only have been free from fraud in the transaction, but must have acted with good faith and reasonable diligence; otherwise no equity will arise in his favor." Now, what was the duty of Mrs. Woodworth when she visited the premises in dispute, and found them occupied by appellant and his family, making valuable and lasting improvements upon the house in good faith, believing they were the owners thereof? Mrs. Grice, wife of appellant, testifies: "I am the wife of plaintiff. Was his wife at the time he moved into and took possession of the Woodworth property. Am acquainted with Mrs. Woodworth, one of the defendants in this action. Have known her for eight or nine years at Moscow. She was living either at Wallace or Wardner at the time we took possession of the property. I knew of her coming back to Moscow two years ago,—the spring of 1902. I was down at the hospital one afternoon, and met Mr. Woodworth in the hall. He was going down-stairs, and he said: 'Lillie is upstairs. You had better go upstairs and see her.' Miss Baker was with me at the time. We went upstairs. Mrs. Woodworth was in the parlor, and we sat down and talked. In our conversation, she asked me how I liked our new home. I said, 'Real well;' that it was fine, and such a pretty location,—and remarked that it was rather large. She said that was the objection she always had to the place. That was the substance of the conversation. I had another conversation with her—I imagine in June—some time in 1902. I know it was quite warm. She and her mother called at the house one afternoon. They came in, sat down, and talked to me. We had the house painted at the time. She remarked how pretty the house looked since it was painted. She says: 'It is just the color we intended to have it painted if we hadn't sold the place.' She says: 'You have the sitting room painted, too. It is very pretty.' Lecta D. Baker testified she had lived in Moscow about sixteen years. Knew all the parties to the case, and has known Mrs. Woodworth ever since she has lived in Moscow. Heard the two conversations related by Mrs. Grice, and practically relates them in the same language. Mrs. A. J. McDonald testifies to a conversation with Mrs. Woodworth in March, 1903. She says, "She asked Mrs. Woodworth if they weren't sorry that they had sold their home," and she said, "I guess we are." I said, "Why did you sell?" She said that Mr. Woodworth said they were going away, and they would never come back to Moscow again, and they thought they might just as well sell while they had a chance. If Mrs. Woodworth desired to deal fairly with the Grices when she returned from Moscow, and found them in possession of her property, upon which she had filed a homestead declaration, if she did not know they were occupying the property under a claim of purchase prior to that time, she should have then said to them: "You are improving property, upon which I have filed my homestead declaration. I have never consented to the sale of it, and still desire to claim it as my home." This would have been good faith and reasonable diligence. Equity does not permit her to remain silent as to her claims, and by her conversation encourage appellants to continue their payments and improvements on the property, and then, when they demand a deed, answer by saying: "You can take a judgment against my husband for the amount you have paid on the purchase price and for the improvements made, less the reasonable rental during the time you have occupied the premises, but the property has increased in value, and I am informed I can hold it under my homestead declaration. You may enforce your judgment against my husband if you can, but I will hold the property, which has about doubled in valuation." Courts of equity should not and will not encourage such transactions as are shown to exist in this case, and exempt them from compliance with the contract.

After carefully reconsidering this case we are still of the view that the opinion heretofore filed correctly states the law of this case.

Ailshie, J., dissenting:

The application of the doctrine adopted in this case to the facts it discloses works an effectual rape of the statute, in the name of that facile and beguiling progeny of equity called "estoppel." I shall not enter upon any discussion as to whether or not the homestead of a married woman may be alienated or transferred in any other manner than that pointed out by statute. I am convinced, however, that, if the doctrine of estoppel adopted by my brothers is applicable to a married woman, and not forbidden by express statute, notwithstanding such a rule the facts of this case are entirely barren of the elements of estoppel. In 16 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 726, Prof. Bigelow defines the essential elements of estoppel in pais as follows: "In order to constitute an equitable estoppel, there must exist a false representation or concealment of material facts: it must have been made with knowledge, actual or constructive, of the facts; the party to whom it was made must have been without knowledge, or the means of knowledge, of the real facts; it must have been made with the intention that it should be acted upon; and the party to whom it was made must have relied on or acted upon it to his prejudice." Applying this test to the facts disclosed in the record, not a single element of estoppel as against Mrs. Woodworth can be gleaned from this case. All the acts, declarations, and conduct of the wife in this case which are held to constitute an estoppel are narrated in the opinions of my associates, and it is therefore unnecessary for me to repeat them here. The acts and declarations of the wife in this case, by which she is estopped to set up the plea of her homestead right, were made to third parties, and that in the course of casual conversation which took place long after the purchaser, Grice, had paid the entire purchase price, with the exception of a very trivial sum. And indeed there is no evidence in the record anywhere showing, or tending to show, that the substance of these conversations and declarations, or any part thereof, was ever at any time communicated to Grice prior to the commencement of this action. It is not even shown when the wife came into knowledge of the fact that her husband had sold, or contracted to sell, this homestead, and, so far as the record is concerned, that information may have been gathered by her long after her husband had received the entire purchase price, with the exception of $25 unpaid at the time the action was commenced. It is said by the chief justice in his opinion that, "if Mrs. Woodworth desired to deal fairly with the Grices when she returned from Moscow and found them in possession of her property, . . . she should have then said to them: 'You are improving property upon which I have filed my homestead declaration. I have never consented to the sale of it, and still desire to claim it as my home.'" One would infer from this statement that Grice had no information as to the filing of the homestead, but that would be a wrong impression. As a matter of fact, the homestead declaration was of record long before Grice entered into the contract with Woodworth or took possession of the property, and he was chargeable with notice of such fact, as well as with notice of the provisions of the statute to the effect that the wife cannot be divested of her homestead right except by an instrument in writing duly acknowledged by her. The laches and neglect shown in this case are to my mind entirely chargeable to appellant, rather than to the respondent Mrs. Woodworth. It is true, as said by counsel for respondent in their brief, "that a certain degree of negligence is a luxury that all mankind are licensed to enjoy, and for which every man must make an allowance in his dealings with other men." This is said upon the theory, I presume, that all men—and women too—are human, and may not live up to all the moral obligations their neighbors may think that Code imposes; but for every such dereliction a court of equity cannot interpose with an adequate and speedy remedy. It is difficult to understand upon what theory either the actions, declarations, or conduct of this married woman are to be construed into an estoppel against her defending her homestead rights where the record contains not a word showing that the party who purchased from her husband parted with a single dollar or made the slightest improvement upon the property upon any statement, act, or representation made by her. In speaking of an estoppel by actions and conduct, Justice Field, in Henshaw v. Bissell, 18 Wall. 271, 21 L. ed. 840, says: "For its application there must be some intended deception in the conduct or declarations of the party to be estopped, or such gross negligence on his part as to amount to constructive fraud." Such is not the 69 L. R. A.

case here. The wife is apparently estopped in this case because she didn't, as soon as she learned of this sale by her husband, rush out upon the street and to her neighbors, and recount her troubles to everyone with whom she met, and, of course, necessarily berate the conduct of her husband, and brand him as one who was obtaining money under false pretenses.

After reading the majority opinion in this case, the femes covert of this commonwealth, in order to hereafter avoid the plea of estoppel, will find it necessary, where their speculative husbands have parted with the old homestead without their consent, to then turn Xantippes, and rail their grievances as well from the housetops and market places as from the forum. And indeed, in order that they may not be estopped, they should, on their "days at home," apprise all their gentle callers that, while their impecunious spouses lured them away from the old homestead bound with cords of affection, still they are as deeply attached to that declaration of homestead as they were on the day when a considerate husband first suggested its execution. Or when she returns the call made by the "innocent purchaser's" wife, she might save herself from the bar of estoppel by reciting to that good dame how their husbands both were ignorant of the statute, as well as unmindful of her individual property rights, and learned in the arts of fraud. Or when the "innocent purchaser," ignorant of the statute, calls to pay her avaricious husband his monthly instalment, she might eject him from the premises and deliver him a personal discourse, and thereby, in a modest but Portian way, save herself from this oft salutary, ever convenient, but sometimes dangerous, plea of estoppel. The majority have told the good wives of this state that they must talk or be estopped. I am chagrined to hear it. It is enough if they keep still; indeed, the law hath required no more; and, moreover, equity taketh no delight in a parade of grievances and multiplicity of troubles where peace and quietude might reign. I am persuaded that it hath never before been written that our good wives should be estopped by the courtesies and pleasantries they exchange when "making calls" or at the "tea party."

I think the judgment should be affirmed.

Trustees of BROOKSVILLE GRADED SCHOOL DISTRICT et al.

(.....Ky.....)

1. Offering a prayer at the beginning of school each day, asking direction and guidance, which does not represent any peculiar view or dogma of any sect or denomination, does not bring a public school within a provision of the Constitution that no portion of any fund or tax raised for educational purposes shall be used in aid of any sectarian or denominational school.
2. A school is not a place of worship, nor is the teacher a minister of religion, within the meaning of a constitutional provision that no person shall be compelled to attend any place of worship or contribute to the support of any minister of religion, although prayer is offered at the opening of sessions of the school.
3. The King James translation of the Bible is not a sectarian book within the meaning of a statute providing that no sectarian book shall be used in any common school.

In making choice of an English translation to be read, it was eminently proper to select the translation that is commonly used by English speaking people, and against which the fewest objections could be urged.

O'Rear, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant, who resides in the town of Brooksville, and has children attending the Brooksville graded common school, brought this suit against the trustees and teachers of the school, seeking an injunction against the use of the English translation of the Bible, known as the "King James" or "Authorized Edition," and to prevent the teachers from opening the school with prayers or songs alleged to be of a denominational character. On full hearing the injunction was denied, and the petition dismissed.

To get at the exact question presented for decision on this appeal, we will eliminate the allegation concerning worship of God by singing sectarian songs. There was no proof whatever that any songs of any kind had been sung during the school year in which the suit was brought, nor was it either required or permitted. Whether it was permissible to have sung the songs complained of is not, therefore, a matter considered by the court.

Appellant invokes § 189 of the Constitution of Kentucky and § 4368, Ky. Stat. 1903, which read as follows:

"No portion of any fund or tax now existing, or that may hereafter be raised or levied for educational purposes, shall be appropriated to, or used by, or in aid of, any church, sectarian, or denominational school." Const. § 189.

"No books or other publications of a sectarian, infidel, or immoral character shall be used or distributed in any common school; nor shall any sectarian, infidel, or immoral doctrine be taught therein." Ky. Stat. 1903, § 4368.

The Brooksville graded common school is maintained by the state by the imposition of taxes. It is open alike to all white children within certain ages who or whose parents are residents of the district. It is in no sense a sectarian, church, or denominational school. Section 189 of the Constitution was aimed not to regulate the curriculum of the common schools of the state, but to prevent the appropriation of public money to aid schools maintained by any church or sect of religionists. If the Constitution deals directly with the question of compulsory worship, it is in § 5, which reads as follows: "No preference shall ever be given by law to any religious sect, society, or denomination; nor to any particular creed, mode of worship, or system of ecclesiastical polity; nor shall any person be compelled to attend any place of worship, to contribute to the erection or maintenance of any such place, or to the salary or support of any minister of religion; nor shall any man be compelled to send his child to any school to which he may be conscientiously opposed; and the civil rights, privileges, or capacities of no person shall be taken away, or in any wise diminished or enlarged, on account of his belief or disbelief of any religious tenet, dogma, or teaching. No human authority shall, in any case whatever, control or interfere with the rights of conscience." If, under the guise of public instruction, children should be required to attend schools where worship of God was compulsory, it would seem to be within the prohibition of that section. We find from the evidence in this case that, while chapters of passages from the Bible (King James translation) were read, and prayers were offered by the teachers at the opening of the school each morning, appellant's children, who are members of the Roman Catholic Church, were not required to attend during those exercises, nor were they or others who were conscientiously opposed to doing so required to participate in them.

Two questions are presented by the record for decision: (1) Does the offering of prayer to God in opening a school, such as was offered in the Brooksville school, make that school a "sectarian school," within the meaning of § 189 of the Constitution? (2) Is the King James translation of the Bible a "sectarian book," within the meaning of § 4368, Ky. Stat.?

The prayer that was offered, and which it is urged converted the school into a sectarian school, is as follows: "Our Father who art in Heaven, we ask Thy aid in our day's work. Be with us in all we do and say. Give us wisdom and strength and patience to teach these children as they should be taught. May teacher and pupil have mutual love and respect. Watch over these children, both in schoolroom and on the playground. Keep them from being hurt in any way, and at last, when we come to die, may none of our number be missing around Thy Throne. These things we ask for Christ's sake. Amen." It has not been pointed out to us wherein the prayer quoted is sectarian in its construction. The Reverend Father James A. Cusack, a witness for appellant, asseverates that, in his opinion, it is sectarian. But he admits that there is nothing in it repugnant to the doctrines of his religious belief (Roman Catholic). Nor does he claim that it is promulgated, authorized, or used by any sect of religionists whatever. As neither the form nor substance of the prayer complained of seems to represent any peculiar view or dogma of any sect or denomination, or to teach them, or to detract from those of any other, it is not sectarian in the sense that the word is commonly used and understood, and as it was evidently intended in the section quoted. The constitutional convention, in framing the organic law for all the people of the state, must be presumed to have used ordinary words, not according to the peculiar views of a few, but as generally used. The word "sectarian," from the connection in which it is used, cannot be given the construction contended for by appellant, which seems to be that any form of prayer not authorized by a particular church is sectarian.

Though it be conceded that any prayer is worship, and that public prayer is public worship, still appellant's children were not compelled to attend the place where the worshipping was done during the prayer. The school was not "a place of worship," nor are its teachers "ministers of religion," within the contemplation of § 5 of the Constitution, although a prayer may be offered incidentally at the opening of the school by a teacher. Meetings of the general assembly are opened by prayer, and other state institutions authorize the worship of God. They have never been regarded as fostering sectarian teachings. The complaint in this case goes only to the sectarian feature of the exercises, not because they were religious. It is not contended that it was the purpose of the Constitution to prevent worship, nor to prevent teachers in the public schools from assuming worshipful relations. The great aim was to keep church and state forever separate as distinct institutions; to prevent the government of one form assuming rightful control of the government of the other. Nor is it clear that it was intended to keep religion out of the school, though it is apparent that one aim, at least, was to keep the "church" out. The question is not presented, and is not, therefore, decided, whether any exercise which partakes incidentally of worship is prohibited.

The main question, we conceive to be, Is the King James translation of the Bible, or, for that matter, any edition of the Bible, a sectarian book? There is, perhaps, no book that is so widely used and so highly respected as the Bible; no other that has been translated into as many tongues; no other that has had such marked influence upon the habits and life of the world. It is not the least of its marvelous attributes that it is so catholic that every seeming phase of belief finds comfort in its comprehensive precepts. Many translations of it, and of parts of it, have been made from time to time, since two or three centuries before the beginning of the Christian era. And since the discovery of the art of printing and the manufacture of paper in the sixteenth century, a great many editions of it have been printed. There is controversy over the authenticity of some parts of some of the editions. And there are some people who do not believe that any of it is the inspired or revealed word of God. Yet it remains that civilized mankind generally accord to it a reverential regard, while all who study its sublime sentiments and consider its great moral influence must admit that it is, from any point of view, one of the most important of books. That it has drawn to its careful study and research into its history and translations so many profound scholars of history, is not to be wondered at. The result has been that, while many editions of the several translations have been made, those based upon the revision compiled under the reign of King James I., 1607-1611, and very generally used by Protestants, and the one compiled at Douay some time previous, and which was later adopted by the Roman Catholic Church as the only authentic version, are the most commonly used in this country. That the Bible, or any particular edition, has been adopted by one or more denominations as authentic, or by them asserted to be inspired, cannot make it a sectarian book. The book itself, to be sectarian, must show that it teaches the peculiar dogmas of a sect as such, and not alone that it is so comprehensive as to include them by the partial interpretation of its adherents. Nor is a book sectarian merely because it was edited or compiled by those of a particular sect. It is not the authorship nor the mechanical composition of the book, nor the use of it, but its contents, that give it its character. Appellant's view seems to be that the church is the custodian and interpreter of the Bible as God's word. From that it is supposed that any Bible not put forth by authority of a church claiming that prerogative is sectarian. The question is not whether the version used is canonical or apocryphal. That question does not at all enter into the matter. Otherwise it would inevitably lead to the state that any book not favored by some church authority, or which may be supposed by it to be hostile to its teachings, would be sectarian. In that way the authority of a church could largely control the course of study in the public schools by issuing its bull against certain scientific or moral treatises as being atheistic or heretic. The very mischief aimed at by the framers of the Constitution, and by the people adopting it, would thus be accomplished, viz., the interference in matters of state by the church.

If the legislature or the constitutional convention had intended that the Bible should be proscribed, they would simply have said so. The word "Bible" is shorter and better understood than the word "sectarian." It is not conceivable that, if it had been intended to exclude the Bible from public schools, that purpose would have been obscured within the controversial word. Nor can we conceive that under the American system of providing thorough education of all the youth, to fit them for good citizenship in every sense, the legislature or the constitutional convention could have intended to exclude from their course of instruction any consideration of such a work, whose historical and literary value, aside from its theological aspects, would seem to entitle it to a high place in any well-ordered course of general instruction. The history of a religion, including its teachings and claim of authority,—as, for example, the writings of Confucius or Mahomet,—might be profitably studied. Why may not also the wisdom of Solomon and the life of Christ? If the same things were in any other book than the Bible, it would not be doubted that it was within the discretion of the school boards and teachers whether it was expedient to include them in the common-school course of study without violating the impartiality of the law concerning religious beliefs. The objection does not appear to be to the matter. It is to the publication.

A learned witness for appellant, who gives it as a matter of religious belief and teaching, says that the church is the interpreter of the Bible, but that the Protestants teach, on the contrary, that everyone is his own interpreter. The Constitution may be said to teach, too, that everyone is his own interpreter, for it guarantees that everyone may worship God (which is supposed to include the study of His revealed word) according to the dictates of his own conscience. Children are taught the Constitution in the common schools. May it not be said then with equal force that to teach the Constitution, which itself teaches the right of perfect freedom in the worship of God, is sectarian, because some sect might deny that it was right to teach the children to worship God in any way except according to the teachings of that particular sect? Milton, Newton, Galileo, as well as Wickliffe, Whittingham, and Tyndale, came under the bans of the church. The philosophy and the writings of these great thinkers, wherein they do not teach sectarianism, may be used in the public schools, and in some part are so used, in spite of the fact that at one time they were believed to be hostile to God's revelations as interpreted by the church. This same question in one form or another has come before the courts of the country a number of times. It has not been so free from doubt that the conclusions of the judges have always been harmonious. This has been in part owing to the differing expressions of the Constitutions and statutes being interpreted. While allowing that because of these differences in language the opinions may not appear to be precisely in point, yet they reflect the drift of judicial opinion in this country, so far as it has been expressed, concerning the main idea, —whether the Bible is a sectarian book. Likewise whether it may be read in the public schools at all. While some of the Constitutions construed in terms prohibit the use of sectarian books in the public schools, yet, independent of those provisions, it seems to be generally conceded that to teach sectarianism in a public school would be violative of religious freedom, which is guaranteed by every Constitution. With this explanation we will briefly review the decisions bearing on the subject.

One of the earliest cases, celebrated for the great learning displayed, as well as by the distinguished ability of the judge who wrote the opinion, is Vidal v. Philadelphia, 2 How. 127, 11 L. ed. 205, opinion by Mr. Justice Story. The question for decision, so far as it bears on this case, was whether a charitable bequest of the late Stephen Girard, establishing a college, prohibited the teaching of Christianity to its pupils. The will contained this restrictive clause: "I enjoin and require that no ecclesiastic, missionary, or minister of any sect whatsoever, shall ever hold or exercise any station or duty whatever in the said college; nor shall any such person ever be admitted for any purpose, or as a visitor, within the premises appropriated to the purposes of the said college." The intention of the testator, so far as it was not unlawful, was as the law of the case. The question was, Did he intend to exclude the teachings of Christianity, or its being taught by the clergy? The testator himself furnished this key to his thought (p. 133 of 2 How., p. 208, 11 L. ed.): "In making this restriction, I do not mean to cast any reflection upon any sect or person whatsoever; but, as there is such a multitude of sects, and such a diversity of opinion amongst them, I desire to keep the tender minds of the orphans, who are to derive advantage from this bequest, free from the excitement which clashing doctrines and sectarian controversy are so apt to produce; my desire is that all the instructors and teachers in the college shall take pains to instill into the minds of the scholars the purest principles of morality, so that, on their entrance into active life, they may, from inclination and habit, evince benevolence toward their fellow creatures, and a love of truth, sobriety, and industry, adopting at the same time such religious tenets as their mature reason may enable them to prefer." It would be difficult to express a more fitting description of the underlying principles of our government in its treatment of the subject of public education. In construing those provisions of the will which we have quoted as bearing particularly on the subject whether the Bible and its teachings might be employed in the college by lay teachers, the court said: "Why may not the Bible, and especially the New Testament, without note or comment, be read and taught as a divine revelation in the college; its general precepts expounded, its evidences explained, and its glorious principles of morality inculcated? What is there to prevent a work, not sectarian, upon the general evidences of Christianity, from being read and taught in the college by lay teachers? Certainly there is nothing in the will that proscribes such studies. Above all, the testator positively enjoins 'that all the instructors and teachers in the college shall take pains to instill into the minds of the scholars the purest principles of morality, so that, on their entrance into active life, they may, from inclination and habit, evince benevolence towards their fellow creatures, and a love of truth, sobriety, and industry, adopting at the same time such religious tenets as their matured reason may enable them to prefer.' Now, it may well be asked, What is there in all this, which is positively enjoined, inconsistent with the spirit or truths of Christianity? Are not these truths all taught by Christianity, although it teaches much more? Where can the purest principles of morality be learned so clearly or so perfectly as from the New Testament? Where are benevolence, the love of truth, sobriety, and industry, so powerfully and irresistibly inculcated as in the sacred volume? The testator has not said how these great principles are to be taught, or by whom, except it be by laymen, nor what books are to be used to explain or enforce them. All that we can gather from his language is that he desired to exclude sectarians and sectarianism from the college, leaving the instructors and officers free to teach the purest morality, the love of truth, sobriety, and industry, by all appropriate means; and, of course, including the best, the surest, and the most impressive." Two points are emphasized by the reasoning of the learned judge: (1) That is was sectarianism that was prohibited, and (2) that the Bible is not a sectarian book,—which are the two points most prominent in this case.

Donahoe v. Richards, 38 Me. 379, 61 Am. Dec. 256, was an action against a school board for expelling a pupil who refused to read the English version of the Bible, that book having been adopted by the board as one to be used by pupils in the course of the school work. We note that counsel for appellee contends that this case ought not to be regarded as authority, because there was neither statute nor constitutional prohibition on the subject of sectarian teaching. Yet the court held that "the common schools are not for the purpose of instruction in the theological doctrines of any religion or of any sect. The state regards no one sect as superior to any other, . . . and, if the peculiar tenet of any particular sect were so taught, it would furnish a well-grounded cause of complaint on the part of those who entertained different or opposing religious sentiments." The court held that the King James translation of the Bible was not a sectarian book. It was said: "The Bible was used merely as a book in which instruction in reading was given. But reading the Bible is no more an interference with religious belief than would reading the mythology of Greece or Rome be regarded as interfering with religious belief or an affirmation of the Pagan creeds."

In Spiller v. Woburn, 12 Allen, 127, it was held that the public-school committee did not exceed their authority in passing an order that the Bible should be read at the opening of the schools on the morning of each day. "No more appropriate method could be adopted," said the court, "of keeping in the minds of both teachers and scholars that one of the chief objects of education, as declared by the statutes of this commonwealth, and which teachers are especially enjoined to carry into effect, is 'to impress on the minds of children and youth committed to their care and instruction the principles of piety and justice, and a sacred regard for the truth.'"

It is not deemed necessary in this state to define by statute now the purposes of public education. They are at least as broad as the broadest under any similar system in use in any of the states.

Pfeiffer v. Board of Education, 118 Mich. 560, 42 L. R. A. 536, 77 N. W. 250, was an application to the court to compel the board of education to discontinue the use of a certain book known as "Readings from the Bible" in the public schools of Detroit. The Constitution and laws of Michigan on the subject of religious freedom are substantially as are ours, save there was no express inhibition of sectarian instruction in public schools. The question decided by the court was that Readings from the Bible, though it was used as a text-book in the school, did not violate constitutional provisions guaranteeing to everyone the right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of his own conscience; nor was it a 60 L. R. A.

compulsion of any person to attend or support any place of religious worship, or to pay taxes to any minister of the gospel or teacher of religion; nor was it an appropriation of the public money for the benefit of any religious sect or society; nor was it a diminution of the civil rights of any person on account of his religious belief. One judge dissented from the opinion of the court.

In Moore v. Monroe, 64 Iowa, 367, 52 Am. Rep. 444, 20 N. W. 475, it was shown that the teachers of the school were accustomed to occupy a few minutes each morning in reading selections from the Bible, in repeating the Lord's Prayer, and singing religious songs. The plaintiff had two children in the school, but they were not required to be present during the time thus occupied. A statute of that state provided: "The Bible shall not be excluded from any school or institution in this state, nor shall any pupil be required to read it contrary to the wishes of his parent or guardian." The Constitution of the state prohibited the legislature from passing any law interfering with the free exercise of religious worship, or compelling any person to pay taxes to support any religion, or for building any place of worship, or the maintenance of any ministry. The plaintiff's contention was that by the use of the schoolhouse as a place for reading the Bible, repeating the Lord's Prayer, and singing religious songs it was made a place of worship; that his children were compelled to attend a place of worship, and he, as a taxpayer, was compelled to aid in building and repairing a place of worship. The court held that the statute did not have any of the effects claimed by the plaintiff. In the absence of such a statute, a rule of the school board to the same effect could not, of course, violate the same constitutional principles, if the statute would not have done so.

The supreme court of Illinois, in McCor-mick v. Burt, 95 Ill. 263, 35 Am. Rep. 163, held that a rule of the directors of a public school requiring the reading of a King James edition of the Bible for fifteen minutes each morning, at which, however, no one was required to be present or to participate in, was not unconstitutional as interfering with the religious conviction of the plaintiff and his father, who were patrons of the school, and Roman Catholics.

In none of the states from which the foregoing opinions have been cited was there an express prohibition of the use of sectarian books. Still in all of them there was the familiar and fundamental constitutional provision guaranteeing religious freedom, which would have been violated, as was held in every instance, either in terms or by necessary implication, by the teaching of sectarian doctrines. That such would have been the result of such teaching seems to us to be perfectly obvious. In the very learned and exhaustive note by Judge Freeman to Cook County v. Industrial School for Girls, 8 Am. St. Rep. 386 (case reported in 125 Ill. 540, 1 L. R. A. 437, 18 N. E. 183), it is shown that the Constitutions of twenty-four states contain provisions prohibiting the payment of moneys or any appropriation or grant for the support, benefit, or in aid of sectarian schools. The editor, commenting on the constitutional provisions mentioned, and others where they are silent upon the matter of sectarianism, says: "In view of the above decisions and constitutional provisions, we conclude that the words used in the several Constitutions in point, where the language does not expressly so indicate, must have been intended by the people who ratified them to provide against the promulgation or teaching of the distinctive doctrines, creeds, or tenets of any particular Christian or other religious sect in schools or institutions where such instruction was to be paid for out of the public funds, or aided by such funds or by public grants, and that a school or institution is sectarian when the doctrines or tenets of some particular faith, sect, or religion are taught to the exclusion of others; and especially so where a school or institution has a distinctive or strict denominational name descriptive or indicative of the fundamental doctrines of the sect to which it belongs; or where a school or institution is under the exclusive control of a sect having such name, and by a course of instruction excluding all others, seeks to inculcate its tenets alone, it is then sectarian; and it makes no difference that pupils of all sects, denominations, and religious beliefs, or those of no belief, are permitted the advantages of such school or institution. It is what is taught that is the determining factor."

This brings us to the consideration of the authorities relied on by appellant.

State ex rel. Weiss v. District Board, 76 Wis. 177, 7 L. R. A. 330, 20 Am. St. Rep. 41, 44 N. W. 907, is the principal case cited. The questions there presented were whether the reading of selected portions of the King James translation of the Bible during school hours violated the rights of conscience, compelled complainants to aid in support of a place of religious worship, and was sectarian instruction. All three propositions were decided in the affirmative. The decision is apparently against the weight of authority. The court seemed to realize as much, if they should be regarded as all bearing on the same principle. Speaking of them, but not discussing them in detail, the 69 L. R. A.

court said: "A number of cases in different states, supposed to have a bearing upon the main question here considered and determined [to wit, whether the King James version of the Bible is a sectarian book], have been cited, and quotations made therefrom at considerable length by the respective counsel and by the circuit judge . . . overruling the demurrer to the answer. None of the states in which those decisions were made seem to have in their Constitutions a direct prohibition of sectarian instruction in the public schools. It is believed that this state was the first which expressly embodied the prohibition in its fundamental law, and we are not aware of any direct adjudication of the question under consideration." The court seems to turn the case upon the fact that the King James version, "the whole of it," was used as a reading book in the school. The opinion admits that text-books founded upon or containing extracts from the Bible might be properly used. It was even said: "The constitutional prohibition of sectarian instruction does not include them, even though they may contain passages from which some inferences of sectarian doctrine might possibly be drawn. Furthermore, there is much in the Bible which cannot justly be characterized as sectarian. There can be no valid objection to the use of such matter in the secular instruction of the pupils. Much of it has great historical and literary value, which may be thus utilized without violating the constitutional prohibition. It may also be used to inculcate good morals,—that is, our duty to each other,—which may and ought to be inculcated by the district schools. No more complete code of morals exists than is contained in the New Testament, which reaffirms and emphasizes the moral obligations laid down in the Ten Commandments." With profound respect to the supreme court of Wisconsin, we are nevertheless unable to see how its position can be maintained logically. For it takes no notice of the conscientious conviction of the Jews, or nonbelievers, any of whom may have as valid objection to the use of any part of the New Testament as Roman Catholic citizens have to the King James version. It seems to narrow the question down to matter of canonical approval of the printed volumes. The court does not attempt to argue, nor do we see how it could be maintained, that that fact alone could make a book sectarian which in its matter was not inherently so.

The next case is State ex rel. Freeman v. Schere, 65 Neb. 853, 59 L. R. A. 927, 91 N. W. 846, 93 N. W. 169. The Constitution of Nebraska provides: "No sectarian instruction shall be allowed in any school or institution supported, in whole or in part, by the public funds set apart for educational purposes." [Art. 8, § 11.] The action complained of was the reading of selections and extracts from the "King James's version or translation of the Bible," and the singing of certain religious and sectarian songs, and the offering of prayer to the Deity. The court said: "We do not think it wise or necessary to prolong a discussion of what appears to us an almost self-evident fact,—that exercises such as are complained of by the relator in this case both constitute religious worship and are sectarian in their character, within the meaning of the Constitution. Nor do we feel inclined to make what might be looked upon as a spurious exhibition of learning by quoting at length from the many judicial decisions and utterances of eminent men in this country concerning the subject. Perhaps the case most nearly in point, because of similarity both of facts involved and of constitutional enactments construed to those in the case at bar, is State ex rel. Weiss v. District Board. 76 Wis. 177, 7 L. R. A. 330, 20 Am. St. Rep. 41, 44 N. W. 967." It is undeniably the peculiar province of the supreme courts of the states to place final authoritative construction upon the Constitutions of their respective states in matters involving solely their internal policy. Whether the reasons given by the court are sound or not, is not material as affecting the binding force of the construction upon citizens and others whose actions come up for consideration by the government of that state. But where the opinion is cited abroad as persuasive argument why its conclusions should be elsewhere adopted, it is of the first importance that its reasoning should be sound. That similar provisions, or the same principle of law, have frequently come before other high courts of last resort, and been by them decided in a certain way, is a fact that cannot safely be ignored. It is more than likely that a general concurrence of judicial opinion on the same subject is apt to be right. Due deference to the enlightened judgment of the learned profession of the law, and to all concerned, leave no alternative but to consider all that has been said by courts of equal rank upon a subject of such universal importance as to have been incorporated in some form in every Constitution of the states of America. Two of the judges of the supreme court of Nebraska confined their concurrence to the point of "sectarian instruction." On petition for rehearing the chief justice filed a response on behalf of the court. The only case admitted to have a direct bearing on the question 69 L. R. A.

posing the court's conclusions was the Michigan case cited above. But we observe what appears to us to be a modification of the original opinion in parts of the response. After pointing out that there are admittedly verbal differences between the King James and the Douay translations of the Bible, which some sectarians regard as material, the court said: "But the fact that the King James translation may be used to inculcate sectarian doctrines affords no presumption that it will be so used. The law does not forbid the use of the Bible in either version in the public schools. It is not proscribed either by the Constitution or the statutes, and the courts have no right to declare its use to be unlawful because it is possible or probable that those who are privileged to use it will misuse the privilege by attempting to propagate their own peculiar theological or ecclesiastical views and opinions. The point where the courts may rightfully intervene, and where they should intervene without hesitation, is where legitimate use has degenerated into abuse,—where a teacher employed to give secular instruction violated the Constitution by becoming a sectarian propagandist. . . . The section of the Constitution which provides that 'no sectarian instruction shall be allowed in any school or institution supported, in whole or in part, by the public funds set apart for educational purposes,' cannot, under any canon of construction with which we are acquainted, be held to mean that neither the Bible nor any part of it, from Genesis to the Revelation, may be read in the educational institutions fostered by the state." The court also wisely noted that sectarian instruction might occur from frequent reading, even without note or comment, of "judiciously selected passages," and observed that whether such practices existed as amounted to sectarian instruction must be determined upon the facts of each particular case. We find ourselves in entire accord with the views quoted above from the response of the Nebraska supreme court.

In Board of Education v. Minor, 23 Ohio St. 211, 13 Am. Rep. 233, the only question presented or decided was whether the school board might not prohibit the reading of the Bible in the public schools. It was held that they could: that nothing in the laws of that state made it compulsory upon the boards or teachers to use the Bible as a text-book.

We believe the reason and weight of the authorities support the view that the Bible is not of itself a sectarian book, and, when used merely for reading in the common schools, without note or comment by teachers, is not sectarian instruction; nor does such use of the Bible make the schoolhouse a house of religious worship.

The judgment of the circuit judge, having been in accord herewith, is affirmed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

George S. ALLEN

v.

COMMONWEALTH of Massachusetts.

(188 Mass. 59.)

A farmer who supports his family from the products of the farm, and for many years has sold his surplus in a neighboring town, has an established business within the meaning of a statute authorizing the construction of a water-supply reservoir upon the site of the town, and providing compensation for any established business thereby destroyed, although he has no regular route or customers, or anything in the nature of good will.

(May 17, 1905.)

RESERVATION by the Supreme Judicial Court for Worcester County for the opinion of the full bench of a petition for compensation for destruction of an established business by the construction of a water-supply reservoir. Judgment for petitioner.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John S. Lynch, for petitioner:

The petitioner was the owner of an established business on land in the town of West Boylston on April 1, 1895, within the meaning of § 14, chap. 488, of the Acts of 1895.

"Business" is a word of large signification, and denotes the employment or occupation in which a person is engaged to procure a living.

Goddard v. Chaffee, 2 Allen, 395, 79 Am. Dec. 796; Gavin v. Com. 182 Mass. 191, 65 N. E. 37; Snow v. Sheldon, 126 Mass. 332, 30 Am. Rep. 684; Harris v. Amery, L. R. 1. C. P. 148.

Agriculture is a business, and one of the largest businesses carried on in the United States.

Earle v. Com. 180 Mass. 583, 57 L. R. A. 292, 91 Am. St. Rep. 326, 63 N. E. 10; Gavin v. Com. 182 Mass. 191, 65 N. E. 37.

The ordinary meaning of the word "establish" is "to settle firmly or fix permanently what was before uncertain, doubtful, or disputed."

Smith v. Forrest, 49 N. H. 237.

Messrs. Ralph A. Stewart and Fred T. Field, for respondent:

It was not the intention of the legislature that the term "established business," as used in Stat. 1895, chap. 488, § 14, should be construed to be synonymous with "occupation" or "employment."

McKeon v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 94 Wis. 477, 35 L. R. A. 252, 59 Am. St. Rep. 909, 69 N. W. 175; State ex rel. Bragg v. Rogers, 107 Ala. 444, 32 L. R. A. 520, 19 So. 909; Burnett v. Com. 169 Mass. 417, 48 N. E. 758.

The carrying on of a farm, and the sale from time to time of the surplus products thereof, do not constitute an established business.

Morton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question in this case is whether the petitioner owned "an established business on land" within the meaning of Stat. 1895, chap. 488, § 14, p. 573. So much of the section as is material is as follows: "In case any individual or firm owning on the 1st day of April in the year 1895 an established business on land in . . . West Boylston, whether the same shall be taken or not under this act, . . . shall deem that such business is decreased in value by the carrying out of this act, whether by loss of custom or otherwise, and unable to agree with said board as to the amount of damages to be paid for such injury, such damages shall be determined." etc. The petitioner owned on the 1st of April, 1895, and had owned for a good many years, a small farm in West Boylston, consisting, it is said, of about 50 acres, which he carried on, and on which he lived and supported himself and family. He had no other business. He raised hay, grain, apples, and vegetables, but not in large quantities, and kept a cow, a horse, some hens, and a few hogs, and made each year a few barrels of cider from apples raised on the farm. The hay that was not consumed, and the eggs, vegetables, cider, and milk that were not required for the support of the family, were

NOTE.—For a case in this series holding that a doctor having an office in, and a practice extending throughout, a town in which land is taken for a public purpose, is within the protection of a statute providing for compensation to any individual owning an established business on land within the town, which is injured by the taking, see Earle v. Com. 57 L. R. A. 292, 60 L. R. A.

sold in the village of Oakdale, in West Boylston; and he occasionally sold a hog to the local butcher. He had no regular route or customers for the sale of the hay, eggs, vegetables, milk, and cider. It does not appear, and is perhaps not material, of how many persons his family consisted, nor how much hay and other produce or how many eggs and hogs he sold. The village of Oakdale was destroyed by the construction of the reservoir, and the petitioner brings this petition to recover the damages thereby caused to his business.

The act under which the petition is brought is entitled "An Act to Provide for a Metropolitan Water Supply," and provides for the construction of a reservoir, the effect of which will be to submerge certain towns and villages, and to destroy a large amount of property, and to interfere very seriously with, if not destroy, in many cases, business. Ordinarily, the damage done to a person's business by the exercise of the right of eminent domain is not a matter for which he is entitled to compensation. But in the present case the legislature has shown a disposition to deal liberally with those who would or might be injured by the carrying out of the act. In addition to providing compensation for real estate taken, and for real estate not taken, but directly or indirectly decreased in value, the act provides that in certain cases individuals and firms shall be compensated for damage done to their business, whether the land on which it is established is taken or not, and whether the business is decreased in value by loss of custom or otherwise. By subsequent acts these provisions were extended to the towns of Sterling, Boylston, and the part of Clinton within the limits of the reservoir. Stat. 1897, chap. 445, p. 429; Stat. 1898, chap. 551, p. 666; Stat. 1901, chap. 505, p. 451. By another act the legislature went so far as to provide that in certain cases the employees of corporations, partnerships, and individuals in West Boylston should be entitled to compensation when thrown out of work by the taking of the property of their employers under the act. Stat. 1896, chap. 450, p. 444. The purpose of the legislature to deal liberally with those affected by the construction of the reservoir is thus shown, and the provisions now before us should be construed in accordance with the intention thus manifested. The word "business" is of large significance, and "denotes the employment or occupation in which a person is engaged to procure a living." Goddard v. Chaffee, 2 Allen, 395, 79 Am. Dec. 796. That farming is a business is plain (Snow v. Sheldon, 126 Mass. 332, 30 Am. Rep. 684), and there is nothing in the statute that excludes it any more than any other business from its operation. It is manifest, also, we think, that the petitioner was engaged in the business of farming. That was the means, and, so far as appears, the only means, whereby he procured a livelihood for himself and his family. The more difficult question is whether, as he carried it on, it was "an established business" within the meaning of the statute. That it was a business "on land in the town of West Boylston would seem to hardly admit of question." In this connection it is to be noted that the business of farming as carried on by the petitioner included not only the raising of farm products, but the selling of a portion of the same. As a farmer he raised and sold farm products. He had owned and had thus carried on the farm for many years,—fifteen it is said in the brief,—and, so far as he was concerned, the business was an established business. It had got beyond the stage of experiment, and had become his settled and only occupation, and, for aught that appears, furnished a comfortable living for himself and his family. Any element of uncertainty or chance that there may have been about it at any time had disappeared, and he could and did depend on it from year to year for a livelihood for himself and family. If the persons in Oakdale to whom he sold his surplus produce had gone to his farm, and bought there, or if he had had a shop in the village, there can be no doubt, we think, that he would have had an established business on land in West Boylston within the meaning of the act. It is said, however, that he had no regular route or customers, and that there was nothing in the nature of a good will,—such as goes, for instance, with a physician's practice: that, in short, there was nothing in the nature of property in the business as carried on by the petitioner, and that it was only such cases for which the legislature intended to provide. But this case would seem to show that there may be an established business without a regular route or regular customers, or anything in the nature of a good will. If these things are present in any given case, they show beyond question that the business is an established business. But the words have no settled meaning (Ex parte Breull, L. R. 16 Ch. Div. 484), and are to be construed with reference to the circumstances of each particular case. The petitioner had been carrying on the same business, in the same locality, and on and from the same farm, for fifteen years. How can it be said that the business was not an established business? Presumably the village of Oakdale was a small place, and he may have found it more to his advantage to sell where and as he could than to adhere to a fixed route and regular customers; and so an established relation may have existed between him and the citizens of that village as to the sale of his farm products. It is also to be noted in this connection that by the terms of the act compensation is to be given whether the damage occurs by loss of custom or otherwise. The petitioner's farm was, as said in Earle v. Com. 180 Mass. 579, 583, 57 L. R. A. 292, 91 Am. St. Rep. 326, 63 N. E. 10, of a doctor's office, "the locally established center from which he distributed what he had to sell," and his business could therefore be fairly said to have been an established business on land in West Boylston. The fact that he did not raise things in large quantities, or that the farm was a small one, has, of course, no tendency to show that the business was not an established business. The legislature did not mean that everyone in the towns of West Boylston, Boylston, Sterling, and Clinton who should be injured in his business or occupation by the construction of the reservoir should receive compensation therefor. But by the building of the reservoir certain towns and villages would be altogether destroyed, and the inhabitants scattered. Naturally, there would be cases in which individuals derived support for themselves and their families in whole or in part from supplying the wants of the people living in the towns and villages that would be thus broken up, and whose business would be very seriously interfered with, if not altogether destroyed. Such cases might well appeal to the consideration of the legislature, and we think that it was the object of the legislature to provide for them. By the use of the word "established" it intended to exclude cases where the business had not an element of fixity and permanence, and by the use of the words "on land in the town of West Boylston" to confine the right of recovery to cases which were local in their character. A majority of the court think that the petitioner's case comes within the scope of the statute as thus defined, and that he is entitled to recover, and that judgment should be entered in his favor for $150, the amount of the damage found by the commissioners, and interest and costs. So ordered.

NOTE.—Right to recover for ordinary negligence under allegation of gross, wilful, or wanton negligence, or vice versa.

III. Allegation of reckless or wanton negligence, or both, 608.

IV. Recovery on allegation of ordinary negligence, on proof of wilful or gross negligence, 608.

V. Under statute or ordinance, 612.

VI. Conclusion, 614.

I. Introduction.

In the endeavor to ascertain the true rule as to the right mentioned in the title hereto, one is met at the start with the difficulty in determining just what is comprehended in the term "gross negligence," and whether it can be so extended, when applied to the act of a 69 L. R. A.

degree of such want of care, so long as the element of inadvertence remains, wilfulness is excluded.

2. The term "gross negligence" signifies wilfulness. It involves intent, actual or constructive, which is a characteristic of criminal liability. If one is guilty of inadvertence causing injury to another, that one's fault is denominated want of ordinary care. If one is guilty of wilful misconduct causing actionable injury to another, the former's fault is denominated "gross negligence."

3. Since, in the first case suggested, intention to do the injury, actual or con-party in the commission of an injury to another, as to become the equivalent of wilful or intentional injury. Some of the courts have intimated in strong terms that there is a decided difference; and in one state the ultimate court has decided that "negligence, whether slight, ordinary, or gross, is still negligence; . . . negligence is negative in its nature, implying the omission of duty, and excludes the idea of wilfulness. . . . When wilfulness is an element in the conduct of the party charged, the case ceases to be one of negligence." Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Graham, 95 Ind. 293, 48 Am. Rep. 719.

And in Parker v. Pennsylvania Co. 134 Ind. 673, 23 L. R. A. 552, 34 N. E. 504, it was said that "wilfulness does not consist in negligence; on the contrary, . . . the two terms are incompatible. Negligence arises from inattention, thoughtlessness, or heedlessness, while wilfulness cannot exist without purpose or design. No purpose or design can be said to structive, must be absent, and in the second case present, a complaint using language to describe defendant's fault appropriate to both species of misconduct, as if they occurred at one and the same time, and that one included the other, is indefinite and uncertain.

4. Gross negligence does not include ordinary negligence, and proof of the former does not prove, but rather disproves, the latter.

5. Where a complaint is indefinite and uncertain because of the pleader's confusing the element of advertence with that of inadvertence, ordinary negligence with gross negligence, and the attention of the trial court is called thereto, though not in the most approved manner, it should compel the plaintiff to proceed upon one theory or the other, if both theories can be reasonably spelled out of the pleadings, or give such permissible construction to the pleadings as to confine plaintiff's claim to one species of wrongdoing.

6. Where a complaint has a double aspect rendering it indefinite and uncertain, as above indicated, it is error to submit the cause to the jury upon both aspects, and, in case error is committed in that regard resulting in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff upon the ground of gross negligence and ordinary negligence as well, it is error to render judgment thereon, because of inconsistency in the findings.

(December 13, 1904.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Winnebago County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for the al-exist where the injurious act results from negligence, and negligence cannot be of such a degree as to become wilfulness."

And the same court has held that the word "wanton," in a complaint in an action against a railroad company for injuring a child, in that the defendant in a wanton and careless manner ran a locomotive, etc., does not mean wilful. Lafayette & I. R. Co. v. Huffman, 28 Ind. 287, 92 Am. Dec. 318.

And also that an allegation in a complaint in an action against a railroad company for causing an injury to the plaintiff, that the train was run "recklessly and with gross negligence," does not imply that the injury was inflicted either purposely or wilfully. Cincinnati & M. R. Co. v. Eaton, 53 Ind. 307.

And again, in Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Bryan, 107 Ind. 51, 7 N. E. 807, "to say that an injury resulted from the negligence and wilful conduct of another is to affirm that the same act is the result of two exactly opposite mental conditions. It is to affirm in one breath that an act was done through inattention, thoughtlessly, heedlessly, and at the same time purposely and by design." And yet in the same case it was conceded that an act done under such circumstances as evinced a reckless disregard for the safety of others, and a willingness to inflict the injury complained of, constituted wilful injury, as fully as an intentional act. This was approved in Belt R. & Stock Yard Co. v. Mann, 107 Ind. 89, 7 N. E. 893, in which case it was further said that, if the injurious act or omission was committed under such circumstances as that its natural and probable consequences would be to produce injury to others, it would be as effectual to entitle one to recover for an injury to which his own negligence may have contributed as if such act or omission had been purposely and intentionally committed with a design to produce injury.

In Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Buhehr, 30 Colo. 27, 69 Pac. 582, the court said: "In passing, we observe that an allegation that an act is wanton, reckless, and grossly negligent is not equivalent to an allegation of a wilful or an intentional act."

The use of the expression "gross negligence," in a charge to the jury, does not of itself define, nor does it include only, that extreme degree of negligence which is wanton or reckless of its injurious consequences, and to which the defense of contributory negligence does not obtain; and cannot be held as having been intended to submit the case to the jury for consideration as one of that character, and particularly so where other charges have recognized contributory negligence as a defense to the action.—Florida Southern R. Co. v. Hirst, 30 Fla. 1, 16 L. R. A. 631, 32 Am. St. Rep. 17, 11 So. 506.

And, as "gross negligence" is not confined to that extreme degree of negligence which evinces reckless disregard of human life or of the safety of persons exposed to its dangerous effects; or a conscious indifference to consequences; or which shows wantonness or recklessness, or a grossly careless disregard of the safety and welfare of the public, or a reckless indifference to the rights of others which is equivalent to an intentional violation of them,—It is not proper to charge a jury simply that gross negligence will justify the imposition of exemplary damages. Ibid.

It must be admitted that there are much truth and considerable logic in these statements. But the general trend of decision would appear from the cases to be in favor of the doctrine that an act may be so grossly negligent that it may be presumed to have been wilfully or intentionally done. And the last two Indiana cases seem substantially to concede such proposition.

In RIDEOUT v. WINNEBAGO TRACTION Co. the doctrine is asserted and maintained that "gross negligence" in the commission of an act which perpetrates an injury is the same as, and means and includes, a wilful injury; and, on the other hand, that between what is merely termed negligence, or ordinary negligence, and gross negligence there is a wide distinction,—one with a difference,—and that because of it no recovery can be sustained on proof of the former, under a complaint alleging the latter.

II. Allegation of wilful or gross negligence.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Johnston, 79 Ala. 436, the gravamen of the action, as averred in the complaint, was, that the defendant "wilfully refused to stop" the train of cars at the station which was the point of the plaintiff's destination, and carried her several hundred yards beyond the customary stopping place, where she was compelled to alight without her consent and against her protest; and leged negligent killing of plaintiffs' intestate. Reversed.

Statement by Marshall, J.:

Action for damages for the alleged wrongful killing of plaintiffs' intestate. The circumstances stated as a ground for a recovery are substantially these: From June 22, 1897, up to and inclusive of the event complained of, defendant was a corporation duly organized under the laws of this state, and authorized to operate an electric street railway on various streets, including Merritt street, in the city of Oshkosh, Wisconsin. August 24, 1903, the Uniformed Rank, Knights of Pythias in such city, some being on foot and some being in carriages,—one of the former being Christian Sarau,—marched in parade formation along the street specially mentioned, escorted by a military band of twenty-four pieces discoursing music. Some of the marchers, including Sarau, in the exercise of ordinary care, walked between the rails of defendant's track located on such street, and others walked on either side thereof. While so doing defendant's servant with one of its cars approached the procession from the rear at a dangerous rate of speed, without giving any sufficient warning to the marchers to yield the right of way before reaching them. The car, going at such dangerous rate of speed, without sufficient warning being given as aforesaid, was carelessly, negligently, recklessly, and wantonly propelled into the

the court said that, under this averment of the complaint, there could be no recovery in the action, unless the evidence in the case satisfied the jury that the failure of the defendant's servant to stop the train was wilful, and, if it was merely negligent, without more, there would be a fatal variance between the allegations and the proof.

In Birmingham Mineral R. Co. v. Jacobs, 92 Ala. 187, 12 L. R. A. 830, 9 So. 320, the charge, in the first count of the complaint, that the servants and agents of the defendant company negligently, wantonly, recklessly, and wilfully caused, permitted, and suffered the collision of a train under their management and control with a dummy engine, whereby the said intestate was killed, was held not sustained, where there was no testimony tending to show that the collision was "wilfully caused by defendant's servants," but the trend of the whole testimony repelled such inference; and that the refusal of a request so to instruct the jury was error. The court said that this was the identical question which was raised and ruled on in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Johnston, 79 Ala. 436, and that, while the point might be somewhat technical, they did not feel at liberty to depart from the ruling then made.

In Highland Ave. & Belt R. Co. v. Winn, 93 Ala. 306, 9 So. 509, where both counts of a complaint alleged that the plaintiff attempted to get off the defendant's train, after protesting against being required to do so, through fear superinduced by the threatening attitude of the conductor; and the first count further averred that the fall she received in making this coerced attempt was caused by the "wrongful and malicious act of the conductor" in requiring or forcing her to get off while the train was in motion; and in the second count the fall was ascribed to the "wilful and negligent acts of the conductor and engineer,"—the court, in reversing a judgment for the plaintiff, said that the doctrine of the court is that under such a complaint no recovery can be had for mere negligence; that wilfulness or its equivalent, recklessness, or wantonness must be proved; citing and approving Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Johnston, 79 Ala. 436, and stating that the principle of that case was adhered to and renounced in Birmingham Mineral R. Co. v. Jacobs, 92 Ala. 187, 12 L. R. A. 830, 9 So. 320.

cases, that a charge that the act complained of was wilful, or that it was knowingly done, cannot be supported by evidence of mere negligence, not involving wilfulness or knowledge of the danger, was affirmed, and the cases themselves were approved, in Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Crocker, 95 Ala. 412, 11 So. 262. The court in this case gave, by inference at least, an additional argument why this principle should be maintained, and stated that it had been held that a plea of contributory negligence to a complaint charging a wilful infliction of injury by the defendant is bad on demurrer; citing Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Frazier, 93 Ala. 45, 30 Am. St. Rep. 28, 9 So. 303, the inference being that, if a plaintiff should allege in his complaint that the injury was caused by the wilfulness of the defendant, or that it was knowingly done, and the plaintiff was permitted to recover by proof of mere negligence, the defendant would be deprived of his defense of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, as, under the decision in the Frazier Case, a demurrer to such a defense would be good.

And this theory would seem to be confirmed in another case, which decided that, where a count in a complaint against a railroad company for injury charged in one clause that the injury was wantonly inflicted, and the other clause set out the facts constituting the alleged wanton conduct; and, from the whole construed together,—as it must be,—it was evident that the facts relied upon to show wantonness amounted to no more than simple negligence,—a demurrer thereto should be sustained, Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Martin, 117 Ala. 367, 23 So. 231. The reason undoubtedly was that, although the defense of contributory negligence to a complaint alleging that the injury was wantonly inflicted would be demurrable, the plaintiff should not be permitted, by the use of the epithet "wantonly" in a general attempt to describe the injury,—which the facts alleged showed to be a case of ordinary negligence,—thus to deprive the defendant of his proper defense of contributory negligence.

Where a count in a complaint against a railroad company for causing injury to the plaintiff alleged that the defendant knew of plaintiff's danger, "and could, by the exercise of proper diligence, have prevented his injuries as aforesaid, which it negligently failed to do," the negligence thus averred being the equivaspace occupied by the marchers and onto and over said Sarau, causing injuries from which he on the same day died.

Sarau suffered great mental and physical pain from the instant he was injured till death occurred, and plaintiffs as his personal representatives were put to great expense by reason of such wrongful conduct for medical and surgical care of and attendance upon Sarau, and for nursing and hospital bills.

Several times in the complaint the conduct of the defendant's servant who controlled the car was characterized as careless, negligent, reckless, wilful, and wanton, or by words of similar import. Allegations were made appropriate to a cause of action for damages to Sarau, which survived to his personal representatives, and also a cause of action for damages to his surviving relatives, the whole amount claimed being $10,000.

Defendant answered putting in issue the allegations of the complaint as to its servant having negligently operated the car on the occasion in question, and pleaded as the proximate cause of the injury and death of Sarau, want of ordinary care on his part.

It fairly appears from the record, in harmony with the claim of respondents' attorneys upon the argument of the case in this court, that respondents' right to recover was intended to be grounded on gross negligence. The court, nevertheless, refused to construe the complaint in harmony with the charge of wantonness or wilful misconduct, to authorize a recovery it was necessary to prove the negligence averred; and proof of simple negligence,—that is the failure to exercise ordinary care,—would not sustain such an allegation. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hurt, 101 Ala. 34, 13 So. 130.

In Levin v. Memphis & C. R. Co., 109 Ala. 332, 19 So. 395, the counts upon which the trial was had claimed damages resulting from the defendant's wantonness or wilfulness, and there was no evidence of wantonness or wilfulness. This being so, the court said that, conceding for the argument that the evidence tended to show negligence on the part of the defendant, this did not authorize a recovery on the case made by the complaint; and an affirmative charge for the defendant was sustained.

Where a complaint against a railroad company for injury sustained by the plaintiff alleged that the injury was occasioned by an intentional, wilful, and deliberate act or omission of duty of defendant's servants, the plaintiff must be held to proof of such act or omission, as such a complaint states a cause of action based not upon mere negligence, but upon an intentional, wilful act or dereliction of duty on the part of defendant's servant, characterized by recklessness or heedlessness as to the consequences of his act, or failure to act. Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Buffehr, 30 Colo. 27, 69 Pac. 582.

In Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Dickson, 88 Ill. 431, which was an action for damages for injuring the plaintiff by a collision, the first count of the plaintiff's declaration charged as the cause of the injury that the defendant's servants caused the whistle of the engine to be sounded in a loud, shrill, unnecessary, and negligent manner, needlessly, wantonly, negligently, and maliciously, whereby, etc.; the second count charged as the cause of the injury that, as the train was approaching from the rear, the servants of defendant caused the whistle to be sounded in sharp, shrill, loud sounds, and in quick and rapid succession, needlessly, recklessly, wilfully, wantonly, and maliciously, whereby, etc. The court held that, under the first count, it was competent for the plaintiff, under appropriate proof, to have made out a case of negligence on the part of the defendant, and that in answer to such a case, so made, it would have been competent for the defendant to show contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and, unless the negligence of the defendant was gross, and that of the plaintiff slight in comparison to that of the defendant, no recovery could have been had; but that, under the second count, the plaintiff could not recover upon proof of mere negligence on the part of the defendant; that no recovery could be had under that count, without proof that the sounding of the whistle in the manner charged was done needlessly, and either wantonly, recklessly, wilfully, or maliciously. Approved and followed in Wabash R. Co. v. Speer, 156 Ill. 244, 40 N. E. 885.

In view of the position taken by the court in these cases, it should be stated that the doctrine of comparative negligence prevails in Illinois.

Under a complaint charging wilfulness and gross negligence, and claiming that the injury complained of occurred by reason of the wilfulness and gross negligence of the defendant's servants, it was held that the plaintiff could recover only by proving that the deceased was wilfully killed by the railroad company, and that the simple fact that the deceased was struck and killed by the train under circumstances which did not tend to prove a wilful killing would not sustain such a complaint. Indianapolis & V. R. Co. v. McClaren, 62 Ind. 566.

"Gross or reckless negligence" is not wilful negligence; and it would be error to instruct a jury that, under a pleading charging a wilful injury, they might find for the plaintiff by simply finding that the defendant was guilty of "gross or reckless negligence," for it would be necessary to find wilfulness. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Hedges, 105 Ind. 398, 7 N. E. 801.

In an action against a railroad company for killing the plaintiff's cow, the court said that a case like this must proceed upon one theory or the other; that a single paragraph of a complaint cannot be framed in such a manner as to entitle the party to recover either for an intentional or negligent injury as the facts may appear; and that in this case, the plaintiff having elected to sue for an injury intentionally and wilfully committed, he must stand by that theory, and cannot, without other pleadings, shift his ground and recover upon the theory that the defendant was negligent.

therewith, and submitted the cause to the jury for specific findings covering the subject of liability for ordinary negligence, and for gross negligence as well. The result was the following verdict:

(1) Sarau came to his death by injuries received at the time and place alleged in the complaint. (2) Defendant's employees were guilty of want of ordinary care and prudence in operating the car at the time of the accident. (3) Such want of ordinary care and prudence was the proximate cause of the injury to Sarau. (4) The motorman was guilty of gross negligence; his conduct was malicious, wanton, and reckless, evincing a disregard of consequences to others. (5) The car was going at a speed of 15 miles an hour when it ran through the band, before it reached Sarau.

(6) He could not have seen the car approaching him in time to have avoided the collision. (7) The motorman did not try to stop the car upon its becoming apparent to him that it would strike Sarau. (8) When the accident occurred the car was running at the rate of 15 miles an hour. (9) Want of ordinary care on Sarau's part did not contribute to produce the injury. (10) Damages were caused by the occurrence, for doctors' bills and hospital bill, $75, funeral expense, $421, physical pain and mental suffering of Sarau, $500, loss to his surviving relatives by his death, $4,500.

After the coming in of the verdict the court changed finding 6 so as to decide that

Indiana, B. & W. Co. v. Overton, 117 Ind. 253, 20 N. E. 147.

Where, in an action against a railroad company for causing the death of the plaintiff's intestate, the complaint alleged that the killing was wilfully and intentionally done, a finding of a jury, the effect of which is a conclusion that the killing of the decedent was through the negligence of the defendant, will not support the complaint, or a judgment thereon, in favor of the plaintiff, no matter what the degree of that negligence may be, as negligence in a case, whether it be in a degree that may be termed slight, ordinary, or gross, is nevertheless negligence still; and, when wilfulness is the essential element in the act or conduct of the party charged with the wrong, the case ceases to be one of negligence. Wilfulness and negligence are opposite of each other; the former signifying the presence of intention, and the latter its absence. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Miller, 149 Ind. 490, 49 N. E. 445.

An allegation in a complaint in an action against a railroad company for killing the plaintiff's horse averred that the servants of the company negligently, mischievously, and wilfully caused a large amount of steam to be let out of a locomotive and expelled therefrom, whereby the horse was frightened and became unmanageable, and was so injured that it was necessary to kill him. This allegation was held to admit of no other interpretation than a charge of wilfulness, and, as there was no evidence to show that the escape of the steam was unnecessary, it could not be presumed that it was so, and the evidence failed to sustain the allegation of wilful injury, although it was sufficient to sustain another count of the complaint charging negligence. Per Ross, J., in Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Davis, 7 Ind. App. 222, 33 N. E. 451.

Where, in an action for injury to plaintiff by the gripman of a street railway company in forcing him off from the car, the petition charged that the gripman actually pushed the plaintiff from the car, while the plaintiff's own testimony showed that the gripman first shoved at him with a broom, then put that down, and tried to strike him with his hand, when the plaintiff dodged the blow, and in doing so fell off the car and was injured, a demurrer to the evidence should have been successful, as the evidence did not correspond with the allegation. 69 L. R. A.

legations; and for another reason, that the petition did not charge negligence pure and simple, but a singular commingling or jumble of both negligence and wanton acts; and, if the act is intentional, the question of negligence does not arise, and so proof of negligence does not sustain a charge of wanton or intentional injury. Raming v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 157 Mo. 477, 50 S. W. 791, 57 S. W. 268.

The policy of the Code of Procedure of Missouri is to require the party to state in his pleading his real ground of action or defense, and, if he chooses one ground, he cannot so enlarge it as to recover on another; and where, in an action for a personal injury, the issues made by the pleadings are not large enough to embrace the hypothesis of a wilful or intentional injury, it is error for the court to instruct the jury on such a theory, although the evidence in a proper state of the pleadings might have warranted such an instruction, for the procedure is very strict to the effect that it is error to submit to the jury an issue of fact not made by the pleadings. O'Brien v. Loomis, 43 Mo. App. 29.

In Wilson v. Chippewa Valley Electric R. Co. 120 Wis. 630, 66 L. R. A. 912, 98 N. W. 536, the court said: "This court has held that, where the complaint simply charges negligence or want of ordinary care, there can be no recovery on the ground of wilful injury, or that reckless and wanton disregard of another's rights, equivalent to wilful injury, which has been termed 'gross negligence,' because this is a different cause of action. McClellan v. Chippewa Valley Electric R. Co. 110 Wis. 326, 85 N. W. 1018. Is the converse of the proposition true? We think it must logically be so held."

In an action against a railroad company for an injury alleged to have been caused by sparks escaping from the spark arrester of a steamboat, where the allegation of four counts of the declaration was that the defendant wilfully left the spark arrester open, thereby allowing sparks to escape and be carried by the wind upon plaintiff's property, and set fire to them, it was held that the charge involved more than negligence; that it implied malice. And that, as the evidence simply showed negligence on the part of the defendant, there could be no recovery under the evidence upon those counts. Montgomery v. Muskegon Boom.

Sarau could have seen the approaching car in time to have avoided the collision.

Exceptions were duly taken to preserve for review numerous questions, including those discussed in the opinion, so far as exceptions were necessary in that regard. Judgment was rendered in plaintiffs' favor on the verdict, from which this appeal was taken.

The allegations are inconsistent with and negative each other, and therefore state no cause of action.

If a traveler, by looking, could have seen the approaching train in time to escape, it will be presumed, in case he was injured by a collision, either that he did not look, or, if he did look, that he did not heed what he saw. Such conduct is negligence per se.

Cawley v. La Crosse City R. Co. 101 Wis. 145, 77 N. W. 179.

Contributory negligence of the plaintiff,

Co. 88 Mich. 633, 26 Am. St. Rep. 308, 50 N. W. 729.

But in Richter v. Harper, 95 Mich. 221, 54 S. W. 768, where the word "wilful" was employed in a declaration which charged that the defendant wilfully, wantonly, negligently, and unlawfully caused the fire to be set which was the cause of the injury complained of, it was held that if the word "wilful" stood alone, or was coupled with other words which implied a purpose to do a direct injury to the property of the plaintiff, a contention that it was necessary for the plaintiff to prove more than ordinary negligence would be of more force; but, where the word was used in connection with others imputing negligence, it was not the rule that the plaintiff must show the appropriateness of every adjective employed in his declaration. The court said, further, that it was true that language was employed in Montgomery v. Muskegon Boom Co. 88 Mich. 633, 26 Am. St. Rep. 308, 50 N. W. 729, in seeming conflict with this holding, but that the decision of that question was unnecessary to the determination of the case, and, in so far as it implied a holding in conflict with the views here expressed, it should not be followed. This decision was approved and followed in Keating v. Detroit, B. C. & A. R. Co. 104 Mich. 418, 62 N. W. 575.

In an action for digging up the soil of a lot contiguous to the plaintiff, the allegation in the declaration was that the defendant, maliciously intending to injure the plaintiff, and deprive him of the use and advantage of his message, dug up the soil of a certain lot contiguous, whereby the foundation walls were subverted, and a great part of the message foundered and fell, and the residue was greatly broken and shattered. The defendant moved at the trial for a nonsuit, on the ground that, the declaration being founded on the malfeasance, and not the misfeasance, of the defendant, the question of negligence or unskillfulness could not arise; and that the declaration was not supported by the evidence, inasmuch as it appeared that the defendant dug on his own ground, which was lawful in itself, and it did not appear that the act was done maliciously. The motion was denied, and on the writ of error the supreme court held 60 L. R. A.

that it was properly denied, and in doing so said that, if the plaintiff had stated, in his declaration, that the act was done maliciously, further proof would have been necessary. That it would then be a case of malfeasance, an inquiry distinct in its nature from a case where damages are claimed, either on the ground of negligence or unskillfulness, or that the act complained of does, of itself, subject the party to damages, although done with the greatest care. But that the allegation "maliciously intended" was not of the essence of the action or descriptive of the manner of doing the act which occasioned the injury, and might well be rejected as surplusage, still leaving a good declaration, to support which the proof was competent. Panton v. Holland, 17 Johns. 92, 8 Am. Dec. 369.

In an action for a recovery for an injury alleged to have been inflicted by the defendant upon the plaintiff, the complaint alleged that the defendant negligently, recklessly, and wilfully so drove and managed his horses as to force the plaintiff into the ditch and upset him. It was held that the words "recklessly and wilfully" were not necessary to make out a count for negligence; that they were surplusage, and were properly treated as such. Moore v. Drayton, 40 N. Y. S. R. 933, 16 N. Y. Supp. 723. And, as to the latter statement, see Edgerton v. New York & H. R. Co. 35 Barb. 389, infra, IV.

In an action against a highway commissioner for obstructing a natural water course which furnished the plaintiff water for his pasture, where the plaintiff's petition averred that the acts complained of were wilfully and maliciously done, it was claimed by the defendant that a recovery could not be had for careless and negligent acts, but only for such as were proved to have been wilful and malicious; but it was held that, if the defendant is liable for negligent and careless acts, recovery may be had against him upon the petition charging the acts to have been wilful and malicious, without proof of malice; and the court said that this was so under the old system of pleading, which was more strict in its requirements, that the proof should correspond with the allegations of the declaration, than is the present system. That it was held that the al-however slight, precludes his recovering in an action grounded on the defendant's negligence, however great such negligence may have been.

Where the plaintiff mingled in his petition and in the same count different incongruous causes of action,—one for rent accrued, and one for injuries to a mill, alleged to have resulted from the defendant's wilful negligence,—an instruction that, unless the jury believed the plaintiff's mill was injured by the wilful negligence of the defendant, or someone in his employment, they should find for the defendant, as respected that branch of the case, was held to be clearly erroneous, as it might have seriously misled the jury, and the error in the instruction was not cured by the form of the allegation of negligence in the petition. That the allegation of "wilful" negligence in the pleading was wholly immaterial, and might have been struck out as surplusage. Taylor v. Holman, 45 Mo. 371.

In Roberson v. Morgan, 118 N. C. 991, 24 S. E. 667, the court said that the action seemed to have been brought and tried under §§ 52 and 53 of the Code, providing for the recovery of damages for setting a fire by which an adjacent landowner is injured, and that it was admitted in the statement of the case on appeal that the plaintiff and defendant were not adjacent landowners, and that, that being so, the sections did not apply, and the plaintiff's action could not be maintained: but that it was argued that it might be maintained at common-law, to which it was replied that the complaint did not allege a common-law liability, in that it failed to allege negligence, which the court held that it did not do in terms, but held, further, that negligence was in effect alleged in the allegation that the "defendant wilfully permitted" the fire to spread over and burn plaintiff's fencing, etc., and that, under the liberality of the Code practice, the complaint might be sustained as stating a common-law cause of action, as the court afterward held that the case was tried under the conception that the defendant was liable, if liable at all, under the sections of the Code mentioned, which was an error. The effect of the case would seem to be a dictum that an allegation that "defendant wilfully permitted" the fire to spread that injured the plaintiff would be sustained by proof of negligence on the part of the defendant.

The term "gross negligence" includes all lesser degrees of negligence, and a charge in a petition in an action against a railroad company for injury sustained by reason of the wheels of one of the cars of the company running over his foot, that the act of the company was done through gross negligence, will not limit the right of recovery, if otherwise entitled, to an injury inflicted by the wilful or intentional act of the servants of the company. Hays v. Gainesville Street R. Co. 70 Tex. 602, 8 Am. St. Rep. 624, 8 S. W. 491.

In an action against a railroad company by a brakeman on one of its trains, where the complaint alleged that the injury sustained was caused by the negligence of defendant in failing to provide good and safe brakes and appliances connected and used therewith, and by the defendant's negligently and carelessly omitting to keep its brakes on said train in good repair, and knowingly allowing the same to remain out of repair, it was contended, on the part of the defendant, that, having averred that the defendant "knowingly" suffered the brakes and appliances to remain out of repair, the plaintiff took upon himself the burden of proving that the corporation had knowledge of the imperfection,—in other words, that, having stated his alleged grievances with unnecessary particularity, his proof, to authorize recovery, must make out his cause of action as he already had chosen to allege it; but the court held that the complaint was not made up of one continuous, single ground, but contained several grounds, one following another, which might and should be construed distributively. That the language might be divided into the following separate words: "Caused by the negligence of the defendant in failing to provide good and safe brakes and appliances connected therewith," and, if the complaint had stopped here, it would have been manifestly good,—at least, in the absence of a demurrer; and, so framed, the question of knowledge of the imperfect condition of the brake and its appliances would not have been raised. That are conclusive that he neither looked nor listened for it; and that certainly constituted negligence on his part.

Messrs. Bouch & Hilton, A. E. Thompson, and John F. Kluwin for respondents.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It seems that from the time of drawing the complaint to the entry of judgment there was want of appreciation of the broad distinction between ordinary negligence and intentional wrongdoing, the former being characterized by inadvertence and the latter by advertence, the one requiring intent, actual or constructive, to injure, and the other being inconsistent therewith. Under the decisions of this court, and by there then followed another averment connected with the former by the conjunction "and," thus showing that it was an additional, or cumulative, charge or averment,—“and by the defendant's negligently and carelessly omitting to keep its brakes on said train in good repair,”—and then followed the words “and knowingly allowing the same to remain out of repair;” that the word “knowingly” only qualified the last clause of the complaint, or grievance charged; and that, in order to recover under the first clause, it was not necessary to show knowledge of the defendant. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Coulton, 86 Ala. 129, 5 So. 458.

In an action against a railroad company by the parents of one who, it was alleged, had been killed by the derailment of an engine of a freight train on which the son of the plaintiff was head brakeman, and in which action the petition alleged that the deceased was killed, that his death was caused by the defective condition of the defendant's engine and track; and charged that this defective condition resulted, and the death was caused, by the gross negligence of the defendant,—it was held that the allegation of gross negligence in the petition included a charge of ordinary negligence, and was sufficient to support a verdict based upon the finding of the latter. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Magrill, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 353, 40 S. W. 188.

Where the complaint in an action against a railroad company alleged that the defendant and its servants, upon arriving at the station to which the plaintiff had paid his fare, carelessly, recklessly, wilfully, and wantonly refused to stop the car so that the plaintiff might safely alight therefrom, but obliged him to jump from the car while it was in rapid motion, in doing which he received the injury complained of, this was held to be a statement of two distinct causes of action, one for exemplary damages, and one for actual damages; and, the plaintiff, of his own motion, having elected to try his cause for actual damages, and there being some testimony responsive to such an issue, it was held not competent for the trial judge to withdraw the case from the jury on the ground that there was no injury shown responsive to the issues. Thomas v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. 38 S. C. 485, 17 S. E. 226.

III. Allegation of reckless or wanton negligence, or both.

Where a count in a complaint for injury caused by a railroad company alleged that it was caused “by the gross carelessness, wantonness, or recklessness” of the defendant, no recovery could be had thereon, except upon proof that the defendant was guilty of having wantonly inflicted the injury, or of such reckless negligence as to be the equivalent of having wantonly or intentionally inflicted the wrong. Stringer v. Alabama Mineral R. Co. 99 Ala. 397, 13 So. 75.

In Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Crocker, 95 Ala. 412, 11 So. 262, the supreme court of Alabama said: “The word ‘wilful’ imports that the act to which it refers is done intentionally, purposely. This is not necessarily so with the word ‘reckless.’ The latter word has a wide range of meaning. In its milder sense it may imply mere inattention to duty,—thoughtlessness,—indifference, carelessness, negligence, or import a heedless disregard of obvious consequences;” also, that a complaint which charges recklessness in general terms charges no more than mere negligence, thoughtlessness, or inadvertence, which cannot be regarded as the equivalent of intentional wrong, and the averments of such a complaint by no means necessarily import that the objectionable act was wilful. Quoted and followed in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Barker, 96 Ala. 435, 11 So. 453; Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Farmer, 97 Ala. 141, 12 So. 86.

And, as has been seen, the Indiana supreme court has gone further, and added the term “wanton” to the category, holding that it, with “reckless,” simply imports ordinary negligence (supra, I.).

The word “recklessly,” employed in a complaint, in qualifying the act of the defendant's servants in an action against a railroad company for injuring the plaintiff, means no more than “negligently.” Highland Ave. & Belt R. Co. v. Sampson, 112 Ala. 425, 20 So. 566.

IV. Recovery on allegation of ordinary negligence, on proof of wilful or gross negligence.

Under a complaint alleging an ordinary trespass in wrongfully taking personal property, evidence may be given and a recovery may be had on account of the gross negligence the better rule, it is believed, prevailing wherever the doctrine of comparative negligence does not prevail, as it does not here, that species of wrong, which has been denominated in this and some other jurisdictions "gross negligence," is impossible if there is mere want of ordinary care. Therefore to charge that an alleged wrongdoer was guilty of one species of wrongful conduct, and allow a recovery for guilt of the other, or to charge both as characterizing the same wrongful act and allow a general recovery, is wrong. A pleading with such an infirmity is indefinite and uncertain and open to a motion on that ground. The practice of charging that one caused injury to another by careless, negligent, wanton, and wilful misconduct, or of using language of similar import in attempting to state a cause of action, is improper. This court so held, in effect, in Bolin v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 108 Wis. 333, 81 Am. St. Rep. 911, 84 N. W. 446, and cases there referred to, and so held expressly in Wilson v. Chippewa Valley Electric R. Co. 120 Wis. 636, 66 L. R. A. 912, 98 N. W. 536. In the former this language was used: "Inadvertence, in some degree, is the distinguishing characteristic of negligence, while misconduct of a more reprehensible character, characterized by rashness, wantonness, and recklessness of a person as regards the personal safety of another, has been designated by this court as gross negligence." That involves "a suf-of the defendant. Wilkinson v. Searcy, 76 Ala. 176. The question decided arose upon a charge of the court that, if the act was done wilfully (in its strong sense), or was the result of that reckless indifference to the rights of others which is equivalent to an intentional violation of them; or if the injury had been wanton, or malicious, or gross,—the jury might award punitive or exemplary damages; and, the defendant having asked a charge to the effect that exemplary damages could not be awarded, as they were not claimed in the complaint, the court, on appeal, said the charge was correctly refused, as exemplary damages are not special damages, but might be claimed in the complaint as a condition of their recovery.

In Savannah & W. R. Co. v. Meadors, 95 Ala. 137, 10 So. 141, the court said that, under the system of pleading in Alabama under a count for simple negligence, a recovery might be had upon proof of wanton negligence.

And in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Webb, 97 Ala. 308, 12 So. 374, it was also held that the practice prevailing in Alabama authorizes the introduction of evidence of reckless, wanton, or wilful negligence on the part of the defendant under a complaint which avers only simple negligence.

Where a complaint counts upon simple negligence, a recovery can be had thereon if the proof shows that the injury was caused by the wanton, reckless, or intentional misconduct of defendant. Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Farmer, 97 Ala. 141, 12 So. 86. This was held to be the rule to rebut the defense of contributory negligence.

Where a count of a complaint against a railroad company for injury charged simple negligence as distinguished from wanton or wilful negligence, or its equivalent, it was proper to admit evidence to show that the defendant negligently failed to use preventive effort after discovering plaintiff's peril, and that such negligence caused the injury; the conclusion, of course, being that failing to use preventive effort after discovering plaintiff's peril was the equivalent of wanton or wilful negligence, and in deciding another question on another count the court said so in so many words. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hurt, 101 Ala. 34, 13 So. 130.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Markee, 103 Ala. 160, 49 Am. St. Rep. 21, 15 So. 511, the court, after citing authorities showing that the various propositions, namely,—that where the plaintiff counts upon wilful or wanton negligence, and the proof shows only simple negligence, there is that variance between the allegata and probata, which will defeat a recovery; that, if there is that variance between simple negligence and wanton or wilful injury that proof of the former will not sustain a complaint charging the latter, a replication to a plea of contributory negligence, averring wilful and intentional injury, would be a departure from a complaint charging simple negligence; and that a plea of contributory negligence is no answer to a complaint counting upon wilful or wanton negligence,—said further: "The practice which has obtained in this state, and to some extent justified by adjudications of this court, of proving wilful injury, or wanton negligence as its equivalent, under a complaint averring only simple negligence, should no longer prevail. It is not correct in principle or practice, and leads to confusion or injustice. . . . A plaintiff is presumed to know his cause of action when he brings his suit, and has the right to state it in as many counts as he may deem it necessary to meet the varying phases of the evidence; and it is his duty to fully inform the defendant by his declaration of all the grounds of complaint relied upon for a recovery. Having done this, the defendant is in a condition to prepare his pleas in defense. It is not just for the parties to go to trial, and after having entered upon the trial, upon issues shaped by the pleading to permit either party, against the objections of the other, unless specially authorized by statute, to inject a new issue, and allow the plaintiff to recover upon a cause of action not stated in his complaint; or the defendant to avail himself of a defense of which his adversary is not apprised by the plea." This case was cited and followed in Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Hall, 105 Ala. 599, 17 So. 176, and Jones v. Alabama Mineral R. Co. 107 Ala. 400, 13 So. 30.

In Rockford, R. I. & St. L. R. Co. v. Phillips, 66 Ill. 548, the court said that the real gravamen of the original declaration, and which was adhered to and preserved in each of the amended declarations, was that the defendant was the owner of the railroad, and operating it by running locomotives and trains thereon; that plaintiff's horse strayed and got upon the ficient degree of intent at least to be inconsistent with inadvertence."

In the last case cited this court said of the effect of the decision in the Bolin Case as to a wrong of this nature (one alleged to have been characterized by wantonness and wilfulness): "There is really no element of inadvertence, which is a necessary element of negligence, and hence the term 'gross negligence,' as applicable to this class of wrongs, is inaccurate. The conclusion is that when this kind of a wrong is charged, as in the present case, though it be called 'gross negligence,' it does not logically include ordinary negligence any more than a charge of ordinary negligence includes intentional wrong."

In Decker v. McSorley, 116 Wis. 643, 93

defendant's railroad, and the defendant, by its servants, so carelessly, negligently, and improperly ran, conducted, and directed the locomotive and train of the defendant as that the locomotive struck the plaintiff's horse with great force and violence, and killed it. The court held that proof of gross negligence would support this allegation, as it was a matter of common practice to allow plaintiff, who has simply averred negligence, and there is proof of contributory negligence on his part, to prove gross negligence in the defendant, and recover under such declaration.

In an action on the case against a railroad company for killing animals of the plaintiff, where a count in the declaration alleged that the animals were killed by the mere negligence and carelessness of the agents and servants of the defendants in operating their engines and cars on their railroad, it was held that gross negligence might be proved, as it was not necessary to aver it, but only to aver that the act was negligently and carelessly performed; and when the right of recovery depends upon the degree, as for wilful or gross negligence, it is a matter of proof, and not of pleading. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Carter, 20 Ill. 390; Approved and Followed in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Mehlisack, 44 Ill. App. 124.

In Pennsylvania Co. v. Krick, 47 Ind. 368, it was insisted by the defendant that, as the complaint only charged ordinary negligence, evidence could not be given under it of gross negligence, and that a verdict founded or found on such evidence was wrong; but the court held that this was not so; that a charge of negligence by the plaintiff against the defendant was broad enough to admit proof of any and all degrees of negligence, if any such degrees of negligence in law existed; that, while negligence should be charged in the complaint, it was the province of the evidence to show in what it consisted.

In Ft. Wayne v. De Witt, 47 Ind. 396, the court, in holding that the complaint, although containing the affirmative allegation that the injury resulted without the fault of the plaintiff, did not state facts showing the negligence of the defendant, and that the existence of such negligence must be averred, said: "But it is not necessary to set out the facts constituting such negligence. It is sufficient, when the act complained of is properly stated,

N. W. 808, it was said that "no degree of mere carelessness or inadvertence constitutes gross negligence or wilful misconduct." And in Watermolen v. Fox River Electric R. & Power Co. 110 Wis. 153, 85 N. W. 663, that "it is obvious that no degree of mere carelessness or inadvertence, however remote from the care customarily used, either by the ordinary careful man, or by the exceptionally careless one, constitutes gross negligence." The latter suggests necessarily intent, either actual or constructive, to cause injury, or "conduct evincing a total disregard for the safety of persons or property."

The doctrine above indicated is not supported by authorities universally, though the want of harmony will be generally to aver generally that such act was negligently done; and, under this general averment, proof of any and every degree of negligence is admissible." Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Selby, 47 Ind. 471, 17 Am. Rep. 719, to the same effect.

In an action against a railroad company the complaint, after alleging a contract to carry the mails, by which contract the railroad company agreed with the government to carry a mail agent, and that the plaintiff, being a mail agent, became and was a passenger in the defendant's cars, then stated a bodily injury received by plaintiff, by the running of the car containing the plaintiff off the track and breaking it, through defectiveness of machinery, want of care, skill, etc. A demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and such ruling affirmed by the general term of the supreme court, and, in affirming that judgment, the court of appeals said: "Degrees of negligence are matters of proof, and not of averment. The allegations of negligence in this complaint are sufficient, whether the defendant is liable for ordinary, or only for gross, negligence." Nolton v. Western R. Corp. 15 N. Y. 444, 69 Am. Dec. 628.

Where two paragraphs in a petition in an action for an injury caused by the alleged fault of the defendant relate to the same occurrence and injury, and it is expressly so alleged, and the only difference between them is that the facts are set out more in detail in the one than in the other, and gross negligence is alleged in one and not alleged in the other, the plaintiff should be required to elect which of the paragraphs he will prosecute, as the evidence required to support one would support the other; and the allegation of negligence is sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover in an action like this for any degree of culpable negligence that may be established by the evidence. Muldraugh's Hill, C. & C. Turnp. Co. v. Maupin, 79 Ky. 101.

Where a petition in an action against a railroad company for an injury to the plaintiff stated that the action of the conductor in charge of the train, and that of the defendant in regard to operating it, were negligent and careless, and the defendant was guilty of negligence; and that the injury to the plaintiff occurred by reason of the negligence and want of reasonable care on the part of the defendant, and without any fault of the plaintiff,—it was held not to be an action under the found to grow out of the fact that the doctrine of comparative negligence prevails in some jurisdictions and not in others. Authorities on both sides of the question are cited in Wilson v. Chippewa Valley Electric R. Co. 120 Wis. 636, 66 L. R. A. 912, 98 N. W. 536. The idea that gross negligence is inconsistent with ordinary negligence seems to be the logical result of such a distinction between the two species of wrongs as to render it impossible for the element of inadvertence to be common to both. It were better if the term "gross negligence," as suggesting inadvertence, had never been used in speaking of a wrong having the element of intent, actual or constructive, to injure. The supreme court of Indiana, in treating this subject in Louisville, N. A.

& O. R. Co. v. Bryan, 107 Ind. 51, 53, 7 N. E. 807, 808, used this language: "To constitute a wilful injury, the act which produced it must have been intentional, or must have been done under such circumstances as evinced a reckless disregard for the safety of others, and a willingness to inflict the injury complained of. It involves conduct which is quasi criminal. . . . The words 'wilful' and 'negligent,' used in conjunction, have not always been employed with strict regard for accuracy of expression. To say that an injury resulted from the negligent and wilful conduct of another is to affirm that the same act is the result of two exactly opposite mental conditions. It is to affirm in one breath that an act was done through in-statute for a killing by wilful neglect, as, if it were, it would have been necessary, inasmuch as the statute creates and defines the injury, to allege that the negligence was wilful; but it was only an action at common law for negligence. That in such case the degree, whether wilful, gross, or ordinary, need not be stated, as it is a matter of proof, and not of averment. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Mitchell, 87 Ky. 327, 8 S. W. 706, Citing Nolton v. Western R. Corp. 15 N. Y. 444, 69 Am. Dec. 623; Muldrough's Hill, C. & C. Turnp. Co. v. Maupin, 79 Ky. 101,—supra.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Rains, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 423, 23 S. W. 505, the court said that it had held, and that such was the law, that, under the general allegation of negligence in common-law actions for injuries, you may establish the degree of proof; and it is not necessary to allege this degree, whether gross or ordinary, in order to make a cause of action, the averment of negligence being sufficient.

In an action against an express company for an injury inflicted upon the plaintiff by the servants of the company by driving over him a loaded express wagon, the court, after saying that it was well settled that a master is responsible in punitive damages for the wilful act or gross negligence of his servant engaged in his business, whether he did or did not know the servant to be incompetent or disqualified for the service in which he was engaged, said further, in answer to the position assumed by counsel for the defendant that the plaintiff could not recover punitive damages because not claimed in the declaration, that the position was not maintainable, as the plaintiff demanded damages for the negligent act of the defendant, under which it was competent to show the character of the negligence, and the extent of the injury inflicted. Southern Exp. Co. v. Brown, 67 Miss. 260, 19 Am. St. Rep. 306, 7 So. 318, 8 So. 425.

In an action against a railroad company for injury sustained by the plaintiff, it was held that where the complaint, although stating the occurrence with somewhat unnecessary particularity, and imputing negligence in one respect in which it might be said it could not be sustained, also contained a general allegation that the occurrence happened and the injuries of the plaintiff were received by him through the negligence and want of care of the defendants, and not through any want of care, neglect, or default on his part,—this is a sufficient allegation to include any negligence, and other allegations which are mere surplage will not have the effect of excluding the facts from the consideration of the court or jury. Edgerton v. New York & H. R. Co. 35 Barb. 389.

In Shumacher v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 39 Fed. 174, which was an action brought against a railroad company by an employee thereof to recover for an injury sustained while in the employ of the company, the complaint charged that the injury was occasioned by the negligent act of the defendant, and it was held that, under such a complaint, any degree of negligence might be proved, and a recovery had therefore; that, when the injury is charged to have been occasioned by reason of the negligent act, the defendant must take notice that the plaintiff can rely upon his right to prove negligence in any degree.

In an action against a railroad company the court said that, as a matter of evidence, proof that the misconduct of the defendant was such as to evince an utter disregard of consequences, so as to imply a willingness to inflict the injury complained of, may tend to establish wilfulness on the part of the defendant; but, to authorize a recovery on such evidence, there must be suitable allegations in the complaint to which it is applicable. Pennsylvania Co. v. Sinclair, 62 Ind. 301, 30 Am. Rep. 185.

For an injury wilfully inflicted a recovery may be had, though the person injured did not use ordinary care to avoid the injury; but evidence of negligence of the defendant causing the injury, so gross as to imply a disregard of consequences, or a willingness to inflict the injury, cannot be treated as evidence authorizing a recovery by the plaintiff, who did not use ordinary care to avoid the injury, where the allegations of his pleading do not amount to a charge that his injury was purposely or wilfully caused by the defendant. Proof of recklessness or gross negligence on the part of the defendant, upon such an issue, cannot avail more against the defendant than would any satisfactory proof of the defendant's want of ordinary care. Pennsylvania Co. v. Smith, 98 Ind. 42.

attention, thoughtlessly, heedlessly, and at the same time purposely and by design. . . . It is only necessary to say that the distinction between cases falling within the one class or the other is clear and well defined, and cases in neither class are aided by importing into them attributes pertaining to the other."

In Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Miller, 149 Ind. 490-501, 49 N. E. 445, 449, that court said: "The two terms ['negligence' and 'wilfulness'] are incompatible. Negligence arises from inattention, thoughtlessness, or heedlessness, while wilfulness cannot exist without purpose or design. No purpose or design can be said to exist where the injurious act results from negligence, and negligence cannot be of such a degree as to become wilfulness. . . . The doctrine of comparative negligence does not obtain recognition in this state . . . and when wilfulness is the essential element in the act or conduct of the party charged with the wrong, the case ceases to be one of negligence. Wilfulness and negligence are the opposites of each other; the former signifying the presence of intention, and the latter its absence." To the same effect are Parker v. Pennsylvania Co. 134 Ind. 673, 23 L. R. A. 552, 34 N. E. 504; Highland Ave. & Belt R. Co. v. Winn, 93 Ala. 306, 9 So. 509; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Johnston, 79 Ala. 436; Levin v. Memphis & C. R. Co. 109 Ala. 332, 19 So. 395; Wabash R. Co. v. Speer, 156 Ill. 244, 40 N. E. 835; Ruter v. Foy, 46 Iowa, 132; Mat- upon the ground and grievously hurt, the defendant cannot be called upon to come into court and meet a charge of wilful, wanton, or reckless negligence; and a charge that, if the plaintiff neglected to use ordinary care, and was injured by the defendant, he could not recover, even though the jury should find from the evidence that the defendant was also negligent, unless they should find from the evidence that the defendant saw the plaintiff in or approaching a place of danger, and knew, or had good reason to believe, that he was not aware of danger, and saw him in such a position of danger in time to prevent, by using ordinary care, the injury to him, and did not make use of care for that purpose,—was outside of the issues made by the pleadings. Dennan v. Johnston, 85 Mich. 387, 48 N. W. 565.

In an action against a railroad company the complaint simply charged negligence, and on appeal from a judgment of nonsuit at the trial the court held that the nonsuit was correct, as the evidence showed that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. The plaintiff then claimed that there was evidence in the case sufficient to show a case of wilful intent to injure, or that reckless or wanton disregard on the part of defendant's employees of the plaintiff's right and safety which is deemed equivalent to an intent to injure, and might be called a constructive intent, and which has been inaccurately termed gross negligence; but the court said, with regard to this claim, that it was sufficient to say that no such cause of action was stated, or attempted to be stated, in the complaint, which simply charged negligence; that if wilful misconduct was claimed, or a wanton and reckless act equivalent in law to wilful misconduct, the cause of action was a different one from a cause of action founded upon negligence simply, and that the defendant was entitled to know what the cause of action was upon which the plaintiff relied. McClellan v. Chippewa Valley Electric R. Co. 110 Wis. 326, 85 N. W. 1018.

V. Under statute or ordinance.

A statute of Kentucky in its first two sections provides for the maintaining of actions for the destruction of the life of persons or stock through the negligence or carelessness of agents or servants of railroad companies. 69 L. R. A.

The 3d section provides "that, if the life of any person or persons is lost or destroyed by the wilful neglect of another person or persons, company or companies, corporation or corporations, their agents or servants, then the personal representative of the deceased shall have the right to sue such person or persons, company or companies, corporation or corporations, and recover punitive damages for the loss or destruction of the life aforesaid." It will be noticed that the statute makes use of the term "wilful neglect" and, as has been seen, the courts of Indiana have invariably held that there can be no such thing, as the two words are of exactly opposite meaning. In Chiles v. Drake, 2 Met. (Ky.) 146, 74 Am. Dec. 406, in an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant for shooting her husband, where the plaintiff alleged, in the first paragraph in her petition, that the defendant had unlawfully killed her husband by shooting him with a pistol, and in the second paragraph she alleged that the defendant, by means of his wilful neglect, shot and killed her husband, the court held that under the evidence the plaintiff could not recover on the first paragraph, and her right to maintain her action was thus restricted to the last. The court had charged the jury, at the instance of the defendant, that the plaintiff could not recover if the death was accidental, not premeditated, and not produced by wilful neglect, and this was held to be correct.

In an action based upon the 3d section of the same statute, the charge in the petition being wilful negligence, it is necessary to show this degree of negligence to recover; and, where the evidence fails to show any, there is no reason why a nonsuit should not be ordered. Louisville & P. Canal Co. v. Murphy, 9 Bush, 522.

In Louisville, C. & L. R. Co. v. Case, 9 Bush, 728, the court said that in actions against railroad companies, which are embraced by the provisions of both the 1st and 3d sections of the act, an averment of wilful negligence, resulting in the death of a person not an employee of the company, authorizes a recovery under either section, in case the proof warrants a recovery at all. That, if wilful negligence be established, punitive damages may be awarded; if mere culpable negligence, then such damages as the person injured might have recovered if death had not ensued. That as thous v. Warner, 29 Gratt. 570, 26 Am. Rep. 396; Denman v. Johnston, 85 Mich. 387, 48 N. W. 565; Menger v. Laur (State, Menger, Prosecutor, v. Lauer) 55 N. J. L. 205, 20 L. R. A. 61, 26 Atl. 180, and 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 443.

From the foregoing it will be seen that in charging liability, either springing from the want of ordinary care or an intentional wrong, causing personal injury to one, nothing is to be gained by a multiplicity of adjectives or adverbs. When it is stated that the wrongdoer failed to exercise ordinary care in a case grounded on ordinary negligence, or that he acted wilfully in a case based on gross negligence, so called, nothing in any circumstances can be added by otherwise characterizing the wrong, except by way of emphasis, which of course is immaterial to the liability, or the measure thereof. In confusing the two species of wrong, as if one was of the same character as the other, only greater in degree, there is liability of rendering the pleading indefinite, and leading to a fatal variance between it and the proof, and also to an inconsistent verdict.

There was an objection here to any evidence under the complaint because of uncertainty of the nature above spoken of. The theory of appellant's counsel seems to have been then, and to be still, that the charge of inadvertent conduct and of wilfulness neutralized each other, rendering the complaint insufficient to state any cause of action. We think otherwise. In a case to railroad companies or proprietors, unless it be an employee who is killed, the two sections should be treated as one; and, when it is averred in the petition that the person killed was not an employee, and that the negligence was wilful, the action should be tried as an action to recover damages for personal injuries not resulting in death, except that instead of the common-law rule, by which the measure of the recovery is to be determined, the jury should be governed by the standard prescribed by the statute. That the allegation of wilful negligence necessarily includes all inferior grades, and the jury must determine from the proof whether the recovery is to be had, if at all, under the 1st or 3d section of the act, and then assess the damages according to the measures of recovery fixed by the provisions of the act itself. The court said, further, that they did not express a different opinion in the Murphy Case, where, the action not being against a railroad company, the canal company could not be held responsible under the act unless the negligence was wilful.

Where an original petition averred that the negligence was under the 1st section of the statute mentioned, and thereafter the court allowed the plaintiff to amend its petition by claiming that the injury was caused by the wilful negligence of the defendant under the 3d section of the statute, it was held that the court below erred in granting such permission, as the amended petition set up no new cause of action; and as, under the original petition, the plaintiff was entitled to no more than compensation, it was improper to allow him either to aver or prove circumstances of aggravation growing out of the conduct of the agents and employees of the railroad company after the fatal injuries had been inflicted. Jacobs v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 10 Bush, 263.

In an action instituted against a railroad company to recover damages under the provisions of §§ 1 and 3 of said statute, the plaintiff alleged that his intestate was killed by the defendant while pursuing its business as the proprietor of a railroad, and that the death was the direct result of the wilful negligence of its servants and agents. It appeared in evidence that, in addition to its corporate right to construct and operate a line of railway, the railroad company had a right to own real estate and mine coal and other minerals, 69 L. R. A.

and that the injury complained of was occasioned by a car loaded with coal becoming detached from its fastenings when on the incline, and but a few feet from the entrance to the mine, and running down the incline, being precipitated and running against the house of the plaintiff, and killing his wife and one of his children. Plaintiff brought the action as the administrator of the deceased child. The court, after approving what was decided in Louisville, C. & L. R. Co. v. Case, 9 Bush, 728, distinguished that case from this, and held that the 1st section of the statute does not apply to the facts of this case. That, while it was true that the defendant was the proprietor of a railroad, and it was also true that deceased was not in its employ at the time he was killed, the proof also shows that the work being carried on by the defendant at the time and place the accident or killing occurred was not in its nature or character incident to or part of the regular and usual business of the proprietor of a railroad. Claxton v. Lexington & B. S. R. Co. 13 Bush, 636.

In an abstract of the decision of Rountree v. Stephens, 8 Ky. L. Rep. 433, it is said that, in an action against a railroad company to enable either the widow, or the heir or the personal representative, of a decedent to recover under § 3 of the statute, it is necessary that the petition should allege, and that the proof should show, that the loss was caused by the wilful neglect of the company.

In Forkner v. Kean, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 654, 32 S. W. 265, which was an action against the receiver of a railroad company, it was held that, although the averments in the petition amount to an issue of wilful negligence, yet this would not defeat a recovery for ordinary negligence.

The result of these Kentucky cases would seem to be that by the statute referred to, under account in a petition for wilful neglect, in an action against a railroad company, a recovery may be had upon proof either of such wilful neglect or ordinary negligence; but that, under such a count of a petition in an action against a person or corporation other than a railroad company, no recovery can be had, except upon proof of what the courts by force of the statute are compelled to designate "wilful neglect." of this kind, while it is true a charge of gross negligence will not warrant a recovery on the ground of ordinary negligence, even though accompanied by an allegation that plaintiff was in the exercise of ordinary care at the time of the occurrence complained of, it does not necessarily follow that a charge including both elements of wrongful conduct is meaningless. If very strict technical rules of pleading were applied it might be otherwise. Under the proper rule, every reasonable intendment is to be considered in favor of the pleading, and everything essential to the cause of action sought to be stated, reasonably inferable from the language used, is to be deemed as effectually pleaded as if expressly alleged. Rev. Stat. 1898, § 2668; Morse v. Gilman, 16 Wis. 505; Flanders v. McVickar, 7 Wis. 372; Horn v. Ludington, 28 Wis. 81; Merrill v. Merrill, 53 Wis. 522, 10 N. W. 684; Miller v. Bayer, 94 Wis. 123-126, 68 N. W. 869; South Bend Chilled Plow Co. v. George C. Cribb Co. 97 Wis. 230, 72 N. W. 749. Or as stated thus in some of the cases cited: "If the essential facts can be gathered from the pleading, or may reasonably be inferred from the allegations, it is good though such allegations be in form uncertain and incomplete."

It is considered that a charge that an act was negligently, carelessly, and wilfully done, or done negligently, carelessly, and in disregard of consequences as to the personal safety of others, though open to a motion to make more definite and certain by removing the feature rendering it necessary to determine by construction what character of wrong is relied upon, may reasonably be said to charge gross negligence. Therefore the objection to evidence under the complaint was properly overruled. However, since the objection directed attention to a probability that the pleader may have intended to charge both ordinary negligence and gross negligence, to set forth two causes of action of a somewhat inconsistent character, the court, in overruling it, should have construed the complaint, and shaped the trial accordingly. In Wilson v. Chippewa Valley Electric R. Co. 120 Wis. 636, 66 L. R. A. 912, 98 N. W.

A statute of Massachusetts provided that "if, by reason of the negligence or carelessness of a corporation operating a street railway, or of the unfitness or gross negligence or carelessness of its servants or agents, while engaged in its business, the life of a passenger, or of a person being in the exercise of due diligence and not a passenger or in the employment of such corporation, is lost, the corporation shall be liable in damages, . . .

to be assessed with reference to the degree of culpability of said corporation, or of its servants or agents, and to be recovered in an action of tort." In Galbraith v. West End Street R. Co. 165 Mass. 572, 43 N. E. 501, which was an action brought under the statute by the plaintiff, as administratrix of the estate of her husband, to recover damages for his death occasioned by injuries received by him while crossing the tracks of the defendant's railway, by the alleged gross negligence of the defendant's servants, the court instructed the jury that it was not easy to define the term "gross negligence," but, in a general way, they would have no difficulty in understanding what it meant; that it meant great carelessness, great negligence; and that they must find gross negligence on the part of the defendant's motorman, or else the action could not be maintained.

In an action to recover damages for the alleged death of the plaintiff's son, four and one half years of age, who was killed by the defendant's vicious horse while running at large in a public highway contrary to an ordinance of the city, which provided that no horse should be permitted to run at large in the city at any time, and that any person who should permit the same to run at large should be punished as therein prescribed, it was held that it was a case where the knowledge or intent of the defendant was in question, and 69 L. R. A.

that it was necessary for the plaintiff to show that the horse was at large with the knowledge and assent or permission of the owner, and that, therefore, the defendant could not properly be held liable under the ordinance for mere negligence. The complaint alleged that there was an ordinance of the city in force, prohibiting animals from running at large in the public streets, and also that the horse was vicious in his disposition, and known to be so by the defendant, and that the defendant negligently permitted the horse to run at large in the public streets, and that the death of the deceased was the result of such negligence. On a former appeal from a judgment for the plaintiff in the case (111 Wis. 91, 86 N. W. 554) it had been held that it was not only competent, but in fact necessary, for the plaintiff to show in some way that the horse was at large with the knowledge, assent, or permission of the owner. That it was a case where the knowledge or intent of the defendant was in question, or, perhaps, more accurately, where it was necessary to show that the act in question was not accidental. These statements of the court in the opinion delivered on the former appeal were quoted and approved by the court on the present appeal. Decker v. McSorley, 116 Wis. 643, 93 N. W. 808.

VI. Conclusion.

As stated in the beginning, the primary and chief difficulty in arriving at a correct conclusion as to the rights set forth in the title to the note is to ascertain just what meaning the ultimate courts of the several jurisdictions intend to convey by the use of the term "gross negligence." One can easily understand the distinction between a wilful injury and an injury occasioned by the negligence of the party causing it; but when the attempt is made, and—so far, at least, as the particular juris-

536, this court construed a complaint charging an alleged wrongful act to have been perpetrated negligently and wilfully as stating a cause of action involving gross negligence, and tested the sufficiency of the verdict thereby, holding that, upon such a complaint, there cannot be a recovery on the ground of ordinary negligence consistent with McClellan v. Chippewa Valley Electric R. Co. 110 Wis. 326, 85 N. W. 1018, where it was decided that in a complaint charging ordinary negligence there can be no recovery on the ground of gross negligence.

The practice adopted here of declining to construe the complaint as to the particular species of wrongdoing intended to be charged therein, and confining plaintiff thereto, and permitting a recovery upon the ground of ordinary and gross negligence as well, is very reprehensible. To allow such a practice to gain a foothold in our system would lead to prejudicial confusion and uncertainty in the administration of justice. The jury were directed to find as to issues appropriate to two distinct and somewhat inconsistent causes of action, when the complaint should have been construed as charging but one. It should have been held to state a cause of action for gross negligence. We have a verdict finding that degree of wrong, and in effect finding that a lesser degree was the proximate cause of the injury. It may appear somewhat technical to hold that such a verdict presents a well-defined and fatal inconsistency, but the practice contemplated by the Code that the plaintiff shall state, understandingly to the defendant and the court, the facts as to the cause of action he relies upon, and, if there are two causes, that they shall not be inconsistent, and that the recovery shall be in harmony therewith, is so invaded by that adopted by the trial court that we feel constrained to condemn it, not overlooking § 2829, and the scope thereof, as declared by this court, in saving judicial decisions from disturbance regardless of errors not affecting the substantial rights of the adverse parties.

Since no recovery can be sustained under the complaint for ordinary negligence, all questions presented upon the appeal, appertaining to the subject of contributory negligence is concerned—successfully carried out, to unite as identical injury committed through gross negligence with wilful negligence, and to segregate gross negligence from all other negligence, as was done in RIDEOUT V. WINNEBAGO TRACTION CO., following other modern Wisconsin decisions, one is led to think that the process of bending the meaning of words to suit the immediate occasion is complete. A careful consideration, however, of all the cases on the subject, leads to the conclusion that, notwithstanding the careless use of language in stating or alluding to wilful, intentional, or negligent injury, the courts are in reality at one as to what is the true rule; which may be stated in the language of the court in Belt R. & Stock Yard Co. v. Mann, 107 Ind. 89, 7 N. E. 893, as to what the court deemed necessary to overcome the defense of contributory negligence: "To entitle one to recover for an injury to which his own negligence may have contributed, the injurious act or omission must have been purposely and intentionally committed, with a design to produce injury, or it must have been so committed under such circumstances as that its natural and probable consequence would be to produce injury to others. There must have been either an actual or constructive intent to commit the injury. The act must have involved conduct quasi criminal in character."

If this be true, it assists somewhat in arriving at a conclusion as to what is the doctrine as to the right to recover under an allegation alleging gross, or wilful, negligence on proof of mere, or ordinary, negligence, but does not entirely settle the question as to what the true rule is, as has been, and will be, seen by consulting cases in supra, I. In Indiana and Colorado an allegation that an injury was committed in a wanton, or reckless, or grossly negligent, manner is not an allegation that the same was wilful. And so in those states, under an allegation that an injury was committed in that manner, recovery may be had on proof of ordinary negligence. In Florida an allegation of negligence which is wanton or reckless would seem to be held to be the equivalent of intentional or wilful. It is also held that such is not included in an allegation of gross negligence. Aside from this, however, it is believed that the consensus of judicial decision is that under an allegation setting forth that an injury was caused by an act or omission either wilfully and intentionally committed, or under such circumstances as that its natural and probable consequences would be to produce injury to others, and as evincing a reckless disregard for the safety of others and a willingness to inflict the injury complained of, a recovery cannot be had upon proof simply of ordinary negligence; and this is so whether the allegation designates the act or omission constituting the injury as wilful or intentional, or as gross, negligence. On the other hand, it seems to be settled that a recovery may be had upon an allegation of an injury committed by an act or omission involving ordinary negligence, on proof of any degree of negligence, including gross negligence, and also including an act or omission which might be considered wilful, intentional, reckless, or wanton. The latter doctrine, however, does not obtain in RIDEOUT V. WINNEBAGO TRACTION CO. or any other of the Wisconsin cases, the supreme court of that state having repudiated it. And, as has been seen, in Michigan a plaintiff will not be permitted to prove wilful, wanton, or reckless negligence to rebut the defense of his contributory negligence, under his declaration alleging ordinary negligence. Denman v. Johnston, 85 Mich. 387, 48 N. W. 565, supra, IV. Excepting these, however, the doctrine as stated is believed to prevail.

negligence of Sarau, are immaterial, and will therefore not be considered. If the injury was caused by gross misconduct of appellant's servant, conduct involving at least constructive intent to do the act complained of, whether Sarau did or did not exercise ordinary care to protect himself does not affect the right of respondents to recover, either for the damages caused to the deceased or to the surviving relatives. Bolin v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 108 Wis. 333, 81 Am. St. Rep. 911, 84 N. W. 446.

The point is made that there was no evidence of wilful misconduct on the part of appellant's servant who controlled the car, and therefore a verdict should have been directed in appellant's favor. It seems to us otherwise. There was evidence tending to show that when the car reached a point where the motorman was in full view of the marchers, and for a considerable period of time thereafter, he must have observed the danger those in its pathway were in and had ample opportunity to guard against it; that he must have seen that the marchers were proceeding entirely unconscious of the approach of his car; that with the noise of the band and other noises made by them it was quite improbable that they would, or might not, observe the car in time to give way for it to pass; that by repeated signals from the conductor he was directed to slacken the speed of the car, and if necessary stop it before reaching the space occupied by the marchers, and that, nevertheless, he made no effort to do so until it had traveled through a large part of such space and up to within a few feet of Sarau, at the rate of 15 miles per hour, or about 22 feet per second. A jury might well find under such circumstances conscious disregard of human life, rendering the wrongdoer in case of a destruction thereof guilty of manslaughter in a criminal action, and of wilful misconduct in a civil action. True, the car had the right of way, and it was the duty of the marchers to step aside so as not to interfere with its passage or speed. True, it was the duty of the marchers, as is ordinarily the case, to use their senses reasonably, to enable them to do that before the car came dangerously near them, and yet no excuse is seen for an assertion of a superior right in appellant by consciously running its car into the parade at a speed of 22 feet per second.

A person with Sarau at the place of the injury when he regained consciousness, in answer to this question, "What did he say, if anything, that would indicate pain and suffering?" said: "He raised his right leg, at that time he knew he was hurt, and he didn't know whether his leg was off or whether it was cut, although he felt the pain, and he thought they were either squeezing it or doing something to it, and he wanted us to let go; seeing we didn't let go he raised his right leg and tried to kick us, and we held his right leg down."

It is easily seen that the answer is not responsive to the question. Error is assigned because the court refused to strike it out. Whether appellant was, or may have been, prejudiced thereby does not clearly appear. As a rule unresponsive answers by a witness should be promptly stricken out, upon a motion being seasonably made therefor. The orderly conduct of trials requires that litigants shall have a reasonable enforcement of that rule.

Several witnesses were permitted to testify to what they heard Sarau say, or do, or how he acted shortly after he was injured, some of the occurrences being while he was on the way to the hospital from the place of the injury, and some immediately upon, or soon after, his arrival at the hospital, indicating that he was conscious and suffering pain. That was proper. Exclamations and expressions such as commonly, under the circumstances, evince suffering, the conditions being such as to indicate reality, may be testified to by a person having knowledge thereof upon the ultimate fact which they suggest becoming a proper subject of inquiry. Such evidence falls within the rules allowing all parts of the res gestæ as to a subject of judicial inquiry to be given in evidence. Hall v. American Masonic Accl. Assn. 86 Wis. 518, 57 N. W. 366; McKieigue v. Janesville, 68 Wis. 50, 31 N. W. 298; Quaife v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 48 Wis. 513, 33 Am. Rep. 821, 4 N. W. 658; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 102; and Jones, Ev. § 352. The doctrine that a person's state of mind as to existing pain can be so established necessarily includes establishing consciousness. Both matters were material in this case. One could not really suffer pain without possessing some degree of consciousness. The indications of one would ordinarily evince the other. But independently of that, doubtless, the state of a person's mind as regards consciousness, when material, may be established by the species of evidence competent to establish the fact of suffering pain.

Evidence was permitted as to what the duties of a motorman were, operating a car manned by a conductor, as in this case. The question was evidently not aimed at what the duty of the motorman was, as a matter of law, but as to what the incidents of his position were in that regard under his contract of employment. Presumably, the purpose of the question was to show that he was not required to do anything interfering with observing the situation of those upon the track in the pathway of his car on the occasion in question, and that he recklessly and consciously disobeyed the conductor's orders to stop the car before the event complained of. The bearing of the evidence was on the claim of wilful misconduct imputable to appellant. In that light we see no reason why the evidence was not proper.

Further complaint is made because evidence was permitted as to the schedule time for running cars the week before the accident. We are unable to see how appellant could possibly have been prejudiced by that. There was no claim that the speed of car on the day of the accident was greater than usual. The only difference in the schedule on that day and on the week prior thereto was that on the former, contrary to the latter, the cars were operated one way only, giving patrons the benefit of two opportunities to go in that direction in the time ordinarily occupied by a trip down the track and return. It was certainly proper to show the manner in which the cars were operated at the time of the injury, and that there was a special arrangement for the occasion for the better convenience of patrons.

Error is assigned because one, who was in the procession some distance behind Sarau, was permitted to testify that as the car passed him, he said, "For God's sake stop that car!" It was then in dangerous proximity to Sarau. The exclamation was made within hearing distance of the motorman. He may, or may not, have heard it. It was within the probabilities that he did. So the evidence, though not competent to show the speed of the car, or that it was going at a dangerous rate of speed, was competent as bearing on the question of whether the motorman operated the car in conscious disregard of the safety of others.

One of the marchers, who was some distance behind Sarau, having testified, without objection, that seeing the danger to those on the car track, he stepped forward to take hold of some of them, his idea being to run on to the track for that purpose, but that there was no show and he stepped back, was permitted to answer a question as to why there was no show. The answer was not strictly responsive thereto, but there was no motion to strike it out. The question merely asked for an explanation of previous evidence. No reason is suggested, or is perceived, why that was not proper. A number of other rulings on evidence adverse to appellant are referred to 69 L. R. A.

in the briefs of counsel. We have given such attention thereto as seems to be required without discovering any prejudicial error therein.

Complaint is made because the court did not submit the following questions to the jury, as requested: "Did the motorman sound the gong continuously while approaching Sarau—" "At what rate of speed was the car running when it ran into the Milwaukee Uniformed Rank, Knights of Pythias?" It is a sufficient answer thereto to say that the questions only involve evidentiary circumstances, not issues of fact raised by the pleadings, within the meaning of § 2858, Rev. Stat. 1898; Baxter v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 104 Wis. 307, 80 N. W. 644; Mauch v. Hartford, 112 Wis. 40, 87 N. W. 816; and Patnode v. Westenhaver, 114 Wis. 460, 90 N. W. 467. There is no allegation in the complaint or the answer as to whether the gong of the car was continuously sounded while the car was approaching Sarau, or at what rate of speed it was going at the time of the injury. The allegations of the complaint are to the effect that it was then moving at a dangerous rate of speed, and that due and sufficient warning was not given to persons in the pathway thereof to give way for its passage. These allegations were put in issue by denials, and in addition defendant answered that, as the car approached the point where the injury was inflicted, a sufficient warning of its presence was given by sounding the gong and bell on the car. So the real issue raised was whether the car, under the circumstances, was approaching at a negligent rate of speed, and whether sufficient warning was given to persons in its pathway to clear the track for its passage. These matters were, though not in the most approved form, included in the questions submitted.

Error is assigned because the court refused to instruct the jury that, had Sarau lived, his earning capacity would probably have decreased with advancing years. It would seem that appellant could not have been prejudiced by a failure to instruct on such a matter of common knowledge.

Further error is assigned for a refusal to instruct the jury that the probable earning capacity of Sarau should be considered with reference to his capacity in that regard, taking into consideration his personal expenses, income from property not being considered. The general instructions so informed the jury. That being the case, there was no error in refusing to specially instruct as to the same matter.

Some complaint is made of remarks by respondents' counsel during the argument to the jury, which do not appear to merit special attention. The exceptions in regard thereto have been sufficiently examined to satisfy us that at least no prejudicial error was committed in respect to such matters.

The judgment must be reversed and the action remanded for a new trial of the cause of action for gross negligence, it being understood that the issues appropriate thereto are the only ones which the complaint justifies submitting to a jury for determination. It is unfortunate that a verdict was taken which in effect found that such a wrong produced the death of Sarau, and that it was also produced by a wrong of an entirely different character.

The judgment appealed from is reversed, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

v.

City of ISHPEMING, Plff. in Err.

(.....Mich.....)

1. A municipal corporation has no right to prevent the use by its owner, in a lawful way, of a paved strip between the street line and a building set a few feet back from the street, where there is nothing to show that the strip has ever become a part of the highway, or that the municipality has so treated it.
2. A municipal corporation is not liable for injuries to a traveler upon a sidewalk through the fall of a billboard insecurely placed by an abutting owner upon his own property near the edge of the street, under a statute requiring it to keep its streets reasonably safe and fit for travel.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Marquette County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. T. Potter, for plaintiff in error:

The sign or billboard in question was a mere incident to the building to which it was attached, and was in no sense related to or a part of the sidewalk.

Messrs. Button & Heffernan, for defendant in error:

A board which was liable to blow down whenever a proper wind blew was allowed by the city to be in use for about two years, resting on the sidewalk, a menace to all travelers. It was the active approval of the use of the sidewalk for the purpose of the signboard. This rendered the municipality liable.

Elliott, Mun. Corp. § 326, pp. 293, 294; Drake v. Lowell, 13 Met. 292.

Hooker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff was injured by a billboard which Butler was in the habit of using in front of the doors of his opera house, in the city of Ishpeming, to advertise prospective attractions. This billboard was 88 inches in length, 44 inches in width, and weighed over 40 pounds. On each edge, about a foot from the top of the board, a screw hook was placed to fasten into eyes or staples on the beam over the double doors. The lower end rested upon the sidewalk 18 inches or 2 feet from the building. The building is 3 feet back from the street line, but the walk extends to the door. The plaintiff, while passing, was hit and injured by the board, which was blown by the wind against him. There was some testimony indicating that it was not fastened on this occasion. A verdict and judgment for the plaintiff resulted from the trial, and the defendant has appealed. The only question arises over the refusal of the circuit judge to direct a verdict for the defendant.

The undisputed evidence in this case shows that the billboard was wholly outside of the highway and upon private ground. Before the defendant can be held liable to pay for this injury, it must be shown that it "neglected to keep its sidewalk in reasonable repair and in condition reasonably safe and fit for travel." No complaint is made that the street or sidewalk was not in proper condition and in a reasonably safe and fit condition for travel, so far as the same was dependent upon the condition of the street itself. Plaintiff's claim rests on the proposition that, to avoid liability under the statute, the municipality must protect the traveler against dangers from beyond the limits of the highway which make traveling unsafe.

The only theories upon which defendant can be held liable in this case are: (1) That all of the sidewalk was a portion of the highway, or (2) that the billboard was a nuisance, which the city might and should have abated.

There is no testimony tending to show that the 3 feet of ground upon which the billboard stood was a part of the highway, or that the city so treated it. Nothing indicates that it exercised any control over it, 69 L. R. A.

or that said 3 feet was covered by any walk that it built or ordered. This area in front of the opera house appears to have been an exception, other buildings extending to the line of the highway. It is not unreasonable to suppose that it was left for the accommodation of the owner's patrons, and it is shown that the owner exercised dominion over it by the use made of the billboard, if in no other way. The city had no lawful right to require its use for a street, or to prevent the owner from using it in connection with his opera house in any lawful way. We cannot say from the record that the city should be estopped from denying that this strip was a part of its sidewalk, to be kept in repair, etc., by it.

We must then inquire whether the liability can be sustained upon the ground that it failed to abate a nuisance. In its construction of the statute (Comp. Laws, § 3441), which has been somewhat liberal, this court has never gone so far as to hold that it requires the municipality to protect a traveler against dangers which result entirely from the use made of abutting premises by their owners, and which cannot be avoided by barriers or some other effective mode of construction of the highway. It may be reasonably said that a highway is not reasonably safe which has no barriers separating it from a pit or cellar on adjoining premises, and in such a case the liability rests not on a failure to abate a nuisance, but an inadequate highway. The city may, and should, perhaps, build the barrier, but it has no authority to trespass upon the abutter and fill up his cellar. In Hixon v. Lowell, 13 Gray, 61, this subject is discussed by Mr. Justice Hoar. The statute provided that "all highways, town ways, causeways, and bridges within the bounds of any town" are required to "be kept in repair at the expense of such town, so that the same may be safe and convenient for travelers, with their horses, teams, and carriages, at all seasons of the year." [Rev. Stat. chap. 25, §1.] That was a case where snow and ice fell from a building, having gathered there until it overhung the street. The court distinguished the case from the fall of an awning projecting over the street and supported by posts resting upon the sidewalk. The learned jurist said: "It may not be easy to perceive and state distinctly the difference between the two cases in regard to the liability of the town, but we are all of opinion that there is such a distinction, and that the facts which were proved on the trial will not sustain this action. In most cases the town has discharged its duty when it has made the surface of the ground over which the traveler passes sufficiently smooth, level, and guarded by railings to enable him to travel with safety and convenience by the exercise of ordinary care on his own part. There may be many causes of injury, to which he might be exposed in traveling upon such a way, which would not constitute any defect or want of repair in the way itself. In Vinal v. Dorchester, 7 Gray, 421, it was held that a town was not responsible for an injury caused to the plaintiff by the running of the cars of a railroad company across a public highway, although the railroad was constructed in a manner not allowed by law, and the trains run thereon in a manner dangerous to the travelers on the highway. The town, if it has done its duty in making the way safe and convenient in all the proper attributes of a way, is not obliged to insure the safety of those who use it. The traveler may be subjected to inconvenience and hazard from various sources, none of which would constitute a 'defect, or want of repair,' in the way, for which the town would be responsible. He might be annoyed by the action of the elements,—by a hailstorm, by a drenching rain, by piercing sleet, by a cutting and icy wind,—against which, however long continued, a town would be under no obligation to furnish him protection; he might be obstructed by a concourse of people, by a crowd of carriages; his horses might be frightened by the discharge of guns, the explosion of fireworks, by military music, by the presence of wild animals; his health might be endangered by pestilential vapors or by the contagion of disease; and these sources of discomfort and danger might be found within the limits of the highway, and continue for more than twenty-four hours, and yet that highway not be, in any legal sense, defective or out of repair. It is obvious that there may be nuisances upon traveled ways for which there is no remedy against the town which is bound by law to construct and maintain the way. If the owner of a distillery, for example, or of a manufactory, adjoining the street of a city, should discharge continuously from a pipe or orifice opening toward the street a quantity of steam or hot water, to the nuisance and injury of passersby, they must certainly seek redress in some other mode than by an action for a defective way. If the walls of a house adjoining a street in a city were erected in so insecure a manner as to be liable to fall upon persons passing by, or if the eaves trough or water conductor was so arranged as to throw a stream from the roof upon the sidewalk, there being in either case no structure erected within or above the traveled way, it would not constitute a defect in the way. It is true that the present case finds that the snow had slid from the eaves, so that for more than twenty-four hours before it fell it hung above the sidewalk; but we can see no good reason why the plaintiff should therefore have a claim against the city, any more than if it had fallen directly from the roof without the intermediate suspension. The liability of towns for injuries caused by defective ways is created by statute, and is not to be extended, by construction, beyond the limits which a reasonable interpretation of the statute establishes. We are of the opinion that in Drake v. Lowell, 13 Met. 292, one of those limits was reached, and that where there is no structure, such as, if inconsistent with the safety of travelers, would be an encroachment upon the street, and the way itself is properly constructed, the descent of snow or water from the roof of a building, whether sudden or gradual, does not give a right of action against the town to recover compensation for the injury which it may occasion. It is not, within the meaning of the law, a 'defect or want of repair in the highway.'"

It is doubtless true that a municipality having the control of the highways and the duty of keeping them in repair, must at its peril remove or guard against perils growing out of defects and obstructions within the highway limits. It has the necessary authority and possession to summarily remove obstructions and other public nuisances therefrom, and the statute imposes a liability for a failure to do so. It has, however, neither the possession nor the authority to invade private premises to summarily remove such things belonging to the proprietor which may be thought dangerous. If nuisances exist on private premises, it is, in most cases, necessary that legal proceedings be instituted to abate them, and we are of the opinion that meantime the city cannot be held liable for the consequences of their maintenance. Redress in such cases must be sought against the owner. In the present case it may be that the landowner is liable. Certainly, if there is any actionable negligence, it is his, and no good reason suggests itself for bringing this action against the city rather than against him.

We are cited to several cases which are supposed to support plaintiff's contention. The one most relied on was Cason v. Ottumwa, 102 Iowa, 99, 71 N. W. 192. In that case there is nothing to indicate that the billboard was upon private property. Apparently it was in the street, as it clearly was in the case of Oak Harbor v. Kallagher, 52 Ohio St. 185, 39 N. E. 144. Grove v. Ft. Wayne, 45 Ind. 429, 15 Am. Ren. 280, was where a cornice overhanging the street fell. It apparently rests upon a statute making it a municipal duty to abate nuisances. It is recognized as an extreme case if not discredited, in the case of Anderson v. East, 117 Ind. 128, 2 L. R. A. 712, 10 Am. St. Rep. 35, 19 N. E. 726. It cites the case of Parker v. Macon, 39 Ga. 725, 99 Am. Dec. 486, where a liability was predicated on a failure of the city to remove a dangerous ruin upon private property, but on the line of the street,—a duty imposed by statute. Another case (a billboard, by the way) is found in Langan v. Atchison, 35 Kan. 322, 57 Am. Rep. 165, 11 Pac. 38. This also rests upon a statute, quoted in the opinion, which made it a municipal duty to take down and remove dangerous structures. It distinguished the case of Taylor v. Peckham, 8 R. I. 349, 91 Am. Dec. 235, 5 Am. Rep. 578, which held the contrary, upon the grounds, first, that the city had no such authority, and, second, that the liability was statutory only in Rhode Island. The same distinction may be made in the present case. In Mc Loughlin v. Philadelphia, 142 Pa. 80, 21 Atl.

We are of the opinion that this cause is not within the statute, the accident resulting from no default of the city in keeping its highway in a condition reasonably safe and fit for travel. We think that it was not the legislative intention to impose upon municipalities the duty of supervising the use of abutting premises by their owners, and that sufferers from the negligence of such must look to them for redress, where such negligence has been confined to private premises, and not previously affected the physical condition of the highway in such a way as to give notice and require action by the officials of the city.

The judgment is reversed and a new trial ordered.

its lot from that of the plaintiff that an increased and injurious quantity in volume upon the latter must necessarily be the result, is wholly immaterial.

Lewis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint alleges that plaintiff was damaged by defendant in wrongfully and unlawfully permitting the rain falling upon the roof of its church building and parish house to be collected by means of gutters and discharged through conductors in unusual and destructive quantities against plaintiff's building, through its basement windows, and upon the adjoining ground, so that it formed large pools, and percolated through the soil and area walls into the basement, causing injury to merchandise therein located. The answer alleges that the gutters and conductors upon defendant's church building had been in use for a period of time exceeding fifteen years; that in erecting the building occupied by plaintiff certain basement windows upon the easterly side were provided, and, in order to secure light therefor, excavations were made on defendant's adjoining property, in which area walls were constructed; that the water falling from defendant's premises, if any, entered plaintiff's basement through such windows, and on account of the wrongful and unlawful trespass of plaintiff, or his grantor, in so constructing the same upon defendant's premises; that there were several other buildings located upon the alley in the rear of the premises in question, and that during heavy rain storms water was collected in the alley to a depth of several inches, rushed past plaintiff's building, and entered the basement through the areas and windows in the rear thereof on a level or below the surface of the alley. It is alleged that from the 1st of May to the 1st of October, 1902, there occurred in the city of Minneapolis several very severe, extraordinary, and unusual rain storms, during which time rain fell with such force and in such volume as could not, by the exercise of ordinary prudence, have been anticipated or provided for, and that, if any waters from defendant's premises entered plaintiff's basement, it was due to such unusual and unforeseen circumstances.

The court found that the building occupied by plaintiff was erected in 1901, prior to October 1st; that it covered the entire lot, and extended from the sidewalk on Sixth street to the alley in the rear: that a basement extended over the entire distance, 50 feet of the front being two stories high, and the rear 170 feet one story; that on the easterly side there were constructed three basement windows in the basement wall, 42 inches in width and 36 inches in height, the tops of which windows were just above the level or surface of the ground; that for the purpose of admitting light to the basement an excavation was made opposite each window and an area wall erected rising 2 inches above the level of the surface; that in June, 1902, the area wall opposite each of the windows was raised about 4 inches by the construction of a cement coping, making the total height above the grade about 6 inches; that the construction of the building with the basement windows in the manner aforesaid were facts at all times known to the defendant corporation and its officers, as well as to plaintiff, and no objection was ever made thereto either by plaintiff or defendant; that the lot in question, prior to the time of the erection of the store building, was 3 to 4 inches lower than the adjacent premises occupied by defendant's church building, and the natural slope or descent of block No. 222 from the rear of the premises occupied by plaintiff and defendant at the time complained of was towards Seventh street and Hennepin avenue, especially towards the southwesterly portion of the block, and was about 24 inches to each 100 feet; that the premises occupied by defendant church are immediately east of plaintiff's premises, and consist of a tract 158x160 feet, fronting on Sixth street, the rear upon an alley; that the church was erected upon the front three-fourths, more or less, of this tract, and had been so constructed for the period of fifteen years; that in 1901 there was erected on the rear portion of the tract, on a line with the alley way in the rear of the church, a parish house; that these buildings were equipped with metal gutters, down spouts, and conductors extending to or near the ground; that one half of the church building faces the east and the other half the west; that half of the parish-house roof slopes towards the public alley and the other half slopes towards the north; that all of the gutters and down spouts attached to the eaves of the easterly half of the two roofs covering the parish house facing and sloping southerly and northerly were connected with the city sewer extending along Sixth street, and prior to the time the building occupied by plaintiff was constructed the rain water falling upon the easterly sloping roof of the church and the easterly half of the two roofs of the parish house was by means thereof conducted into the sewer, and the water falling upon the westerly half of the church and parish house were, by means of gutters attached to the eaves and conductors leading to the ground, discharged in large or small amounts, according to the extent of the rain, upon the ground near the southeasterly line of plaintiff's premises, and by natural descent flowed over and upon the lot now occupied by plaintiff; that defendant's church building is located about 36 to 72 inches distant from the easterly side of plaintiff's building. The court further found that May 23 and 24 and August 30, 1902, very heavy rain storms occurred in the city of Minneapolis, and large quantities of water were carried by the gutters and conductors upon the westerly one-half of the buildings, and by means thereof were transferred and discharged in large and destructive quantities upon the ground at one or more points within close proximity to the easterly wall of plaintiff's building, and more especially within 3 or 4 feet of the rear basement window at the southeasterly corner of plaintiff's building; that the waters so falling during the May storm flowed over the rear area wall into the basement, and the waters from the August storm worked down beside and through such wall into the basement, causing damage to plaintiff's merchandise to the extent of $600. The court also found that the rain falling upon the roofs of the other buildings situated upon or near the public alley during the time specified, in so far as was not carried away by the sewer, fell upon or near the alleyway, and, by reason of the natural slope, ran off towards Seventh street and the southwesterly side of the alley. The court further found that prior to 1902 there was built and constructed along Sixth street a public sewer for the use of abutting owners; that it was of proper dimensions, and had general connection with the sewer system of the city; that it was in a receptive working order, suitable and adequate for the purpose intended; that the cost of connecting the conductors above mentioned with the sewer system during the spring or summer of 1902 would not have exceeded the sum of $68; that the making of such connection was entirely feasible, and easily accomplished; and the court specifically found, by its twentieth finding of fact, that had defendant, prior to May 23, 1902, by means of sewer pipes properly laid, connected the westerly half of its church-building gutters and down spouts with such city sewer, all the rain so falling upon the westerly half of defendant's building would have been transferred and discharged into the sewer, and would have flowed away from plaintiff's premises, and no injury would have been caused thereby. The court further specifically found that if,

at the time specified, no gutters, eave troughs, or down spouts had been erected upon the westerly portion of defendant's building, and the waters had been allowed to drop down from the eaves to the ground, it would have spread out and flowed away from plaintiff's building by the natural decline towards Seventh street and Hennepin avenue, without causing the injuries complained of.

The assignments of error challenge certain of the findings of fact upon the ground that they are not supported by the evidence. It was conclusively shown that the southerly portion of the west transept and the west slope of the south half of the church roof, together with the north slope of the southerly half of the parish-house roof, were connected with gutters and two spouts, which discharged their collection of water into the open space between the buildings upon defendant's premises, and that a gutter was constructed under the southerly eaves of the parish house, the east end of which was connected with the sewer, but the west end of the gutter was connected with a spout at the southwesterly corner of the parish house, and the water discharged into the alley. The accompanying plat will assist in explaining the situation, as it shows the relative positions of the building occupied by plaintiff, the church building with its transepts, and the parish house.

The evidence is ample to support the finding of the court that the waters thus collected and discharged into the disconnected spouts in the open space between the church and the store building ran out through the 3-foot space between it and the parish house into the alley, there meeting the water discharged from the spout on the southwesterly corner of the parish house. Several witnesses testified that the waters thus coming together washed out the soil to some extent, creating a pool, described by one of the witnesses as 10 feet wide during heavy rains; and that the water so formed could find no other outlet because of the grade, and consequently was raised to such a height that during the May storm it flowed over the area wall and into the grocery-store basement, and during the August storm it worked down outside of and through the area wall into the basement; and that the quantity of water so collected was very heavy, and created such pressure as to force its way through the area wall. A plat was introduced, which had been made under the direction of competent engineers, upon which were marked the grades of the premises at various points and the location of other buildings upon the alley and in the vicinity. From the evidence of the civil engineer and other witnesses the court was justified in finding that the natural lay of the land from defendant's premises sloped towards Seventh street and southwesterly, and from an examination of the plat it appears that there was a depression at the point where the waters met, so that before the water could pass in any direction it would have to rise 5 or 6 inches. The grade shows that at a point a few feet east of the southwesterly spout on the parish house there was a rise in the surface of the ground allowing no opportunity for the water to flow east, but from that point the grade fell to the east and south; consequently most of the water falling on the southerly slope of the parish house roof, had the gutter not been placed under the eaves, would have flowed away from plaintiff's premises. As to the water coming through the disconnected spouts upon the southwesterly portion of the church building, while there was no other outlet for the same except into the alley through the narrow space mentioned, yet according to the evidence, the court was justified in holding that the volume was unnecessarily increased by thus collecting the water and discharging it at the points stated. There is evidence to support the finding that the sewer constructed in Sixth street was connected with the sewer system of the city, and was of sufficient capacity to carry away enough water to avoid injury under the circumstances, and that defendant might reasonably have connected the spouts with the sewer. We are also of the opinion that the finding to the effect that the damage would have been avoided had such connection been made prior to the storms is sustained by the evidence. It was testified by certain witnesses for plaintiff that, after the sewer connections were made in October, 1902, no water had collected in a pool at the rear of the parish house, nor entered plaintiff's basement. Other testimony to the same effect was given, but stricken out,—whether rightly or not we need not consider. It was also conclusively shown that the water falling on the roof of plaintiff's building was during the entire time connected with the sewer system, and that water from the buildings upon the alley and vicinity could not find its way into the basement by reason of the surface grade. And the evidence tends to show that the only water other than that delivered from defendant's premises was such as fell from the clouds into the open space between the two buildings and a small portion of the alley adjacent to the basement window, and from the disconnected spout on the parish house. There was a dispute as to whether the gutters all overflowed, and some evidence was submitted by defendant tending to prove that the storms were of such extraordinary character that the sewers would not have taken care of it had the spouts been connected; that a wind was blowing from the south, and some water must have been thus driven into the basement window. All this has been considered, and the conclusion of the trial court must be accepted. Under the evidence the court was justified in finding that sufficient of the rain falling during the storms of May and August would have been carried off by the sewer system had the connection been made, and so have prevented the damage in question.

Having determined that the facts as found by the court are supported by the evidence, we come to the consideration of the legal questions involved. As we understand defendant's position, conceding the facts to be as found by the court, under the law of this state, an owner has the right to dispose of surface water in any manner incidental to the improvement; that defendant had a right to construct the church and parish house upon its premises, to erect a roof thereon, and it was no concern of defendant where the waters were thereby incidentally discharged; that, if plaintiff's improvement was made subsequently, it was his duty to protect himself. Plaintiff abandoned all claim for damages caused by water entering the basement through the windows on the east side of his building, and confines himself to damages arising from water entering the rear window. So far as the excavation at the rear of the building and area wall are concerned, the evidence is ample to refute the charge that plaintiff did not use reasonable care to protect his premises. The area wall was constructed in the alley, made of brick and cement, inclosing an excavation about 18 inches wide and 2 feet deep, and prior to the May storm was 2 inches above the surface of the ground. The evidence shows that the water entered the basement on that occasion by flowing over the area wall, which it would not have done except for the fact that defendant caused such volume of water to be concentrated in a depression in the alley that its first natural outlet was over the area wall. Upon discovering the fact that the area wall was not of sufficient height, in June following the May storm plaintiff caused his landlord to raise the area walls of all the windows by adding a 4-inch cement coping. This, under the evidence and findings of the court, was a reasonable exercise of care to protect plaintiff's premises. During the August storm the waters collected with such force as to wash out the porous, sandy soil and brick of the area wall, thereby flowing through and under it, entering the basement window in a large stream. Plaintiff cannot be held negligent in failing, under the circumstances, to protect himself by constructing an area wall of sufficient strength and character to withstand the pressure of water collected in the manner stated.

The rule with reference to surface water, as stated in Brown v. Winona & S. W. R. Co. 53 Minn. 259, 39 Am. St. Rep. 603, 55 N. W. 123, has been followed in subsequent cases, and is as follows: When an owner improves his land for the purpose for which such land is ordinarily used, doing only what is necessary for that purpose, and being guilty of no negligence in the manner of doing it, he is not liable because, as an incident of so improving, surface waters accumulate and flow in streams upon the lands of others. This rule was recently applied in the case of Werner v. Popp (Minn.) 102 N. W. 366, where it was held that the upper proprietor did not necessarily cause damage to a lower proprietor by digging a ditch which shortened the route of surface waters falling upon his land. In the case of Philips v. Taylor, 93 Minn. 28, 100 N. W. 649, it was stated that the party was required to exercise due care, but not, under all circumstances, to protect his neighbor. In Sheehan v. Flynn, 59 Minn. 436, 26 L. R. A. 632, 61 N. W. 462, the rule is stated thus: The common-law rule is modified in this state by the rule that the party getting rid of surface water in the improvement of his own premises must so use his own as not unnecessarily or unreasonably to injure his neighbor. In Ofetie v. Hammond, 78 Minn. 275, 80 N. W. 1123, attention was called to the fact that the doctrine of reasonableness was adopted in Sheehan v. Flynn, 59 Minn. 436, 26 L. R. A. 632, 61 N. W. 462; Gilfillan v. Schmidt, 64 Minn. 29, 31 L. R. A. 547, 58 Am. St. Rep. 515, 66 N. W. 126; Jungblum v. Minneapolis, N. U. & S. W. R. Co. 70 Minn. 153, 72 N. W. 971; and Burnett v. Great Northern R. Co. 76 Minn. 461, 79 N. W. 523. There is no distinction in the principle applicable to cases of surface water in the country, where lands are left largely in their natural state, and in cities, where the land is cut up into small lots for the purpose of improvement; but there may be a vast difference in the application of the principle. It all depends upon the circumstances of the particular case as to what degree of care is required of a party attempting to get rid of surface water upon his premises. It does not follow that because in the country an upper proprietor may be permitted to aid the surface water on his field in its exit through a natural channel upon a lower proprietor, thereby enabling large volumes of water in a rainy period to accumulate, that the same thing can be done in a city in thickly settled portions, where improvements are general, and a common drainage system has been provided. Such a system of drainage to carry off surplus water is calculated to avoid the very difficulties which give rise to so much conflict between upper and lower proprietors in the country. The very object of constructing sewers along public streets adjacent to premises is to afford parties making improvements opportunity to connect therewith; and, if such connections can reasonably be made, upon what rule of law has a party the right to maintain an improvement and refuse to avail himself of this means of getting rid of a common enemy, instead of turning it upon his neighbor's premises? The doctrine of reasonableness and due care applies to this case, and under the facts found defendant should have availed itself of the means at hand to prevent injury to plaintiff's property. It is immaterial that defendant first made its improvement. It is not seriously contended that defendant did not have notice of the change in conditions caused by the improvement of the adjacent lot. It was open to casual observation, and one of defendant's officers frankly admitted that he was familiar with the situation. Under such circumstances defendant was required to take notice of the effect liable to be occasioned by allowing the waters to run at large. While hardly necessary, it may be observed that defendant cannot take advantage of the fact that the area wall in question was extended about 18 inches into the alley. If in so constructing the building plaintiff's landlord infringed upon any of the rights surrendered to the public when the alley was dedicated as a highway, those questions are not here involved. Presumably, defendant acquired no right, as against an adjacent proprietor, to use the alley as a sewer to carry off water, other means being reasonably attainable.

Jaggard, J., dissenting:

1. The facts in this case, as found by the trial court, and as set forth in the opinion of the majority of this court, appear to me to contain demonstrable and vital error. The first of the major propositions upon which the plaintiff's case rests in those findings and in that opinion is "that the sewer constructed in Sixth street was connected with the sewer system of the city, and was of sufficient capacity to carry away enough water." The only evidence in any wise sustaining this is the stipulation of counsel to the effect that for ten or fifteen years past there has been a public sewer on Sixth street opposite this property, and that certain conductors of the church building are connected therewith. On the contrary, there was testimony that in some storms that sewer system was not sufficient to take off all the water, and that at the corner of Sixth street and Hennepin avenue the water was running 3 inches deep in the center of Hennepin avenue, because the sewers would not "take it."

The second major proposition of plaintiff's case is even more clearly without support of fact, viz.: "We are also of the opinion that the finding to the effect that the damages would have been avoided had such connection been made prior to the storms is sustained by the evidence. It was testified by certain witnesses for plaintiff that after the sewer connections were made in October, 1902, no water had collected in the pool at the rear of the parish house nor entered plaintiff's basement." The principal of three fatal objections to these propositions is that this testimony of the plaintiff and all of the same character was stricken out by the trial court. The record shows that the plaintiff's counsel, like good lawyers, realized that they must prove this part of their case, and to that end introduced testimony of a number of witnesses tending to show this effect of the subsequent connection of church conductors with the sewers. To this class of testimony the defendant at a number of places duly objected. The court made its findings without disposing of these objections. On the defendant's motion for corrected findings it ruled on this class of testimony, sustained the objection, and excluded the evidence; essentially because—and this is the second fatal objection—it is the well-settled rule in this, and practically in all other, states that subsequent acts of a defendant in repairing or changing a situation which had previously wrought damage “are not to be admitted under any circumstances.” Morse v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 30 Minn. 465, 16 N. W. 358. In his memorandum on this point the trial judge said: “The witness was allowed to answer with the understanding on the part of the court, as I now distinctly recall, that that class of testimony would be received and its materiality argued by counsel, and then be passed upon by the court.

. . . It follows from this that the same disposition of this testimony (viz., that it be stricken from the record) as in the former instances should be made, and a settled case here amended accordingly.” It would seem to be immaterial that the defendant may not have raised the objection to every question on this subject asked every witness. His objection and exception covered this class of testimony, and in good faith the ruling of the court must be held to have excluded it all. The testimony, however, has to my mind no significance—and this is the third fatal objection to it—because the photographs received in evidence and other testimony conclusively show that the situation had changed in material respects.

The third major proposition of fact in which error is susceptible of almost mathematical demonstration is this: That a substantial part of the water doing the damage came from plaintiff's own premises. The spout on the rear of plaintiff's building drained into the sewer surface water from 3,900 square feet of roof surface. The plaintiff himself testified that the eaves troughs overflowed from a part of defendant's roofs, which drained an area of 1800 square feet. The eaves troughs and conductors on this part of defendant's premises are larger than those on the plaintiff's own premises next to the alley. It follows that the eaves on the plaintiff's premises were not sufficient to carry off the water. There is abundant testimony in addition to photographs to that effect. The trial court recognizes this: “It is true that in heavy rains the eaves troughs and conductors attached to the rear of plaintiff's building have not at all times conducted and carried off into the sewer all the water falling upon its roof, and hence there has been at times more or less of an overflow from these roofs.” The overflowing eaves of plaintiff's building for at least one fourth of its width clearly must have gone into this area, for the area wall began about 3 feet from the easterly end of the building and the windows were 42 inches wide. In obedience to the law of gravitation, the water from the plaintiff's building must have joined the water which fell into the area. It is only as to the remaining three fourths of defendant's overflow to which the court's argument could possibly apply, viz., that the slope of the alley would have carried these overflowing waters away from the area towards Seventh street. But the testimony of the plaintiff's own engineer shows that the grade at the spout was 99.9 while the grade at the center of the space between plaintiff's and defendant's building was 99.67. The spout was more than 12 feet away from this space. Accordingly it appears that at least one half of the overflow from the plaintiff's own building went into the area. The wind was blowing at a tremendous rate, driving the water falling from plaintiff's building directly toward the area.

In vain one looks to find either in the memoranda of the trial court or in the opinion in this case any satisfactory disposition of the defendant's further contention that the testimony conclusively shows the plaintiff to have been the author of his own harm to an indeterminate extent. Originally he claimed damages for goods destroyed by water coming through area windows which plaintiff had made on defendant's own land without defendant's consent. His audacity abated. No claim is now made for the recovery on this ground. The court, finding for the plaintiff, was faced with the task of showing that the testimony did not mix these damages up. There has been no attempt to justify the conclusion reached so far as this vital question is concerned. The dissenting opinion, however, for sake of harmony is not based on any assertion as to what the record discloses on this point, but will rest only upon the facts involved in the opinion of the majority.

The fourth major proposition of fact in this case concerns the exceptional violent character of the storms which the majority opinion has not denied, but ignored. The testimony on this point shows that in the May storm at one time the rain was falling at the rate of nearly 6 inches per hour, and .60 of an inch in ten minutes. A gale of wind blew 42 miles per hour from the south. In the August storm the rainfall was 2.14 inches; 1.92 falling within forty-five minutes. The wind was again blowing hard from the south.

2. So far as the law of the case is concerned, I am at right angles with the majority of the court. The opinion proceeds: “The very object of constructing sewers along public streets adjacent to premises is to afford parties making improvements opportunity to connect therewith, and, if such connections can reasonably be made, upon what rule of law has a party the right to maintain an improvement and refuse to avail himself of this means of getting rid of a common enemy, instead of turning it upon his neighbor's premises?" The answer is simple: Upon every relevant and recorded rule of law which existed before the majority opinion was written.

(1) On the one hand the authorities which the court cite in part sustain in a negative way only, and in part deny, its conclusions. (a) They consist principally of the Sheehan v. Flynn group of cases, which lay down this vague generalization, namely: "A party must so use his own as to not unreasonably or unnecessarily injure his neighbor." This sounds well, but works confusion. 3 Farnham, Waters, § 889c, p. 2598. It purports much, but prescribes little. On its face it appears to be just, but it may become with undisturbed consistency the basis of as many directly opposite conclusions from the same state of facts as there may happen to be advocates opposing or proposing. In this case it would justify with equal aptness the affirmance or reversal of the trial court. But it cannot be determined from within the four corners of the rule how this case should be decided. (b) Three specific cases are cited as authority for the conclusions here reached. Of these Werner v. Popp, so far as the facts are concerned, is very similar to the case at bar. There the owner of land on which a considerable body of surface water gathered at times dug a trench on his own land through which that water passed to a ditch on an ordinary highway, and then through a culvert by a dry run into a depression on the plaintiff's land. It is to be observed that this decision, which, in effect, carries the common-enemy theory to a conclusion extreme, if not unjust, was reached by a majority of the court only. The facts here are much stronger for the defendant. Not only did the defendant here turn less than one third of the water which naturally flowed onto defendant's premises, but the natural use of his own premises cast such water on a public alley connected with city system of drainage, and therefore like a case of draining rural surface water on a road having a general state-ditch system. Moreover, in the Popp Case the waters ran onto plaintiff's premises through a natural channel; here they got in through the plaintiff's own act in digging an excavation into an alley and in insufficiently protecting his premises against the water entering through that area. The flexibility and danger of the rule in the Sheehan v. Flynn case is well illustrated by its citation as authority for holding the defendant harmless there for an obvious trespass, and here liable for breach of duty to insure against damage. The second specific case—Philips v. Taylor—is much more nearly in point in logic. Water was carried from roof of a warehouse by conductors to a drain, thence ran through a culvert to sandy soil, where ordinarily it was absorbed. By an extraordinary and unusual storm the premises of both parties were flooded. So the waters here were drained into an alley, which was ordinarily porous enough to absorb them. Because of the phenomenal nature of the storm in both cases the premises of both plaintiff and defendant were damaged. The rule in both cases should be as Judge Brown said in the Philips Case, that the damage must be deemed incidental to the use and ownership of private property. And see Miller v. Wilson, 104 Ill. App. 557. (For statement of similar facts, see page 558.) The third specific case—Brown v. Winona & S. W. R. Co.—has little direct significance. What is quoted from it is fairly inconsistent with the proposition it is cited to sustain.

(2) On the other hand, the authorities which the court does not cite, but to most of which its attention has been called, are affirmatively inconsistent with its conclusion. (a) The only case upon the duty of draining surface water into a sewer denies the existence of such legal duty. Sentner v. Tees, 132 Pa. 216, 18 Atl. 1114, approved in Hall v. Rising (Ala.) 37 So. 586. (b) The overwhelming weight of authority is to the effect that in a city adjoining property owners have a right to drain surface water onto public streets and alleys, subject to municipal control. In Phillips v. Waterhouse, 69 Iowa, 199, 58 Am. Rep. 220, 28 N. W. 539, defendant drained surface water from his building to an alley in its rear, whence it flowed to the plaintiff's premises below grade. In holding that the defendant was not liable to consequent damage the court said: "The . . . [owner of a lot] had the undoubted right to erect a building covering his whole lot. Water falling thereon must be discharged therefrom; and, subject only to municipal control, the . . . [owner] had the right to discharge such water on the street or alley. He had precisely the same right in this respect as he had the right to walk on the street or alley. He had the further right to so construct the building as to cause the water to flow and be discharged at one or more places. Of necessity this must be so." This case was expressly followed in Hall v. Rising (1904; Ala.) 37 So. 587. And see Young v. Leedom, 67 Pa. 351; Nelson v. Fehd, 104 Ill. App. 114; Vanderwiele v. Taylor, 65 N. Y. 341.

The same principles of liability and immunity on this immediate subject which apply to individuals apply also to cities. Flagg v. Worchester, 13 Gray, 601; Parks v. Newburyport, 10 Gray, 28; Oftelie v. Hammond, 78 Minn. 275, 80 N. W. 1123; Gilman v. Laconia, 55 N. H. 130, 20 Am. Rep. 175; Hoyt v. Hudson, 27 Wis. 656, 9 Am. Rep. 473. The city has a right to construct and maintain its streets, alleys, and sewers so as to solve municipal problems, including this one of surface water, according to its own judgment; and if in grading or maintaining a street it casts such water on the premises of an adjoining owner, he cannot recover damages therefor. Such owner may protect himself by building an adequate embankment, by filling his lot high enough to prevent overflow, by constructing a sufficient building, or otherwise so as in actual fact to keep out the offending waters. In Alden v. Minneapolis, 24 Minn. 254, Cornell, J., said: "This he could lawfully have done, as he possessed the common-law right of use and enjoyment in respect to his lot as fully and to the same extent as the city did in respect to its streets. Each had the right to use and improve for any legitimate purpose and in such manner as would protect against the incursion or accumulation of mere surface water." And see Lee v. Minneapolis, 22 Minn. 13; St. Paul & D. R. Co. v. Duluth, 56 Minn. 494, 23 L. R. A. 88, 45 Am. St. Rep. 491, 58 N. W. 159; Stewart v. Clinton, 79 Mo. 603; Morris v. Council Bluffs, 67 Iowa, 343, 56 Am. Rep. 343, 25 N. W. 274; Hoffman v. Muscatine, 113 Iowa, 332, 85 N. W. 17; Simpson v. Keokuk, 34 Iowa, 568; Bangor v. Lansil, 51 Me. 521.

(3) The plaintiff would have been fully justified in protecting himself against all incursions of surface water. Blakely Twp. v. Devine, 36 Minn. 53, 29 N. W. 342; Mid- dlesee Co. v. McCue, 149 Mass. 103, 14 Am. St. Rep. 402, 21 N. E. 230. He was the judge as well as the author of his own devices. Neither his success nor his failure, nor his diligence nor negligence, can alone be made the basis of his neighbor's liability. As to the design of, selection of materials for, and the construction of, his area wall and its coping, his neighbor had no choice and no voice. The latter is not responsible for the consequences of the plaintiff's own instrumentalities. If the plaintiff kept the surface water out, he would have suffered no damage; if he did not, he ought to endure the harm he did not prevent. Macon v. Dannenberg, 113 Ga. 1111, 39 S. E. 446. And see Gutherie v. Nix, 5 Okla. 555, 49 Pac. 917. The mere fact that he may not have been negligent in constructing his area wall does not make the defendant his insurer against damage by surface water. Defendant took no better care of himself than of his neighbor, and took the same care of both, which was shown by the testimony to have been usual and customary in that neighborhood.

(4) The fact that the plaintiff's own overflowing eaves contributed largely, although to an indeterminate extent, to the damage for which he seeks recovery, puts him conclusively out of court upon the record in this case. Sloggy v. Dilworth, 38 Minn. 179, 185, 8 Am. St. Rep. 656, 36 N. W. 451.

Since this dissent was filed, the majority opinion was changed in this respect, viz.: So as to rest the proposition of fact that sewer connections would have prevented damage, not on plaintiff's testimony, as appeared in the original opinion, but on the other testimony. "All testimony of that class" was, however, stricken out by the trial court.

Petition for rehearing denied.

Parol evidence is admissible to show

NOTE.—As to admissibility of parol evidence to show that maker of note signed only as agent, see, in this series, Keldan v. Winegar, 20 L. R. A. 705, and note as to admissibility of extrinsic evidence to show who is liable as the maker of a note; also Shuey v. Adair, 39 L. R. 60 L. R. A.

that the one who signed a memorandum for the sale of goods necessary to satisfy the statute of frauds acted as agent for the one who is seeking to enforce the contract, so as to permit him to maintain the action.

(March 7, 1905.)

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Superior Court for Rockingham County made during the trial of actions brought to enforce contracts for the purchase of certain goods and merchandise. Sustained.

A. 473, and Second Nat. Bank v. Midland Steel Co. 52 L. R. A. 307.

Defendants contracted with an agent of plaintiff to purchase goods to such an amount that the contract would, under the statute of frauds, have been invalid unless in writing. A sufficient memorandum was signed by each defendant to satisfy the statute, and also by the agent, but the fact of the agency or the name of the plaintiff was not disclosed. The court below ruled that the memorandum was insufficient to enable the plaintiff to enforce the contracts, and granted nonsuits.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. John T. Bartlett for plaintiff.

Messrs. Ernest L. Guptill and Page & Bartlett, for defendants:

The memorandum did not comply with the statute of frauds because it did not contain all the essentials of the contract. It did not contain the name of the plaintiff, who now sues on the alleged contract. The name of a party is essential.

Sherburne v. Shaw, 1 N. H. 157, 8 Am. Dec. 47; Brown v. Whipple, 58 N. H. 229.

Nonsuit was properly ordered.

Webster v. Clark, 60 N. H. 36.

Bingham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

As both contracts are for sales of goods at prices exceeding $33, they are within the statute of frauds, and the question arises whether the memorandum in each case is sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the statute, the plaintiff not being named or described in either of them. In Chandler v. Coe, 54 N. H. 561, 576, it was held "that, where there is a written contract not under seal, executed in the name of an agent, parol evidence is admissible for the purpose of charging an unknown principal;" that the admission of parol testimony for such a purpose and under such circumstances does not contradict or vary the terms of the written instrument, and is not admitted for that purpose, but for the purpose of applying and giving effect to an established rule of law, to wit, that the act of the agent in signing the agreement in pursuance of his authority is in law the act of the principal,—the agent's signature is the principal's signature. The doctrine that an undisclosed principal may sue in his own name upon a written as well as an oral contract made by an agent in his own name, and that parol evidence is admissible to prove the plaintiff's interest, is well established in this state and in other jurisdictions. Elkins v. Boston & M. R. Co. 19 N. H. 337, 341, 342, 51 Am. Dec. 184; Chandler v. Coe, 54 N. H. 561, 576; Bryant 69 L. R. A.

v. Wells, 56 N. H. 152; McIntire v. Evans, 59 N. H. 237; Boudreau v. Eastman, 59 N. H. 467; Tainter v. Lombard, 53 Me. 369, 87 Am. Dec. 552; Huntington v. Knox, 7 Cush. 371; Barry v. Page, 10 Gray, 398; Winchester v. Howard, 97 Mass. 303, 93 Am. Dec. 93; Sims v. Bond, 5 Barn. & Ad. 389; Wilson v. Hart, 7 Taunt. 295. Does the statute of frauds prevent the enforcement of this principle of agency by excluding oral evidence to prove the facts to which it may be applied? As we have already seen, such evidence is admissible in the case of a written contract, and it would seem that it should be equally admissible in the case of a memorandum of an oral contract within the statute of frauds, unless the statute clearly excludes it. In Chandler v. Coe, 54 N. H. 574, it is stated that "it has been conceded, in the argument for the defendants, that the statute of frauds interposes no obstacle to the maintenance of an action against a principal, although the note or memorandum required by the statute is signed by his agent, and the name of the principal nowhere appears in it." If this is a correct interpretation of the act, the converse proposition must be equally true, which would permit an undisclosed principal to enforce the provisions of the contract by a suit upon it. In Lang v. Henry, 54 N. H. 57, 60, the court, in speaking of this question, said that "parol evidence is admissible to apply the contract to the parties, as to show that one of the signers acted as agent for the plaintiff or the defendant;" citing Trueman v. Loder, 11 Ad. & El. 589, and Higgins v. Senior, 8 Mees. & W. 834, 835. In these cases it was held that parol evidence was admissible "to show that one or both of the contracting parties were agents for other persons, and acted as such agents in making the contract, so as to give the benefit of the contract, on the one hand, to, and charge with liability, on the other, the unnamed principals; and this whether the agreement be or be not required to be in writing by the statute of frauds." The same reasoning was applied in these cases, with reference to a memorandum under the statute of frauds, as was applied in Chandler v. Coe to a written contract. There is without doubt a conflict of authority upon the question, but the most reasonable view seems to be that as to a memorandum of a contract for a sale of goods the statute does not change the law regulating the rights and liabilities of principals and agents, either as between themselves or as to third parties; that the provisions of the statute are complied with if the names of competent contracting parties appear in the memorandum; and that, if a party be an agent, it is not necessary that the name of the principal be disclosed in the memorandum. See Kingsley v. Siebrecht, 92 Me. 30, 69 Am. St. Rep. 486, 42 Atl. 249; Williams v. Bacon, 2 Gray, 387; Lerned v. Johns, 9 Allen, 419; Sanborn v. Flagler, 9 Allen, 474; Gowen v. Klous, 101 Mass. 449; Brodhead v. Reinbold, 200 Pa. 618, 86 Am. St. Rep. 735, 50 Atl. 229; Thayer v. Luce, 22 Ohio St. 62; Salmon Falls Mfg. Co. v. Goddard, 14 How. 446, 14 L. ed. 493; Benjamin, Sales, 7th ed. §§ 208, 219; 3 Parsons, Contr. 9th ed. 10-13; Browne, Stat. Fr. §§ 373, 375. Sherburne v. Shaw, 1 N. H. 157, 8 Am. Dec. 47, is not in conflict with the above cases. In that case the subject-matter of the contract was land, and it was held that the auctioneer, by placing his name upon the memorandum, did not intend to have it understood that he was acting as vendor; that no one was named or disclosed in the writings as vendor; and that, if the auctioneer had intended to act as agent for the owners, his authority to do so could not be shown by oral evidence, as our statute regulating contracts for the sale of land expressly requires the agent's authority to be in writing. Laws, ed. 1815, p. 191, § 3; Pub. Stat. 1901, chap. 215, § 1. Grafton v. Cummings, 99 U. S. 100, 25 L. ed. 366, and McGovern v. Hern, 153 Mass. 308, 10 L. R. A. 815, 25 Am. St. Rep. 632, 26 N. E. 861, are cases of the same nature, and the decisions are placed upon like grounds. Salmon Falls Mfg. Co. v. Goddard, 14 How. 446, 14 L. ed. 493, has been cited with approval in our decisions, in so far as it held that it was competent to show by parol testimony that one who signed the memorandum in his own name acted as agent for an undisclosed principal. Chandler v. Coe, 54 N. H. 571. But to the extent that it allowed oral evidence to be introduced to show which of the parties signing the memorandum was vendor and which was purchaser it has been disapproved. Brown v. Whipple, 58 N. H. 229, 231. If in Brown v. Whipple the memorandum is to be considered as signed by the defendant, and as designating him as purchaser, it failed to name or describe the plaintiff as a party to the contract, or to refer to any writings in which he was so named. In Rafferty v. Lougee, 63 N. H. 54, the memorandum of sale was not signed by any one, and it made no reference to any writings signed by the parties to the contract, or in which they were named or described. In McDonald v. Fernald, 68 N. H. 171, 38 Atl. 729, the memorandum was signed by the defendant, and the plaintiff, though not named, was held to be sufficiently described as one of the contracting parties by the clause, "all men such as are now at work for B. R. Condon, subcontractor." These decisions do not conflict with the result we have reached, and we know of no case in this state in which a contrary view has been entertained. The order, therefore, in each case is:

Exceptions sustained.

wrongful destruction of trees belonging to them. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. C. Martin and F. A. Sandley, for appellants:

The removal of the tree complained of in this action was, in truth, the act of the city of Asheville. The city had delegated the control of the streets and matters relating thereto to a street committee. It had the right to do this, and such a course was entirely lawful and regular.

Tate v. Greensboro, 114 N. C. 392, 24 L. R. A. 671, 19 S. E. 767.

The city could ratify such an act, even if it had not directed it in the first instance.

The city had the right to remove shade trees in the street.

Lewis, Em. Dom. § 132a; Atlanta v. Holliday, 96 Ga. 546, 23 S. E. 509.

Connor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

For the purpose of disposing of the questions presented upon this record, we may take certain propositions as settled: The land over which are the street and sidewalk upon which plaintiff resides was the property of the grantor of the plaintiff. By condemnation proceedings duly had, the city of Asheville acquired an easement over said land for the purpose of enabling it to open and maintain a public street and sidewalk for the use of the citizens of Asheville. That the fee to said land remained in the owner, and was granted to plaintiff, together with the lot, to the outer edge of the sidewalk. The tree, cut down by the defendants, stood upon the sidewalk, on the outer edge, and was not a nuisance to, or interference with the public use of, the sidewalk. That the city, by its charter and amendments thereto, had control of the street and sidewalk, with all of the powers in regard to the use thereof and of removing obstructions therefrom necessary and convenient to that end. That such powers included the right to cut down and remove this or any other tree on the street or sidewalk which, in the judgment of the city authorities, was a nuisance to, or an obstruction of, the public in the use of the street and sidewalk. That said tree afforded shade to the premises and residence of plaintiff, and its removal depreciated the value of plaintiff's property to the extent of $499, as found by the jury. In view of His Honor's instruction to the jury, we must assume that the jury found, and we find ample reason to justify such finding, that the defendant electric light company, with the permission of the superintendent of streets of the city of Asheville, afterwards approved by the board of aldermen, removed the tree for the purpose of more conveniently erecting its poles and stringing its electric wires along the street. His Honor thus stated the contention on the part of the defendants: "The defendants contend that they had the right to cut down this tree on account of the fact that the land was condemned for a street, that they had the right to cut it down for any purpose, and especially that they had the right to cut it down for the purpose of allowing electric-light wires to pass there, which they say was for the benefit of the public. The court charges you that if that was the purpose, and the city allowed the corporations that ran the electric-light wires and the railroad company to do so more conveniently, then it would be your duty to answer the first issue, 'Yes.' The city would not have the right, as the court views the matter, to cut down that tree for the purpose of appropriating that part of the land for the use of the defendants unless the condemnation was for the purpose of the city, and they would not have the right to go there and cut down the tree 69 L. R. A.

unless they were going to use it for the purpose for which it was condemned." Before discussing the exceptions which challenge the correctness of this and other instructions involving the same principle, it is proper to say that, by an amendment to the charter of the city made subsequent to the condemnation of the land for a street and sidewalk, the city authorities were given power to permit the erection of telegraph, electric light, poles and wires, etc., on and over the public streets of said city. This power, of course, in no manner affects the rights of abutting owners. The legislature could not have intended, because it had no authority, to confer such power, to be exercised in violation of such private rights. It simply empowered the aldermen to grant the franchise over the streets of the city, subject, of course, to the rights of the citizen in respect to his private property. The legislature had no power itself to empower corporations to appropriate private property without compensation, and, of course, could not authorize the city to do so. Chesapeake & P. Teleph. Co. v. Mackenzie, 74 Md. 36, 28 Am. St. Rep. 219, 21 Atl. 690.

There are a large number of exceptions to His Honor's charge, both in respect to instructions given and refused. We do not deem it necessary to pass upon all of them, because, in our view of the case, assuming the facts to be as contended by defendants, we find no error in the record. Conceding to the city of Asheville the largest possible powers in respect to opening and controlling its public streets, they must all be construed and exercised within the well-defined limitation that they are held and to be used as a public trust for the benefit of the citizens of Asheville, and not for the convenience, or even the necessities, of private persons or corporations. In speaking of the exercise of this power, the New York court says: "But we think it cannot, under guise of exercising this power, appropriate a part of a street to the exclusive, or practically to the exclusive, use of a railroad company, so as to cut off abutting owners from the use of any part of the street, . . . without making compensation for the injury sustained." Reining v. New York, L. & W. R. Co. 128 N. Y. 168, 14 L. R. A. 133, 28 N. E. 640.

As the question is one of much practical importance to the people of the state, we will endeavor to mark the line which limits the power of municipal and quasi public corporations, or private corporations engaged in public service, in interfering with the rights of abutting owners upon streets and highways. This court has in Tate v. Greensboro, 114 N. C. 392, 24 L. R. A. 671, 19 S. E. 767, defined the power which the duly constituted city authorities have in opening, widening, using, and controlling public streets. That this power, when exercised for the purpose and objects for which it is granted, and in good faith, is not subject to the supervision of the courts, is well decided in that case. We have no disposition to bring that decision, or anything said therein, into question. We adopt what is said by Mr. Justice Burwell as stating the principle upon which our decision is based: "It is not to be denied that the abutting proprietor has rights as an individual in the street in his front, as contradistinguished from his rights therein as a member of the corporation or one of the public. The trees standing in the street along the sidewalk are, in a restricted sense, his trees. If they are cut or injured by an individual who has no authority from the city to cut or remove them, he may recover damages of such individual. His property in them is such that the law will protect it from the act of such a wrongdoer and trespasser." Where it is said "who has no authority from the city," it is meant no lawful authority, because, as we shall see, the city has no power to confer authority except in the manner and for the purpose for which it may do the act itself. Many of the decisions discussing the right of abutting owners upon streets and highways make a distinction between owners holding the fee in the land, and those who have only such rights as accrue from their location on the side of the street. It is conceded that the fee to the land upon which the sidewalk is located and the abutting lot is in the plaintiff. We shall discuss the case from that view. The condemnation for a street and sidewalk therefore gave to the city an easement, the limit and extent of which, both in respect to the use and the time of its enjoyment are measured by the public necessity. "Where an easement [only] is taken for a public highway, the public acquire a paramount right to use and improve the land taken for highway purposes, which includes not only the right of passage, but such other incidental uses as have been immemorially accustomed to be made of public highways, such as the laying of sewers, gas and water pipes, and the like." 2 Lewis, Em. Dom. § 589; Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S. 324, 24 L. ed. 224. This court has uniformly held that the right acquired by condemnation is confined to the public necessity, and to the uses for which property is taken or burdened with the easement; that, for any additional burden placed upon the servient tenement, compensation must be made. Story v. New York Elev. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 122, 43 Am. Rep. 146; White v. Northwestern North Carolina R. Co. 113 N. C. 610, 22 L. R. A. 627, 37 Am. St. Rep. 69 L. R. A.

639, 18 S. E. 330; Phillips v. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. 130 N. C. 513, 89 Am. St. Rep. 868, 41 S. E. 1022; Hodges v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 133 N. C. 225, 45 S. E. 572. Such conflict as may be found in the decisions arises out of the application of the principle. It is uniformly held that an easement acquired for one purpose, either by grant, dedication, or condemnation, cannot be appropriated to another purpose. "It is certainly well settled that, where a grant is made or trust created for a specific and defined purpose, the subject of the grant or trust cannot be used for another and foreign purpose without the consent of the party from whom it was derived, or for whose benefit it was created. . . . We are not considering the right of the corporation to part with whatever interest it possessed under the dedication and trust, but the power of the corporation under the legislature to deprive the owner of a lot fronting on land so dedicated. . . . It cannot be successfully contended either that the dedication of land for a highway gives to the public an unlimited use, or that the legislature have the power to encroach upon the reserved rights of the owner by materially enlarging or changing the nature of the public easement." New York Elev. R. Co.'s Case, 90 N. Y. 122, 43 Am. Rep. 146.

In respect to an easement acquired by condemnation, the reason is obvious: In assessing compensation the commissioners are restricted to such damages as are incident to the specific use for which the condemnation is made. While the city authorities had ample power to confer upon the defendants a franchise to lay their tracks, erect their poles, and string their wires along the streets or sidewalks, if such franchise did not materially restrict or interfere with the public use for which it was held in trust, such power could not affect the right of abutting owners to demand compensation for any additional burden imposed upon their property. The fact that the defendant corporation was operating a public utility does not affect the question; the only difference being that, if the city conferred the privilege upon a private citizen or a corporation operating a private business, and its enjoyment interfered with the right of an abutting owner, no right to continue the use of the privilege could be acquired except by grant: whereas, if the person or corporation is conducting a business concerning the public,—one conferring the right of eminent domain,—the right to use the franchise or privilege may be acquired by condemnation, and paying the abutting owner compensation for the additional burden. The doctrine is well stated in Reining v. New York, L. & W. R. Co. 128 N. Y. 168, 14 L. R. A. 133, 28 N.

E. 640; "It is quite probable that the general interests of Buffalo and of the larger public are promoted by this appropriation of the street, but it by not means follows that a lot owner whose property is injured should bear the loss for the public benefit. . . .

The power conferred by the charter of Buffalo upon the common council to 'permit the track of a railroad to be laid in, along, or across any street or public ground,' . . . must be construed as subject to the qualification that no property rights of abutting owners are thereby invaded." In the same case Gray, J., concurring said: "Here the object was to subserve the railroad use, and the appropriation . . . of this embankment is practically exclusive. The street was subjected to a new use, with consequences as direct, in the permanent deprivation of the abutting property owners' appurtenant easement, as though the railroad was operated in front of his premises upon a structure physically incapable of other uses." In Eels v. American Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 143 N. Y. 133, 25 L. R. A. 640, 38 N. E. 202, Peckham, J., says: "We think neither the state nor its corporation can appropriate any portion of the public highway permanently to its own special, continuous, and exclusive use by setting up poles therein, although the purpose to which they are to be applied is to string wires thereon, and thus to transmit messages for all the public at a reasonable compensation. It may be at once admitted that the purpose is a public one, although for the private gain of a corporation, but the Constitution provides that private property shall not be taken for public use without compensation to the owner. Where land is dedicated or taken for a public highway, the question is, What are the uses implied in such dedication or taking? Primarily there can be no doubt that the use is for passage over the highway. The title to the fee of the highway generally remains in the adjoining owner, and he retains the ownership of the land, subject only to the public easement." To impose any different or additional burden without compensation cannot be done by the legislature, either directly, or by granting the power to a city. We cannot assume that it was intended to do so. Such intent is not to be gathered from the statute. White v. Northwestern North Carolina R. Co. 113 N. C. 610, 22 L. R. A. 627, 37 Am. St. Rep. 639, 18 S. E. 330. The question is exhaustively discussed in Story v. New York Elev. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 122, 43 Am. Rep. 146.

There is some conflict of judicial opinion in respect to what constitutes an additional burden. The supreme court of Maryland, in Chesapeake & P. Teleph. Co. v. Mackenzie, 69 L. R. A.

74 Md. 36, 47, 28 Am. St. Rep. 219, 21 Atl. 690, 693, says: "And so the condemnation of private property for a highway subjects the land so taken merely to an easement in favor of the public, and does not divest the owner of the fee. . . . Planting telephone or telegraph posts upon a public highway in the country is an appropriation of private property, and unlawful, unless the right to do so is acquired by contract or condemnation." After discussing the rights of the public in the street, the court proceeds to say: "Subject to these and other like rights of the municipality and the public to the use of a street for street purposes, the owner of the fee in the bed of the street possesses the same right to demand compensation for additional servitudes placed thereon that the owner of the bed of a highway in the country is entitled to. If, then, the fee in the bed of the street be in the appellee, the planting of the pole was an additional servitude imposed upon her land, for which she could claim compensation, and the act of assembly could not deprive her of it." In Broome v. New York & N. J. Teleph. Co. 42 N. J. Eq. 141, 7 Atl. 851, the chancellor says: "In order to justify the defendants in setting up the poles, it is necessary for them to show that they have acquired the right to do so, either by consent or condemnation, from the owner of the soil. The designation by the city or town authorities of the streets where the poles may be set up is not enough." The same view is held in Board of Trade Teleph. Co. v. Barnett, 107 Ill. 507, 47 Am. Rep. 453. That was an action of trespass, as the one before us. It appeared that, in addition to putting the poles upon the highway, in which plaintiff owned the fee, the employees of the company "cut away the hedge because it was in their way, and they also cut down two hedge trees." The court said: "The position taken by defendant is that the state can rightfully, as it has done, authorize the county board to permit defendant to construct its line of telegraph upon the highway without the consent of the abutting landowner; that it imposes no new or additional burden thereon, and that when the public acquire an easement over land, for a compensation fully made, the public obtain all the rights the landowner had, and the state may authorize any use of it not inconsistent with its use as a highway." After stating the contention of the landowner, the court says: "The latter position is the one best sustained by authority, and rests on sounder principles. . . . The principle is, neither the state nor a municipal corporation has any rightful authority, under the Constitution, to grant away the private property of the citizen; and if corporations quasi public, in the exercise of the right of eminent domain with which they are clothed by the sovereign power of the state, seek to appropriate it so that they may have a benefit therefrom, every principle of justice demands that they should make just compensation, whether the property taken . . . is of little or great value. But, aside from all considerations of right and justice, the Constitution has so declared, and its mandate in that respect may not be disregarded." Indianapolis, B. & W. R. Co. v. Hartley, 67 Ill. 439, 16 Am. Rep. 624; Willis v. Erie Teleg. & Teleph. Co. 37 Minn. 347, 34 N. W. 337; Stowers v. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. 68 Miss. 559, 12 L. R. A. 864, 24 Am. St. Rep. 290, 9 So. 356; Joyce, Electric Law, § 321. That shade trees may not be removed, except when necessary for the use of the street by the public, is well settled. Lewis, Em. Dom. § 132. There are some authorities to the contrary, but we think the view taken by those cited the sound one.

We have no hesitation in holding that, assuming that the board of aldermen of the city of Asheville had met and formally granted to the defendants authority to remove the tree, finding that its removal was necessary to put up its poles and wires either for the electric light or street railway upon and along the sidewalk, such action would not have justified the act of defendants. It was not within the power of the city to deprive the plaintiff of his property for such purpose without compensation. We find, however, no averment or evidence that it was necessary to remove the tree. It is suggested that it was more convenient to place the poles and string the wires with the tree out of the way. This falls far short of the essential conditions upon which private property may be taken, or burdens imposed upon it. The right of eminent domain has been so freely conferred upon corporations, upon the mere suggestion that their business is in some way connected with service to the public, that we are in danger of forgetting that it is one of the most delicate and dangerous powers conferred by the people upon their government. Public franchises have been so generously and lavishly conferred and so freely used without compensation that those who wish to enjoy them forget that one of the chief ends for which government is created and taxes paid is the protection of private property, and then only with compensation. The record in this case shows that a valuable right of property, affecting the comfort, health, and welfare of the citizen and his family, has been taken, upon the suggestion of a private corporation to the superintendent of streets, without inquiry by the board of aldermen, notice to the plaintiff, or any opportunity to be heard in defense of his rights. No person shall be deprived of his property, except by the law of the land, or due process of law, which has been defined to mean the right to be heard before he or his property is condemned. This sacred right is binding upon every department of the government, and all of its agencies, including municipal and private corporations.

While it is held in Tate v. Greensboro, 114 N. C. 392, 24 L. R. A. 671, 19 S. E. 767, that the power to remove shade trees, where their removal is necessary for the use of the street as a public highway, may be conferred upon the street committee, it would be more in accordance with due and orderly procedure to do so only after due notice to the owner, and a hearing before the legislative body of the city. The tree was cut on March 21, 1901. This action was brought on July 5, 1901. On September 16, 1904, the board of aldermen adopted a resolution reciting that the action of three corporations named, "or one or more of them, in cutting down and removing the tree in front of the place then owned and occupied by B. C. Brown," etc., "some years ago, in putting a line of street railway and appurtenances upon said street in front of said property, or replacing thereon certain light wires, he and is hereby ratified and confirmed, said tree having been so cut and removed by direction of the proper authorities of the said city." It is evident that at the time of the passage of this resolution the board were not certain to what corporation the power was given to cut the tree, or for what purpose it was conferred. It is not suggested in the resolution that it was necessary to remove the tree, or that it interfered with the street railway or the light wires. Indeed, it is apparent that the board knew but little about the matter which they "ratified and confirmed."

We have discussed the case upon the assumption that the tree was on the sidewalk. The testimony shows that, while the condemnation took place in 1892, the land had never been used as a sidewalk. The plaintiff testified without contradiction that he had at the time the tree was cut lived at the place six years, and "there had never been any sidewalk there." The tree was removed in March, 1901, and the hole out of which it was taken, "about 10 feet square," was open at the time of the trial. The testimony further shows that the tree was cut by the superintendent of the defendant companies while Mr. Brown was away from home; that, when his wife phoned him, and he directed her to forbid the removal of the tree, the parties gave no heed to her request; and that in some way the wires connecting the phone were cut.

We are impressed with the wisdom of the words of Judge Peckham in concluding his opinion in Eels v. American Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 143 N. Y. 133, 25 L. R. A. 640, 38 N. E. 202. Referring to the argument that cases of this character should be decided with reference to the wants of an advancing civilization, which is doing so much to render life more comfortable and attractive, he says: "Let the defendant pay the owners for the value of the use it makes of the land outside and beyond the public easement in the highway, and the necessity of the broader decision is done away with. It has the power to take the land upon making compensation, and hence the refusal of an owner will not stop the proposed undertaking."

We have carefully examined the record and the exceptions to His Honor's rulings. We find no error of which the defendants can complain. We are of the opinion that the allegations were sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to demand exemplary and punitive damages, and the testimony shows ample ground upon which to base the claim. In the entire transaction there was on the part of the defendants a painful disregard of the rights of the plaintiff. While extensive powers and wide discretion are given municipal authorities for the discharge of their duty to the public, it should always be borne in mind by those who serve in public positions that in our system of government there is no room or place for arbitrary power. The law which is a rule of action for the citizen is equally so for the official. Every man, when his right of person or property is invaded, has a right, and it is his duty, to demand "quo warranto."

The judgment must be affirmed.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

YOUGHIOGHENY RIVER COAL COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

(211 Pa. 319.)

The leaving of surface supports is not within a provision in a sale by the owner of coal in place of the vein, which is held subject to the duty of supporting the surface, by which he undertakes to indemnify the purchaser for any liability for any damage which may result to the surface "by reason of the skilful and careful mining and taking away of the coal," but the words refer solely to the manner of working the vein.

(Brown and Dean, JJ., dissent.)

(April 10, 1905.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 2, for Allegheny County in favor of defendants in an action brought to enforce a contract of indemnity. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John O. Petty, for appellant:

The words "skilful and careful mining" refer only to the manner of working the coal.

The general rule for the reading of the words of a contract is that they are to be taken in their ordinary and primary sense.

Jones, Construction of Contracts, § 16; Merriam v. United States, 107 U. S. 437, NOTE.—As to liability for damages to surface owner from the removal of the support of his land by mining operations, see, in this series, Noonan v. Pardee, 55 L. R. A. 410.

27 L. ed. 531, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 536; Buchanan v. Andrew, L. R. 2 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 296.

The object of the bond was to indemnify plaintiff against liability for damages, and it should be interpreted so as to give that indemnity, unless the words prevent such construction.

Jones, Construction of Contracts, pp. 355, 359.

To enable the court to say that the words "skilful and careful mining," which have a definite, certain meaning of their own, contemplate surface support, it must have evidence of usage giving them such meaning.

In construing grants or reservations of lands and minerals, the fact that the surface owner is entitled to support for his lands in their natural state is a controlling circumstance.

Messrs. John D. Brown and Shiras & Dickey for appellees.

Mestrezat, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants were the owners of certain coal lands in Westmoreland county, conveyed to their predecessor in title in 1862, by the following grant: "All the main working vein of coal underlying the farm on which party of the first part resides, situate in Sewickley township, Westmoreland county, Pennsylvania; etc. . . . With the right to take and carry away said coal, with the privilege to air and drain his openings while taking out, and for any other purpose that he, or his assigns, may need said openings for." After the conveyance of the coal, the owner of the land, by deed dated March 24, 1871, conveyed the tract to one R. G. Greenawalt, with the following reservation: "The said parties of the first part reserve all of the now worked 6-foot vein of stone coal, also the right and privilege for themselves, their heirs, and assigns, of digging, mining, and carrying away said stone coal." In 1892 the defendants sold and conveyed said coal to the Youghiogheny River Coal Company, the plaintiff, and gave to the company an obligation, dated February 29, 1892, conditioned, inter alia, that they would "well and truly protect and indemnify said Youghiogheny River Coal Company from any liability for any damage which may result to the surface of the tracts of lands overlying the coal land purchased by said coal company from said obligors and others, or to improvements thereon, by reason of the skilful and careful mining and taking away of the said coal." Soon after the purchase of the coal land, the Youghiogheny River Coal Company took possession of it and began mining operations. Subsequently R. G. Greenawalt, the owner of the tract of land, except the coal conveyed to the coal company, brought an action against the coal company for damages, alleging that it had so carelessly, negligently, and unskilfully conducted its mining operations as to cause the surface of his land to break and subside, resulting in injury to the land, the clay, and upper coal vein therein, and improvements thereon. The case was tried, and resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of Greenawalt. Thereupon the present action was brought by the Youghiogheny River Coal Company on the obligation of the defendants, referred to above, to recover the damages and expenses which the coal company was compelled to pay by reason of the suit brought against it by Greenawalt. The statement avers that the "Youghiogheny River Coal Company entered into possession of the same [coal], and proceeded in a careful and skilful manner, according to the usual and customary methods of mining practised in the bituminous coal district, to mine and remove said coal in the manner contemplated by said agreement, which mining and removal caused a subsidence of certain surface lands, owned by one Richard Greenawalt, overlying a part of the same, and by reason of such subsidence certain springs on the surface land of said Greenawalt were injured, an upper vein of coal damaged, and certain buildings thereon cracked;" that the verdict against it in favor of Greenawalt was "recovered upon the allegation and proof that the Youghiogheny River Coal Company had not supported the surface lands of the said Greenawalt in its mining operations." The defendants demurred to the statement, on the grounds that the declaration admits the lack of due care and skill in the mining performed by plaintiff, and that "the admission in said declaration that there had been a recovery against the plaintiff for failing to afford support to the overlying surface is an admission that the plaintiff in this action had not used all ordinary precautions in giving proper support to said surface." The court below sustained the demurrer, and the plaintiff has appealed.

In support of its appeal, the plaintiff company contends that the words "skilful and careful mining and taking away of the said coal," in the obligation or agreement on which this suit was brought, refer to the method and manner of working the coal, and that failure to leave sufficient coal in place to support the overlying surface is not unskilful and careless mining. The defendants' position is that "skilful and careful mining and taking away of the said coal," as used in the obligation of the defendants, is referable to the support of the surface, and that "the proper support of the surface is a part of the skilful and careful mining and taking away of said coal." It is therefore claimed by the defendants that the averment in the statement that the plaintiff company had failed to support the surface is an admission of lack of care and skill in mining and removing the coal under the Greenawalt surface.

There may be a horizontal division of land resulting in the ownership of the surface by one person and the ownership of the subjacent vein or seam of coal by another person. When there has been a severance of ownership of the surface and the coal, the owners of the respective estates hold them as estates in land, and, of course, the title and rights of each depend upon his conveyance. If the owner of the whole fee conveys the coal in the land in general terms, as in this case, retaining the residue of the tract, the purchaser acquires the coal with the right to mine and remove it, provided he does so without injury to the superincumbent estate. His estate in the coal, like that of the owner of the surface, is governed by the maxim, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non ladas. The owner of the surface is entitled to absolute support of his land, not as an easement or right depending on a supposed grant, but as a proprietary right at common law. Carlin v. Chappel, 101 Pa. 348, 47 Am. Rep. 722; 2 Snyder, Mines, § 1020. Support for the superincumbent estate is of natural right, and is part of the estate reserved to the owner of the surface. Coleman v. Chadwick, 80 Pa. 81, 21 Am. Rep. 93. And this right which the servient estate owes to the dominant estate does not depend upon whether the mining operations are conducted skilfully or negligently and carelessly. Pringle v. Vesta Coal Co. 172 Pa. 438, 33 Atl. 690; Noonan v. Pardee, 200 Pa. 474, 55 L. R. A. 410, 86 Am. St. Rep. 722, 50 Atl. 255. In the Pringle Case it is said: "If the owner of the coal undertakes to mine and remove it,—as he has an undoubted right to do,—and damage results to the surface, either (a) from negligence in conducting his mining operations, or (b) from failure to properly and sufficiently support the surface, or (c) from both these causes combined, the surface owner is entitled to recover compensation for such injury as he may show he has sustained." And this is the law of England, whose decisions we have followed in holding the surface owner entitled to absolute support for his estate. Harris v. Ryding, 5 Mees. & W. 60; Humphries v. Brogden, 1 Eng. L. & Eq. 241. In this last case, Lord Campbell, Ch. J., delivering the opinion of the Queen's bench, remarks: "It seems to have been the unanimous opinion of the court [in Harris v. Ryding] that there existed the natural easement of support for the upper soil from the soil beneath, and that the entire removal of the inferior strata, however skilfully done, would be actionable if productive of damage by withdrawing that degree of support to which the owner of the surface was entitled; the duty of the owner of the servient tenement forbidding him to do any act whereby the enjoyment of the easement could be disturbed." Under the titles of the respective parties, it is clear that Greenawalt was entitled to absolute support for surface overlying the plaintiff's coal, and that, if the company deprived him of it in mining the coal, it was liable for the consequent injury to him, regardless of whether the mining operations were conducted skilfully or negligently and carelessly. His right to actual support for the surface of his land was a natural and property right, and did not depend upon the manner in which the subjacent coal was removed.

The defendants being required "to leave every pound of coal untouched under the land" if necessary to support the surface (Noonan v. Pardee, 200 Pa. 474, 55 L. R. A. 410, 86 Am. St. Rep. 722, 50 Atl. 255), what was the purpose and intention of the parties in giving and receiving the obligation in question? We must assume—what the experience of everybody teaches—that the parties were prompted by the motive of self-interest in this transaction. The price which the defendants would demand and the plaintiff would agree to pay would necessarily depend upon the amount of coal which could be mined and removed from the land. When, therefore, the defendants agreed to sell and convey the coal, the basis upon which they fixed the selling price was the quantum of workable coal. This, in turn, would depend upon the depth of the coal under the surface, and the character of the strata of stone and earth overlying it. It was under these circumstances that the defendants executed and delivered to the plaintiff the obligation in question at or about the time of the delivery of the deeds. The defendants, believing and relying upon the sufficiency of the superincumbent strata to afford absolute support to the surface, were willing to assume responsibility for the breakage of the surface in mining and removing all the coal. This made certain the amount of coal accessible for mining and necessarily greatly enhanced the value of the tract to the purchaser. By their deeds the defendants conveyed to the plaintiff company the coal but, under the servitude imposed on their title by the laws of the state, the purchaser was restricted as to the quantity he could mine and remove to an uncertain amount, or possibly, to no part of the entire body of the mineral. To remove this uncertainty and contingency, and to secure to the purchaser "all the main working vein of coal underlying the farm," the defendants executed and delivered the obligation in question, and thereby obligated themselves to protect and indemnify the plaintiff company "from any liability for any damage which may result to the surface of the tracts of land overlying the coal land purchased by the said coal company from said obligors and others, or to improvements thereon, by reason of the skilful and careful mining and taking away of the said coal." The purpose and effect of this obligation is therefore most obvious and manifest. The title of the coal company, acquired by its deeds, gave it the entire body of coal, subject, however, to the absolute support of the surface, or, in the language of the obligation in question, to "any liability for any damage which may result to the surface of the tracts of land overlying the coal land" caused by mining and removing the coal. This obligation indemnifies the coal company against this liability, provided it exercises skill and care in mining and taking away the coal. Observing this single provision of the obligation, the defendants' protection permitted the coal company to remove all the coal without leaving any supports for the surface. It necessarily follows that the skill and care required to be exercised by the plaintiff in operating the coal referred to the manner of working the vein conveyed to the plaintiff company. Any other construction would produce an absurdity, and render the obligation nugatory and impotent to carry out the manifest purpose for which it was executed and delivered. The only protection the coal company needed to enable it to mine all the coal was indemnity against injury resulting to the surface in removing the coal required for supports. If, therefore, skilful and careful mining" in the defendants' obligation requires the coal company to leave in place coal sufficient to support the surface, the instrument affords the company no protection whatever against the only liability it could incur, which is to the surface owner, by removing the supports and thereby breaking the surface. If, on the other hand, we give these words their usual and primary signification, keeping in view the manifest purpose to be attained, the defendants' obligation will supplement their deeds, and place in the grantee the entire body of coal, freed and discharged from the only obstacle or impediment in mining and removing it, which is the duty of absolute support owed to the surface owner. If we omit from the condition of the obligation the words "skilful and careful," it will then require the defendants to "protect and indemnify said Youghiogheny River Coal Company from any liability for any damage which may result to the surface of the tracts of land overlying the coal land purchased by said coal company from said obligors and others, or to improvements thereon, by reason of the . . . mining and taking away of the said coal." Such an obligation would unquestionably protect the obligee from liability in removing all the coal. That is manifest, and must be conceded. If we insert the omitted words in the condition, how does it affect the obligors' liability? This, we think, is apparent. It does not prevent the obligee company from removing all the coal, but simply imposes upon it the duty of care and skill in the mining operations. By virtue of its deeds from the defendants, all the coal belongs to the plaintiff company, as is conceded, and this obligation indemnifies the company as against the surface owner in removing all of it. If, however, by the careless use of explosives, or the negligent or unskilful use of any other means in mining the coal, the company's employees, regardless of the quantity of coal they may remove or leave in place, should break the surface, the defendants' obligation will afford the obligee no protection, and the company would be compelled to stand the loss. Hence it is manifest that the words "skilful and careful" in the obligation refer to the manner or method of working the stratum or vein of coal, and not to the quantum of coal which the owner may remove or leave in place to support the surface.

Our own cases, and also the English decisions, recognize a distinction between a failure to support the surface and negligence in conducting the mining operations. In Horner v. Watson, 79 Pa. 242, 21 Am. Rep. 55, an action for not supporting the surface, whereby the plaintiff's mines adjoining those of the defendants were flooded, the ruling of the trial court was affirmed by this court in refusing to charge that the defendants were not liable if the jury found the injuries were not occasioned by any wanton or wilful acts and that the defendants had conducted their mining operations according to the approved, established, and customary course and practice of mining in the region, and without any negligence in the operation of mining. In Carlin v. Chappel, 101 Pa. 348, 47 Am. Rep. 722, the late Chief Justice Green, delivering the opinion, referred to this ruling in the Horner Case, and recognized the same distinction, by saying that it was there held that "the defendants would be responsible . . . without any reference to actual negligence or want of skill in the miners." He also says that "it will here be seen [referring to a quotation from a text-book] that the right of the surface owner is declared to be a right to absolute support, and that when such a right exists it is of no consequence with what degree of skill and prudence the mine owner conducts his operations." And in Pringle v. Vesta Coal Co. 172 Pa. 438, 33 Atl. 690, this court recognizes the distinction, and says that the owner of the coal is responsible for failing to support the surface, whether the injury results "from negligence in conducting his mining operations, or from failure to properly and sufficiently support the surface." The English cases cited above also recognize the distinction between negligent and careless mining operations and failure to leave sufficient coal in place to support the overlying surface. The declaration in those cases laid the cause of action as having been "wrongfully, carelessly, negligently, and improperly, and without leaving any proper or sufficient pillars or supports in that behalf." Lord Campbell in Humphries v. Brogden, in commenting on Harris v. Ryding, says, in addition to the excerpt from his opinion quoted above: "The Barons, in the very comprehensive and masterly judgments which they delivered seriatim, seem all to have thought that the reservation of the minerals would not have justified the defendant in depriving the surface of a complete support, however carefully he might have proceeded in removing them."

We are of opinion that the words "skilful and careful mining," used in the defendants' obligation of February 29, 1892, relate to the manner of working the coal, and do not impose upon the plaintiff company, in operating the coal, the duty of leaving proper and sufficient supports for the surface. If, therefore, the plaintiff exercise care and skill in its mining operations, it may mine and remove all the coal, and the defendants must indemnify the company against any damage resulting from injury to the surface which it may be compelled to pay the surface owner.

In explanation of the apparent delay in handing down this opinion, the writer may be permitted to say that the case has been but recently assigned to him.

The assignments of error are sustained, and the judgment is reversed with a procedendo.

Brown, J., dissenting:

The judgment below in favor of the defendants was on their demurrer to the plaintiff's statement. When it was negotiating with the appellees and two others, now deceased, for the purchase of certain coal lands, the ownership of the surface was in third parties, and it "declined to purchase unless it, the said Youghiogheny River Coal Company, was properly protected and indemnified from any liability for damage which might result to the surface lands overlying said tract of coal, or to the improvements thereon, in the skilful and careful mining and taking away of said coal without surface support." Immediately following this averment is one that the appellees, "to induce the said Youghiogheny River Coal Company to purchase said coal lands, stipulated with it that they would make and execute an agreement in writing to well and truly protect and indemnify it, the said Youghiogheny River Coal Company, from any liability or damage which might result to the surface land overlying the said tract of coal, or to the improvements thereon, by reason of the skilful and careful mining and taking away of said coal." The agreement in writing subsequently given by the vendors was that they would "well and truly protect and indemnify said Youghiogheny River Coal Company from any liability for any damage which may result to the surface of the tracts of land overlying the coal land purchased by said coal company from said obligors and others, or to improvements thereon, by reason of the skilful and careful mining and taking away of the said coal." It will at once be observed that, though the averment of the appellant is that it had insisted upon indemnity against liability for damage done to the surface in not giving the same support, the admission is that the indemnity given and received by it was from liability for damages to the surface owner simply from the skilful and careful mining and taking away of coal. There is no agreement to indemnify it if the surface should subside in consequence of the vendee's failure to furnish sufficient support. Though such an indemnity had been asked for, it was not given, and it is not reasonable to suppose it would have been given by the appellees if the appellant had persisted in making it a condition of the sale. In the suit brought against it by R. G. Greenawalt, the surface owner, there was a recovery against the appellant, and the averment of its cause of action against the appellees is that he had recovered upon his allegation and proof that it had not supported his surface lands in its mining operations. For what he recovered from it, it now seeks to recover from the appellees on what it terms the indemnity agreement.

The situation to my mind is entirely free from difficulty. Though appellant's averment is that it had mined "in a careful and skilful manner," its distinct admission is that the injuries sustained by Greenawalt were due entirely to its failure to support his surface. If, as the surface or upper owner, he had sustained injury in connection with what may have been the appellant's careful and skilful mining,—if, by way of illustration, an upper vein of coal belonging to him had been damaged in such mining,—the right of the appellant to recover from the appellees what it had been compelled to pay him could not be questioned; but when the injuries sustained were due solely to its failure to observe the absolute duty owed by it to the surface owner, and from the consequences of a disregard of which it had not been indemnified by the appellees, though they had been asked for such indemnity, it is equally clear that there is no liability from them to it. Its skilful mining is not involved in its claim as set forth in the statement of its cause of action. The owner of a mineral estate, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary between him and the upper owner, owes a servitude to the superincumbent estate of sufficient support, and a failure to sufficiently support that estate is negligence. Jones v. Wagner, 66 Pa. 429, 5 Am. Rep. 385. The duty of furnishing sufficient support is an absolute one, and the rule enforcing it is not only rigid, but has long been well known through many of our cases, one of the latest being Noonan v. Pardee, 200 Pa. 474, 55 L. R. A. 410, 86 Am. St. Rep. 722, 50 Atl. 255, in which our Brother Dean not only clearly, but forcefully, says: "Where there has been a horizontal division of the land, the owner of the subjacent estate, coal or other mineral, owes to the superincumbent owner a right of support. This is an absolute right arising out of the ownership of the surface. Good or bad mining in no way affects the responsibility; what the surface owner has a right to demand is sufficient support, even if, to that end, it be necessary to leave every pound of coal untouched under his land. Berwind v. Barnes, 13 W. N. C. 541; also the English case, Harris v. Ryding, 5 Mees. & W. 60, in which Baron Parke uses this language: 'I do not mean to say that all the coal does not belong to the defendants, but they cannot get it without leaving sufficient support.' We have followed rigidly this rule, as thus tersely suggested, in all our decisions on the subject, and they have been many. Of course, defendant had a right to all the coal under this lot, but he had no right to take any of it if thereby necessarily the surface caved in. The measure of his enjoyment of his right must be determined by the measure of his absolute duty to the owner of the surface. So there is nothing gained by adducing evidence of good or bad mining, or by a discussion of that subject."

Sufficient support was not given to Greenawalt by the appellant, and, as the terms of the agreement to indemnify do not extend to its admitted negligence, no right of action to recover from the appellees is disclosed in its statement, and the judgment on the demurrer ought to be affirmed. I am utterly at a loss to understand how any other conclusion can follow an examination of the pleadings.

Dean, J., joins in this dissent.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

Michael Francis CLANCY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

(.....Neb.....)

*1. In receiving a guest into his hotel, a hotel keeper impliedly undertakes that such guest shall be treated with due consideration for his comfort and safety.

*Headnotes by ALBERT, C.

NOTE.—Liability of innkeeper for injury to guest by servant.

The cases which have considered the liability of an innkeeper for an injury by his servant to a guest are very few. Though there are many loose statements in the books that the liability of an innkeeper for the safety and comfort of his guests is the same as that of a carrier, no court which has had the question before it for decision has extended the liability thus far, except in the Nebraska case of CLANCY v. BARKER, holding an innkeeper liable for an injury to a guest by the servant whether the latter was actively engaged in the discharge of his duties or not, such injury being held a breach of the innkeeper's implied contract that the guest shall be treated with due consideration for his safety and comfort. In a case brought in the Federal court to recover for this same injury this holding is disapproved of, and it is held that the limit of the liability of an innkeeper is the exercise of reasonable care for the safety, comfort, and entertainment of his guests. And this the court states 69 L. R. A.

2. A trespass committed upon the guest in the hotel by a servant of the proprietor, whether actively engaged in the discharge of his duties at the time or not, is a breach of such implied undertaking, for which the proprietor is liable in damages.

3. It is not within the scope of the authority of a hired manager of a hotel to bind his employer by admissions concerning such trespass after it had been committed.

4. When such admissions are made a day after the trespass, and only remote-was the general rule of law governing the liability of innkeepers before the decision in the Nebraska case, which had received the approval of every court which had ever decided the question.

Before the decision of the Nebraska case it had been held, however, that an innkeeper must respond in damages for the malicious act of his servant in wantonly and ruthlessly assaulting a guest. Overstreet v. Moser, 88 Mo. App. 72. And there is nothing in the opinion to show that the court intended to limit this liability to an assault committed by the servant while engaged in the execution of his duty toward the master, though it was alleged in the argument of counsel that the servant was acting within the line of his duties, and that he was to use his judgment as to when it was necessary to expel people from the hotel, and what force should be used. In the statement it is also said that the evidence showed that the servant was a burly, strong man with a violent temper, and that this fact was known to the master, and one of the instructions in the lower court was to the effect that the jury must find ly connected therewith, they are not admissible in evidence as a part of the res gesta.

On Rehearing.

†5. The relation of master and servant does not render the master liable for the torts of the servant, unless connected with his duties as such servant or within the scope of his employment.

6. It is the duty of a hotel keeper to protect his guests while in his hotel against the assaults of employees who assist in the conduct of the hotel and in the care and accommodation of the guests. If damages result from such assault, the hotel keeper is liable therefor.

(February 4, 1904.)

ERROR to the District Court for Douglas County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff's son for which defendants were alleged to be responsible. Reversed except as to defendant Barker.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

†Rehearing headnotes by SEDGWICK, J.

for the plaintiff if they believed that he went to the hotel as a guest, and that the servant, while acting as the agent or employee of the innkeeper, and in the execution of the duties which he had been employed to perform, made the assault upon the plaintiff. Taking all the facts into consideration, it may be that the court intended to limit its decision to cases where the wrongful act was committed while the servant was engaged in the performance of his duties; but the language of the opinion is broad enough to cover cases where an innkeeper is attempted to be held liable for acts of his servants outside the scope of their duties.

In Rommel v. Schambacher, 120 Pa. 579, 6 Am. St. Rep. 732, 11 Atl. 779, there is a dictum that where one enters a saloon or tavern open for the entertainment of the public the proprietor is bound to see that he is properly protected from the assaults or insults, as well of those who are in his employ, as of the drunken and malicious men whom he may choose to harbor. The declaration in this case charged a liability of the defendant as a tavern keeper to the plaintiff as his guest, but the wrongful act was committed not by a servant, but by another guest, and the facts of the case are such as to render it of no value on the question which is the subject of this note.

In Dickson v. Waldron, 135 Ind. 507, 24 L. R. A. 483, 41 Am. St. Rep. 440, 34 N. E. 506, 35 N. E. 1, it is also said, obiter, that common carriers, innkeepers, and others who invite the public to become their patrons and guests, owe a special duty to those who may accept such invitations; and that such patrons and guests have a right to ask that they shall be protected from injury while present on such invitation, and particularly that they shall not suffer wrong from the agents and servants of those who have invited them.

In Wade v. Thayer, 40 Cal. 578, it is held that an innkeeper is liable for the actual damage suffered by a guest through an assault committed upon him by servants in the performance of their duties as servants, even though the master was not present and in no manner consented to, or aided in, the assault; but that he is not liable for their wanton and malicious acts committed without his consent or approval.

So, an innkeeper is not responsible for a malicious assault upon a guest while seated at the dining table, by a dining-room waiter, where the master was not negligent either in employing or retaining the waiter in his service. Rahmel v. Lehnndorff, 142 Cal. 681, 65 L. R. A. 88, 100 Am. St. Rep. 154, 78 Pac. 659. It is said in this case that an innkeeper is no doubt guilty of negligence if he admits to his hotel, or permits to remain there, whether as guest or servant, a person of known violent and disorderly propensities, who will probably assault or otherwise maltreat his guest, and that for the consequence of such negligence he may be liable in damages; but that the plain ground of his liability in such case would be his negligence in harboring persons dangerous to the peace and comfort of those persons for whose comfort he is bound to provide.

And an innkeeper is not liable to a guest for an assault committed upon him by a servant, which is the result of a personal altercation or quarrel between the servant and the guest, and is not done in carrying out the master's business, nor by his consent, and is not ratified by him after its occurrence. Curtis v. Dinneen, 4 Dak. 245, 30 N. W. 148.

In Calye's Case, 8 Coke, 32a, 33b, it is said that if a guest be beaten in the inn, the innkeeper shall not answer for it; and this statement has been frequently cited as authority for holding that an innkeeper is not liable for an assault committed upon a guest by a servant. But the statement is a mere dictum, the case not involving the question of liability for personal injury to a guest at all.

F. H. L.

Mr. John O. Yelzer, for plaintiff in error:

Innkeepers, common carriers, and similar institutions are governed by the same principles of law.

Craker v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Wis. 671, 17 Am. Rep. 504; Bass v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Wis. 459, 17 Am. Rep. 495; Mastad v. Swedish Brethren, 83 Minn. 42, 53 L. R. A. 803, 85 Am. St. Rep. 446, 85 N. W. 913; Dickson v. Waldron, 135 Ind. 507, 24 L. R. A. 483, 41 Am. St. Rep. 440, 34 N. E. 510, 35 N. E. 1; Norcross v. Norcross, 53 Me. 169; Pinkerton v. Woodward, 33 Cal. 585, 91 Am. Dec. 657; Com. v. Power, 7 Met. 601, 41 Am. Dec. 465; Russell v. Fagan, 7 Houst. (Del.) 396, 8 Atl. 258; Hulett v. Swift, 42 Barb. 254; Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Lowe, 28 Neb. 239, 6 L. R. A. 809, 26 Am. St. Rep. 325, 44 N. W. 226.

Common carriers, innkeepers, and such public hosts are liable to their guests for misconduct of their servants, resulting in personal injury or abuse of such persons, who are entitled to special care and attention.

Russell v. Fagan, 7 Houst. (Del.) 392, 8 Atl. 258; Mason v. Thompson, 9 Pick. 283, 20 Am. Dec. 471; Pinkerton v. Woodward, 33 Cal. 557, 91 Am. Dec. 657; St. Louis, A. & C. R. Co. v. Dalby, 19 Ill. 367.

The identical reasons exist for holding a hotel keeper liable for such conduct which are assigned for holding common carriers and other public servants liable to the same extent. Innkeepers, like the other various hosts are under a common-law contract of hospitality. This contract guarantees that the innkeeper will do all in his power to prevent any harm, injury, or insult from befalling his guests from any fellow guest or stranger, and absolutely guarantees that he and his servants will not themselves mistreat them.

It would be ridiculous to say that the innkeeper would be liable if his servants saw a guest being mistreated and injured in the inn, and did not prevent it, being able to do so, and yet to say that the servants charged with this duty on behalf of the innkeeper could themselves do what they could not suffer a third person to do.

Common carriers are under this liability.

Mr. William A. Redick, for defendants in error:

Even common carriers are not held to the liability of an insurer. They are required to exercise the highest degree of care and skill, but they are not insurers.

Hazard v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 1 Biss. 503, Fed. Cas. No. 6275; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Byrum, 153 Ill. 131, 38 N. E. 578, Louisville, N. A. & O. R. Co. v. Pedigo, 108 Ind. 481, 8 N. E. 627; Gilson v. Jackson County Horse R. Co. 76 Mo. 282; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Baier, 37 Neb. 235, 55 N. W. 913.

The liability of innkeepers has not been enlarged. It remains what it has always been. Liability with reference to the property of the guest is that of an insurer, on grounds of public policy.

Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Lowe, 28 Neb. 248, 6 L. R. A. 809, 26 Am. St. Rep. 325, 44 N. W. 226.

But this strictness of liability has never been held with respect to the personal safety of the guest, for the obvious reason that the guest is not put in charge of the innkeeper, but retains control of his own movements.

The duty of an innkeeper is not to insure the persons of his guests against injury, but merely to take reasonable care of their persons, so that they shall not be injured by anything happening to them through his negligence while they are his guests.

Weeks v. McNulty, 101 Tenn. 499, 43 L. R. A. 185, 70 Am. St. Rep. 693, 48 S. W. 809; Sandys v. Florence, 47 L. J. C. P. N. S. 598.

The liability of the innkeeper is based solely upon the principles applicable to the relation of master and servant.

Curtis v. Dinneen, 4 Dak. 245, 30 N. W. 148.

Liability exists only when the servant is acting within the scope of his employment.

Wade v. Thayer, 40 Cal. 578; Com. v. Pover, 7 Met. 601, 41 Am. Dec. 465; Davis v. Houghtellin, 33 Neb. 582, 14 L. R. A. 737, 50 N. W. 765; Curtis v. Dinneen, 4 69 L. R. A.

Dak. 245, 30 N. W. 148; Grimes v. Young, 51 App. Div. 239, 64 N. Y. Supp. 859.

Where the servant, for his own purposes, does a wrong without the direction or authority of the master, and not for the purpose of executing his orders or doing his work, the master is not liable.

Albert, C., filed the following opinion:

The plaintiff, in his petition filed in the district court, alleges, in effect, that the defendants were the proprietors of and operated a hotel in the city of Omaha; that on the 12th day of January, 1902, he entered such hotel with his wife and infant son for a temporary sojourn therein; whereupon he and the said members of his family were received as guests in said hotel by the defendants; that afterward, and while they were thus guests in said hotel, the plaintiff's infant son entered a room of the hotel, to speak or play with a porter or servant of the defendants, who at the time was in said room. Then follow these allegations: "That the said porter and servant of defendants in said hotel in said capacity at said time violated all obligations of hospitality and patience due from said defendants, through said servants, to said infant guest, and the defendants thereby violated their agreement, duty, and obligation of law with and to the plaintiff, by the following conduct, to wit: The said porter, in attempting to have said infant son of plaintiff leave said room and corridor where defendants did not want him, as instructed, and retire to his mother's room, and to have said infant cease his childish play and pretended annoyance, carelessly, imprudently, rashly, unnecessarily, negligently, and foolishly picked up a revolver, and, pointing it at said infant, said, 'If you handle anything, this is what I will do to you,' or similar words, calculated to frighten the said infant out of his natural and childish playfulness and prevent his touching any of defendants' property, or being about said room or the halls. That the said infant threw up his hands when thus frightened and assaulted, and, by some means unknown to this plaintiff, the said pistol was carelessly and negligently discharged by the said defendants' servant as aforesaid. . . . " The petition contains the usual allegations as to damages. The defendants, by their answers, admit that the defendant administrator and corporation were the proprietors of the hotel, and were operating it, as alleged in the petition; that the plaintiff and his wife and infant son were received into said hotel as guests at the date alleged in the petition; and that, while the plaintiff and the said members of his family were thus guests at the hotel, the son was seriously injured. But they specifically deny that the person described in the petition as their porter or servant was in their employ at the time the injury occurred, and that he was on duty, or in the performance of any duty, as porter or servant of the defendants, at such time. They also specifically deny that the defendant George E. Barker was one of the proprietors of the hotel, or in any way interested in the same, or the operation thereof, save as president of the defendant corporation. The evidence adduced by the plaintiff sufficiently shows that the plaintiff, his wife, and infant son became guests at the hotel, intending to remain but a short time; that about three days after they were received in the hotel, and while they were guests therein, a servant of the proprietors of the hotel, who had waited upon the plaintiff and the members of his family during their stay at the hotel, was playing a harmonica in a room which was not one of those assigned to the plaintiff or any member of his family; that the plaintiff's infant son, attracted by the music, entered the room, the door of which was open; that thereupon the servant who had been playing the harmonica took up a revolver, and pointed it at the boy, saying, "See here, young fellow, if you touch anything this is what you get." The revolver by some means was then discharged, the ball striking the boy, destroying one of his eyes, and inflicting upon him other serious injuries. While there is no direct evidence that the person who inflicted the injuries was in the employ of the proprietors of the hotel, the evidence shows that he waited on the guests, carried water to their rooms, and rendered such other services as are usually rendered by servants of a certain class about a hotel, and is amply sufficient to warrant a finding that he was a servant of the proprietors, and, for the purposes of this case, would have made him such, perhaps, in the absence of a contract of employment. There is no evidence tending to connect the defendant George E. Barker with the operation of the hotel. At the close of plaintiff's case the court directed a verdict for the defendants, and from a judgment rendered on such verdict the plaintiff brings the record here for review.

The defendants insist that, the plaintiff having failed to allege that the servant wilfully or maliciously inflicted the injury, it was incumbent on him to show that the injuries were the result of negligence on the part of the servant in the performance of some duty for which he was employed, or in the discharge of some duty which the defendants owed the plaintiff. We think they overlook the theory upon which this action was brought and prosecuted. The plaintiff, by his petition and evidence, obviously intended to commit himself unreservedly to the theory that this cause of action is ex contractu. A contract is alleged in the petition. The wrongful acts of the servant, which resulted in injury to the boy, are alleged, not for the purpose of stating a cause of action ex delicto, but for the purpose of showing a breach of contract, and consequent damages.

This brings us at once to the question whether the act of the servant resulting in the injuries complained of constitutes a breach of the implied contract between the plaintiff and the proprietors of the hotel for the entertainment of the former and his family. By the implied contract between a hotel keeper and his guest, the former undertakes more than merely to furnish the latter with suitable food and lodging. There is implied on his part the further undertaking that the guest shall be treated with due consideration for his safety and comfort. Rommel v. Schambacher, 120 Pa. 579, 6 Am. St. Rep. 732, 11 Atl. 779. In Jencks v. Coleman, 2 Sumn. 221, Fed. Cas. No. 7,258, Story, J. [Shaw, Ch. J., in Com. v. Pover, 7 Met. 601, 41 Am. Dec. 465], said: "An owner of a steamboat or railroad, in this respect, is in a condition somewhat similar to that of an innkeeper, whose premises are open to all guests. Yet he is not only empowered, but he is bound, so to regulate his house, as well with regard to the peace and comfort of his guests who there seek repose, as to the peace and quiet of the vicinity, as to repress and prohibit all disorderly conduct therein; and, of course, he has a right and is bound to exclude from his premises all disorderly persons, and all persons not conforming to regulations necessary and proper to secure such quiet and good order." The foregoing language is quoted with approval in Bass v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Wis. 459, 17 Am. Rep. 495. Substantially the same language is employed by the court in Dickson v. Waldron, 135 Ind. 507, 24 L. R. A. 483, 41 Am. St. Rep. 440, 34 N. E. 510, 35 N. E. 1. See also Norcross v. Norcross, 53 Me. 169; Pinkerton v. Woodward, 33 Cal. 585, 91 Am. Dec. 657; Com. v. Power, 7 Met. 601, 41 Am. Dec. 465; Russell v. Fagan, 7 Houst. (Del.) 396, 8 Atl. 258; Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Lowe, 28 Neb. 239, 6 L. R. A. 809, 26 Am. St. Rep. 325, 44 N. W. 226. The foregoing also shows that the duties of a hotel keeper to his guests are regarded as similar to the common-law obligation of a common carrier to his passengers. As regards the duty of a common carrier to his passengers, in Dwinelle v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 120 N. Y. 122, 8 L. R. A. 224, 17 Am. St. Rep. 611, 24 N. E. 319, the court said: "As we have seen, the defendant owed the plaintiff the duty to transport him to New York, and during its performance to care for his comfort and safety. This duty of protecting the personal safety of the passenger, and promoting by every reasonable means the accomplishment of his journey, is continuous, and embraces other attentions and services than the occasional service required in giving the passenger a seat or some temporary accommodation. Hence, whatever is done by the carrier or its servants which interferes with or injures the health or strength or person of the traveler, or prevents the accomplishment of his journey in the most reasonable and speedy manner, is a violation of the carrier's contract, and he must be held responsible for it." To the same effect are the following: Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Hinds, 53 Pa. 515, 91 Am. Dec. 224; Goddard v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 57 Me. 214, 2 Am. Rep. 39; Chamberlain v. Chandler, 3 Mason, 245, Fed. Cas. No. 2,575; Pendleton v. Kinsley, 3 Cliff. 417, Fed. Cas. No. 10,922; Bryant v. Rich, 106 Mass. 188, 8 Am. Rep. 311; Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Flexman, 103 Ill. 548, 42 69 L. R. A.

Am. Rep. 33; Southern Kansas R. Co. v. Rice, 38 Kan. 398, 5 Am. St. Rep. 766, 16 Pac. 817. An examination of the foregoing cases will show, we think, that the reasoning applies with equal force to a hotel keeper, as regards his duties to his guests. Those duties spring from the implied terms of his contract, and a failure to discharge them, while it may in some instances amount to a tort, amounts in every instance to a breach of contract.

If, then, the defendants were under a contractual obligation that the plaintiff and his family should be treated with due consideration for their comfort and safety, the act of the servant, resulting in the injuries complained of, obviously amounts to a breach of contract. That the wrongful act was committed by a servant is wholly immaterial. The rule which requires that a guest at a hotel be treated with due consideration for his comfort and safety would be of little value if limited to the proprietor himself. As a rule, he does not come in contact with the guests. His undertaking is not that he personally shall treat them with due consideration, but that they shall be so treated while inmates of the hotel as guests; and, if they be not thus treated, there is a breach of the implied contract, whether the lack of such treatment is the result of some act or omission of the proprietor himself, or of his servant or servants.

Neither do we deem it material whether the servant at the time of the injury was actively engaged in the discharge of his duty as servant or not. He was a servant of the proprietor, and an inmate of the hotel. His duty as to the treatment to be accorded the guests of the hotel was a continuing one, and rested upon him wherever, within the hotel, he was brought in contact with them. To hold otherwise would be to say that a guest would have no redress for any manner of indignity received at a hotel, so long as it was inflicted by a servant not actively engaged in the discharge of some duty. The following from Dwinelle v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 120 N. Y. 122, 8 L. R. A. 224, 17 Am. St. Rep. 611, 24 N. E. 319, is peculiarly applicable at this point: "The idea that the servant of a carrier of persons may, in the intervals between rendering personal services to the passenger for his accommodation, assault the person of the passenger, destroy his consciousness and disable him from further pursuit of his journey, is not consistent with the duty that the carrier owes to the passenger, and is little less than monstrous. While this general duty rested upon the defendant to protect the person of the passenger during the entire performance of the contract, it signifies but little or nothing whether the servant had or had not completed the temporary or particular service he was performing, or had completed the performance of it, when the blow was struck. The blow was given by a servant of the defendant while the defendant was performing its contract to carry safely and to protect the person of the plaintiff, and was a violation of such contract."

It is equally immaterial to this case, we think, whether the shooting was accidental or wilful. The servant, in pointing a loaded gun at the boy, committed a trespass, and, as a result of such trespass, inflicted serious and permanent injuries on the child. His acts, therefore, constitute a breach of the implied undertaking of his employers to treat the plaintiff and his family with due consideration for their safety and comfort, for which breach his employers are liable in damages.

We are aware that there are cases holding contrary to the foregoing conclusion, but they do not seem to us to be based on sound reasons, nor upon just considerations of public policy, and are contrary to the weight and trend of modern authority.

The plaintiff offered to prove by one of his witnesses that the day following the accident one Mr. Bowman, the manager of the hotel, told the witness "that he had told the boys [referring to the porters and bell boys of the hotel] time and again to keep the kid [meaning the plaintiff's son] out of the elevator, halls, and rooms of the hotel, and to keep him in his mother's room." The offer was rejected, and the plaintiff contends that the ruling of the court in that behalf is erroneous. We do not think so. It was not within the scope of the authority of the manager to bind his employer by the admission or declaration sought to be proved, and it was too remote in point of time, and too detached from the injury, to be admissible as a part of the res gestæ. Gale Sulky Harrow Co. v. Laughlin, 31 Neb. 103, 47 N. W. 638; Commercial Nat. Bank v. Brill, 37 Neb. 626, 58 N. W. 382; Collins v. State, 46 Neb. 37, 64 N. W. 432; Friend v. Burleigh, 53 Neb. 677, 74 N. W. 50.

As to the defendant George E. Barker, as we have seen, there is no evidence which would warrant a verdict against him. Hence, so far as he is concerned, the judgment of the district court is right; but, as to the other defendants, it is recommended that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings according to law.

Barnes and Glanville, CC., concur.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, the judgment of the District Court as to the defendant George E. Barker is affirmed, and as to the other defendants the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings according to law.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Sedgwick, J., on May 3, 1905, handed down the following response:

Since the filing of the former opinion in this case (ante, 642, 98 N. W. 440), the question principally discussed therein, and arising out of the same transaction, has been decided by the United States court of appeals for this circuit (Clancy v. Barker, post, 653, 66 C. C. A. 469, 131 Fed. 161). The opinion of that court, prepared by Judge Sanborn, strongly states the reasons that led the majority of the court to the conclusion that the hotel company ought not to be held liable. In a dissenting opinion, Judge Thayer upholds the views expressed in the former opinion of this court.

1. The first ground urged by counsel for holding the defendants liable, we think, is satisfactorily discussed in the majority opinion of that court. This relates to the doctrine of respondere superior, derived from the relation of master and servant. If there had been evidence showing that it was the duty of the employees of the hotel to prevent children from entering and playing in rooms which were not assigned to them, it might perhaps be contended that the boy Lacy was acting within the scope of his employment when the accident occurred. The evidence offered as tending to show that he was so acting was properly excluded as shown in the former opinion, and it does not appear that there was any other evidence in the record upon this point.

2. Whether the relation that exists between a keeper of a hotel and his guests makes the former liable for any misconduct of his employees by which his guests are injured while they are in the hotel and are in his care is a more difficult question. It is admitted that common carriers under such circumstances are liable. It is said that the reason for this is that the passenger places himself in the care of the employees of the carrier, and is continually in their care, so that whatever they do while the passenger is being transported is within the scope of their employment. The hotel keeper is also bound to bestow reasonable care for the safety and comfort of his guests. He is not an insurer of his guests; but neither is the carrier an insurer of his passengers. The carrier, of course, is bound to use extraordinary care—as is sometimes said, the utmost care—for the safety of his passengers. The business engaged in is a dangerous one, and the care should be in proportion to the danger that exists. In this respect there is a difference between the two situations, but both perform public duties, and are bound to serve any individual who requires their service and suitably applies for it. The hotel keeper offers accommodations for strangers who are not acquainted with his employees and who have no voice in their selection. He undertakes to provide them with suitable accommodations, and with at least a certain degree of care for their comfort and safety. He has some control over their persons and conduct. He must not allow such conduct on their part as will interfere with the reasonable hospitality which he owes to other guests. It may be that the carrier has greater control over the persons and conduct of passengers, but this idea seems to be exaggerated in some of the opinions. In what sense does the porter of a sleeping car have charge of the occupants of the car and have control of their conduct and behavior? Surely, if it is different in degree from the control that the hotel keeper has over his guests, it is not much different in kind. The hotel keeper is under obligation to protect his guests from danger when it is reasonably within his power to do so, and is under obligation to select such employees as will look after the safety and comfort of his guests, and will not commit acts of violence against them, so far as is reasonably within his power. It would seem that to relieve him from liability for injuries done to his guests by his employee upon the sole ground that the employee was not then in the active discharge of some specific duty in connection with his employment, and hold the carrier responsible under similar conditions, is making a fine distinction. The liability of a common carrier under such circumstances is a doctrine of modern growth. There does not appear to be reason for establishing such doctrine that would not equally apply under modern conditions to the relations between an innkeeper and his guests.

Notwithstanding the great respect due to the court which has reached a contrary conclusion in Clancy v. Barker, post, 653, we conclude that our former decision ought to be adhered to.

Barnes, J., dissenting:

In this case I find myself unable to concur in the majority opinion, which adheres to our former decision. While I concurred in that decision when it was rendered, on a re-examination of the question, as presented on the rehearing, I am convinced that the defendant should not be held liable. The facts which are the basis of the plaintiff's cause of action briefly stated, are as follows: The plaintiff, Michael F. Clancy, and his wife, with their infant son, Freeman, who was about six years old, were stopping at the Barker hotel, in the city of Omaha, and had been guests at the hotel for several days prior to the accident complained of. About 8:30 o'clock of the evening of January 15, 1902, Freeman left his mother's room and went down the elevator to the first floor of the hotel, as he says, "to get some ice water." Reaching that floor, he passed by a room where a boy of the name of Lacy, who was employed as a porter or bell boy at the hotel, was playing a harmonica; the door being ajar, he entered this room, apparently to satisfy his childish curiosity; another boy who sometimes ran the elevator, was also in the room; both of these employees seem to have been off duty at the time, and engaged in amusing themselves in a room not occupied by any of the guests of the house. As the Clancy boy entered the room young Lacy said to him (apparently in jest): "See here, young fellow, if you touch anything, this is what you get" (at the same time pointing a pistol at him). The pistol was at that instant accidentally discharged, the ball striking the boy Freeman in the head, destroying one of his eyes, and inflicting other injuries upon him, which, however, did not prove fatal, and this action was brought by the father to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by him by reason of these facts.

The prevailing opinion does not place the right of recovery in this case on the ground of negligence or tort, for no negligence on the part of the defendant is alleged or proved, but bases such right solely on an alleged breach of the implied contract of an innkeeper that his guest shall be treated with due consideration for his comfort and safety, and so holds the proprietors of the hotel liable to both the father and his infant son for the damages sustained by them.

It must be conceded that until recent years the whole trend of authority supported and adhered to the common-law rule that an innkeeper is not an insurer of the safety of his guest against injury, and that his obligation is limited to the exercise of reasonable care for the safety, comfort, and entertainment of his visitor. Caly's Case, 8 Coke, 32a; Sandys v. Florence, 47 L. J. C. P. N. S. 598; Weeks v. McNulty, 101 Tenn. 499, 43 L. R. A. 185, 70 Am. St. Rep. 693, 48 S. W. 809; Curtis v. Dinneen, 4 Dak. 245, 30 N. W. 148; Sheffer v. Willoughby, 163 Ill. 518, 34 L. R. A. 464, 54 Am. St. Rep. 483, 45 N. E. 253; Gilbert v. Hoffman, 66 Iowa, 206, 55 Am. Rep. 263, 23 N. W. 632;

Overstreet v. Moser, 88 Mo. App. 72; Stanley v. Bircher, 78 Mo. 245; Stott v. Churchill, 15 Misc. 80, 36 N. Y. Supp. 477; Sneed v. Moorehead, 70 Miss. 690, 13 So. 235. It is claimed, however, that the more recent cases have changed the rule, and, to support this view, we are referred in the original opinion to Rommel v. Schambacher, 120 Pa. 579, 6 Am. St. Rep. 732, 11 Atl. 779. In that case it appears that on the evening of the 9th of August, 1884, the plaintiff, William Rommel, a minor, entered the tavern of Jacob Schambacher, and there found one Edward Flannagan; they both became intoxicated on the liquor furnished them by Schambacher. While the plaintiff was standing outside of the bar engaged in conversation with the defendant, Flannagan pinned a piece of paper to his back and set it on fire. The consequence was that Rommel's clothes were soon in flames and before they could be extinguished he was badly injured. On those facts it was held that the "proprietor of a saloon is liable for injuries sustained by one who enters therein and becomes intoxicated, by reason of another who also became intoxicated there, and who, in full view of the proprietor, attached a piece of paper to the former and set it on fire." The sole ground of holding the proprietor liable was that he furnished the liquor which caused the intoxication of the two men, and allowed one of them, in his presence, to attach the paper to the other and set it on fire, when he could, and should, have prevented it. So it will be seen that there is nothing in the facts of that case, or in the matter actually decided, which supports the prevailing opinion.

Our attention is also called to the case of Jencks v. Coleman, 2 Sumn. 221, Fed. Cas. No. 7,253, in which Story, J. [Shaw, Ch. J., in Com. v. Power, 7 Met. 601, 41 Am. Dec. 465], said: "An owner of a steamboat, or railroad, in this respect is in a condition somewhat similar to that of an innkeeper whose premises are open to all guests. Yet he is not only empowered, but he is bound, to so regulate his house, as well with regard to the peace and comfort of his guests, who there seek repose, as to the peace and quiet of the vicinity, as to repress and prohibit all disorderly conduct therein; and, of course, he has a right, and is bound, to exclude from his premises all disorderly persons, and all persons not conforming to regulations necessary and proper to such quiet and good order." This language, it seems to me, comes far short of justifying the conclusion announced by the majority.

that case were that George A. Dickson and others were lessees and managers of the Park theater, in the city of Indianapolis; that Waldron came to the box office of the theater and applied for a 10-cent ticket, giving the ticket seller, one Joseph Gordon, a silver dollar, and receiving from him his ticket and only 70 cents in change; that one John Dickson was in the box office at the time with the ticket seller, and was in charge of, and conducting, the theater for and on behalf of the lessees. Waldron demanded of the ticket seller the right change; an altercation ensued, and the janitor of the theater, who was also a special policeman, was ordered by Dickson, who had reached through the window and grabbed Waldron and slapped him in the face, to arrest Waldron for a "vag." The janitor thereupon struck Waldron, knocked him down, and beat him severely; someone interfered, and the janitor withdrew; then Gordon came out of the ticket office, and, in the presence of the manager, assaulted Waldron, and beat him shamefully; that thereafter the janitor arrested Waldron and took him to the police station. On these facts it was held, as in Rommel v. Schambacher, 120 Pa. 579, 6 Am. St. Rep. 732, 11 Atl. 779, that the proprietor of the theater was liable for the injuries sustained by Waldron.

In the foregoing cases, and in some others, the courts have made use of the expression: "The liability of an innkeeper is like that of a common carrier." But it is nowhere held that the kind and extent of the liability of the innkeeper is the same as that of a common carrier. All of the other cases referred to are actions where common carriers were sued for injuries to passengers while being transported.

Our attention was also called, on the rehearing, to the case of Curran v. Olson, 88 Minn. 307, 60 L. R. A. 733, 97 Am. St. Rep. 517, 92 N. W. 1124, as sustaining plaintiff's contention. That was a case where a patron of a saloon fell asleep in his chair, and a third person poured alcohol, which was furnished by the bartender in charge of the defendant's business, on the foot of the sleeper, and set it on fire. The saloon keeper was held liable because the tort was committed in the presence and with the assent of his managing agent, when it was the duty and within the power of the agent to have prevented it. So it seems to me that in none of the cases to which our attention has been directed are the facts the same or similar to those in the case at bar, and I am of opinion that none of them fairly support the rule announced by the majority. On the other hand, I believe the great weight of authority to be with the defendants, and that the rule that an innkeeper is not an insurer of the safety of the person of his guest against injuries, and that his contract obligation is limited to the exercise of reasonable care for the safety, comfort, and entertainment of his visitors, should be adhered to. While my associates state that they do not intend to make the innkeeper an insurer of the safety of the guest, it seems clear to me that such is the effect of the prevailing opinion.

The case of Clancy v. Barker, post, 653, 66 C. C. A. 469, 131 Fed. 161, which was an action for the infant, Freeman Clancy, by the plaintiff herein, as his next friend, to recover for his injuries occasioned by the accident which is the basis of this action, is commented on by the majority, and I take this occasion to review it. It was there held by the United States circuit court of appeals that the defendants were not liable. The plaintiff's contention there was the same as here, and Judge Sanborn, who wrote the prevailing opinion, said: "The crucial question here, therefore, is whether or not an innkeeper is an insurer of the safety of the person of his guest, while the latter remains in his hotel, against the negligent and wilful acts of his servants, when they are acting within the course and without the actual or apparent scope of their employment.

. . . Counsel for the plaintiff insists that the liability of the innkeepers should be extended in the case at bar even beyond that of common carriers; so that the defendants should be held liable for the injuries inflicted by the wilful or careless act of their servant when he was not acting within the course or scope of his employment. The argument in support of this contention is that common carriers are liable for the negligent or wilful acts of their servants to whom they intrust the care, custody, and control of the passengers they transport, and that the liability of innkeepers to their guests is similar to that of carriers to their passengers. There are many reasons, however, why this argument is not persuasive, and why it fails to demonstrate that an innkeeper insures the safety of the persons of his guests against injuries inflicted by his servants when they are not engaged in the discharge of their duties as employees. . . .

There is a marked difference in the character of the contracts of carriage on a railroad or steamboat and of entertainment at an inn, and a wide difference in the relation of the parties to these contracts. In the former, the carrier takes and the passenger surrenders to him the control and dominion of his person, and the chief, nay, practically the only, occupation of both parties is the performance of the contract of carriage. For the time being all other occupations are subordinate to the transportation. The carrier regulates the movements of the passenger, assigns him his seat or berth, and determines when, how, and where he shall ride, eat, and sleep while the passenger submits to the rules regulations, and directions of the carrier, and is transported in the manner the latter directs. The contract is that the passenger will surrender the direction and dominion of his person to the servants of the carrier, to be transported in the car, seat, or berth, and in the manner in which they direct, and that the latter will take charge of and transport the person of the passenger safely. The logical and necessary result of this relation of the parties is that every servant of the carrier who is employed in assisting to transport the passenger safely, every conductor, brakeman, and porter who is employed to assist in the transportation, is constantly acting within the scope and course of his employment while he is upon the train or boat, because he is one of those selected by his master and placed in charge of the person of the passenger to safely transport him to his destination. Any negligent or wilful act of such a servant which inflicts injury upon the passenger is necessarily a breach of the master's contract of safe carriage, and for it the latter must respond. But the contract of an innkeeper with his guest, and their relations to each other, are not of this character. The innkeeper does not take, nor does the guest surrender, the control or dominion of the latter's person. The performance of the contract of entertainment is not the chief occupation of the parties, but is subordinate to the ordinary business or pleasure of the guest. The innkeeper assigns a room to his guest, but neither he nor his servants direct him when or how he shall occupy it. . . . The agreement is not that the guest shall surrender the control of his person and action to the servants of the innkeeper in order that he may be protected from injury and entertained. It is that the guest may retain the direction of his own action, that he may enjoy the entertainment offered, and that the innkeeper will exercise ordinary care to provide for his comfort and safety.

. . . The natural and logical result of this relation of the parties is that when the [innkeeper's] servants are not engaged in the course or scope of their employment, although they may be present in the hotel, they are not performing the master's contract, and he is not liable for their negligent or wilful acts."

An examination of the cases involving the liability of common carriers, of owners of palace cars, of steamboats, and of theaters, cited in the prevailing opinion, discloses that the defendants' servants in every case were acting within the course or scope of their employment, and none of them hold the defendants liable for the wilful or negligent acts of their employees beyond that scope. I am much impressed with the prevailing opinion of Judge Sanborn. The reasoning employed by him appears to be sound, and is supported by the great weight of authority in both England and in this country; and, while I do not consider myself bound by that opinion, yet it seems to me to announce the better rule. I regret that different courts should arrive at different and inconsistent conclusions from the same facts, and practically in the same case.

Again, the supreme court of Dakota, in Curtis v. Dinneen, 4 Dak. 245, 30 N. W. 148, directly decided a similar question to the one presented in this case in accordance with the general rule, and in favor of the innkeeper. In that case the plaintiff, while a guest at the defendant's hotel, was assaulted by the defendant's husband, who was employed in and about the house, but not in the course of his employment. The court said: "It is doubtless good legal doctrine that a master is liable to answer in a civil action for the tortious or wrongful act of his servant, if done in the course of his employment in his master's service, even though the master did not know of or authorize such act, or may have disapproved of or forbidden it. The act must be done in the execution of the authority given by the master and in pursuit of the master's business, and must be within the scope of the servant's employment, or, unless it be ratified by the master, he (the master) will not be liable therefor." And so it was held that an innkeeper is not liable for assault and battery committed on a guest by one of his servants, where the assault was not within the line of the servant's duty, and was not advised or countenanced by the master.

In a still later case, Rahmel v. Lehndorff, 142 Cal. 681, 65 L. R. A. 88, 100 Am. St. Rep. 154, 76 Pac. 659, the supreme court of California, in a well-considered opinion, held: "An assault by a waiter in a hotel on a guest is not within the scope of the waiter's employment, or within the real or supposed scope of his duties, so as to render the innkeeper liable for the tort. An innkeeper is not bound to protect his guests from acts of violence of his servants, in the absence of negligence in employing a violent or disorderly person."

To my mind, there are many other reasons why the contractual liability of innkeepers to their guests should not be held to be co-extensive with and the same as that of common carriers to their passengers. The agencies employed by common carriers to transport their passengers are extremely hazardous, and are not in any manner under the control of the passenger himself. They are used and controlled wholly by the servants of the carrier in transporting the passenger to his place of destination. During every moment of his journey he is in charge and under the control of the employees of the carrier, and so the carrier is held liable for the lightest negligence; while one who is the guest of the modern hotel or inn has the utmost freedom of movement; there is no danger or hazard connected with the business, and when a room is assigned to the guest it is his own to occupy or not, as he pleases; it is his domicile from which he may exclude all intruders; and when, as in many cases, the guest lives constantly at the hotel, it is his home, from which he may depart, and to which he may return, at any time, and at all hours of both day and night. Again, there are at all times other guests of the house with whom he necessarily is thrown in contact, and from whom he may possibly receive an injury; and it is believed that our former opinion goes to the extent of holding the proprietor of the hotel liable for such injuries without any negligence on his part. The modern hotel is, to a certain extent, a public place. Anyone may enter it for any lawful purpose without the consent of the proprietor, and leave it without let or hindrance; and yet the effect of the prevailing opinion is that, for any injury inflicted by such a person to a guest of the house, the innkeeper would be liable, even if he had no reason to expect it, and could not in any way have prevented it. It seems clear to my mind that an ordinary nonhazardous and useful occupation should not be required to bear such an extraordinary burden.

Again, the thought intrudes itself that the person injured in this case was an infant of such tender years that the defendants had the right to expect that its parents, who in reality were their guests, would prevent him from entering the rooms of the servants or other guests, or getting into place of danger; in other words, from roaming about the hotel at will and untended. It can hardly be said that the proprietors, knowing that the child was with his mother and under her immediate care and control, impliedly contracted to relieve her of that duty, assume it themselves, and insure him against injury while in their hotel.

After mature reflection and a careful examination of the authorities, I am of opinion that the defendants should not be held liable for the injury complained of. For the foregoing reasons, it seems clear to me that our former opinion should be vacated, and the judgment of the district court should be affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Freeman CLANCY, by Catherine Clancy, His Next Friend, Plff. in Err.,
v.

(66 C. C. A. 469, 131 Fed. 161.)

- *1. Innkeepers are not insurers of the safety of the persons of their guests. The limit of their liability is for the exercise of reasonable care for the safety, comfort, and entertainment of their visitors.
2. Innkeepers do not contract to insure the safety of their guests against injuries which are inflicted upon them by the negligent or wilful acts of their servants beyond the scope and course of their employment, and for such acts they are not liable in damages when they have exercised reasonable care to prevent them.
3. A boy about six years of age, a guest of the defendants at their hotel, wandered out of the room assigned to him, and into a room in which a bell boy or porter of the defendants was engaged in playing a harmonica for his own amusement, and the latter accidentally or wilfully shot the former with a pistol. Held, the bell boy was not acting within the course, or within the apparent or actual scope, of his employment at the time of the shooting, and the innkeepers were not liable for the injury he inflicted.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendants were alleged to be responsible. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Argued before Sanborn, Thayer, and Hook, Circuit Judges.

Mr. John O. Yelzer for plaintiff in error.

Mr. William A. Redick for defendants in error.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was determined in the lower court on a demurrer to the evidence; the trial court holding, on the conclusion of the plaintiff's testimony, that there was no substantial evidence warranting a recovery. It accordingly directed a verdict in favor of the defendants. This action was taken on testimony which tended to establish, and did establish, the following facts:

Freeman Clancy, in whose behalf the action is brought, at the time of the accident hereafter described, was about six years old, and was stopping with his parents at the Barker hotel, in the city of Omaha, Nebraska; the father, mother, and son having been guests at the hotel for a few days prior to the accident. During the evening of January 15, 1902, about 8:30 P. M., he went down the elevator from one of the upper floors, where the room occupied by his parents was located, to the ground floor of the hotel for the purpose, as he says, of getting some ice water. Reaching the ground floor, he passed by a room where someone was playing a harmonica. The door being ajar, he entered this room, actuated, apparently, by no other motive than childish curiosity, and found a boy, who was employed about the hotel either as a bell boy or porter, engaged in playing the instrument. Another boy who ran the hotel elevator was also in the room. Both of these employees of the hotel seem to have been off duty at the time, and engaged in amusing themselves in a room that was not occupied by guests. As the boy Clancy entered the room, the boy who was playing the harmonica said to him, evidently in jest, "See here, young fellow; if you touch anything, here is what you will get," at the same time pointing a pistol at him. The pistol was accidentally discharged, the ball striking the boy in the head, fracturing "the frontal ethmoid and sphenoid bones of the head," and destroying one of his eyes. The ball also passed through the boy's thumb, but the injury did not prove fatal.

One paragraph of the complaint, on which the case was tried, alleged: "That on or about the 12th day of January, 1902, the said father and mother of the plaintiff entered the said hotel of defendant with their said infant child, the plaintiff, as guests of the defendant, for a temporary rest in said city at said hotel, and were received by the said defendants as the guests of the said innkeepers or hotel keepers; the defendants thereby contracting with the said father for and on behalf of said plaintiff, and with the plaintiff by implication of law, for his personal safety, kind treatment, and for all of the usual hospitalities, covenants, and agreements, and obligations due from an innkeeper and hotel keeper to his guests."

Another paragraph of the complaint alleged, in substance, that it was the duty of the bell boy or porter, through whose acts as aforesaid the injury was sustained, "to direct the guests of said hotel about said hotel, and to wait on, watch over, and protect said guests and their property and the property of the said hotel, and such other duties as are usually required by porters by innkeepers or hotel keepers, and imposed by law."

Another paragraph of the complaint alleged that said bell boy or porter, being a servant of the defendants and of said hotel, in that capacity, by the acts heretofore described, "violated all obligations of hospitality and patience due from said defendants, through said servants, to said infant guest, and the defendants thereby violated their agreement, duty, and obligation of law with and to the plaintiff."

On this state of facts and pleading, counsel for the plaintiff in error asserts a right of recovery against the defendants on two grounds: First, he contends that by receiving the boy and his parents as guests at the hotel the proprietors of the hotel undertook, like a common carrier of passengers, to protect him against injuries occasioned by the negligence or wilful misconduct of their employees in and about the hotel, and that this contractual obligation of the defendants was violated. In the second place, counsel contends that when Lacey, the porter, pointed the pistol at the boy, he was guilty of a wrongful and negligent act; that he was engaged at the time in the performance of one of his duties as servant; and that on this ground the defendants are liable. It is argued that it was a part of Lacey's duty as a servant, when the child entered the room where he was playing the harmonica, to see that he did not disturb or handle any articles in the room; that a jury might well infer that the act which occasioned the injury was done by Lacey in the performance of this duty; and that the ordinary rule, respondet superior, applies to the case.

We entertain no doubt that the act in question was in fact wrongful and negligent, but the difficulty which we encounter in upholding this latter theory is that the evidence fails to show that Lacey had been charged with the duty of guarding such articles as may have been in the room where the accident occurred, or that the room contained any articles which the child could have injured or carried away, or that he had made any movement in that direction. All this is mere surmise, which will not suffice to sustain a verdict. So far as the evidence warrants an inference, the inference is that Lacey was not engaged at the time in the discharge of any duty for and in behalf of the defendants; that he was temporarily, at least, off duty, engaged in amusing himself; and that he pointed the pistol at the child in sport, to see how he would act, rather than to prevent him from touching or intermeddling with anything in the room. The act in question seems to have been prompted by a momentary impulse, and to have been done by Lacey for his own amusement, and to have been in no wise connected with the discharge of any duty, or with the performance of any task, that had been devolved upon him by the defendants. Under these circumstances, we are of opinion that the proprietors of the hotel cannot be held accountable for the act in question on the second ground above stated, since it is too well settled to require the citation of any authority that the master is not responsible ordinarily for the negligent acts of his servant, unless they are committed while the servant is rendering some service for and in behalf of the master.

But counsel for the plaintiff insists that, although the defendants were not negligent in the employment of their servant, the bell boy, and although he was not acting in the course or within the actual or apparent scope of his employment when he discharged the pistol, yet the defendants are liable for the injury he inflicted, because it is a part of the contract between an innkeeper and his guest that the former will insure the safety of the person of the latter against injury from every act or omission of his servants. The crucial question here, therefore, is whether or not an innkeeper is an insurer of the safety of the person of his guest while the latter remains in his hotel against the negligent and wilful acts of his servants, when they are acting without the course and without the actual or apparent scope of their employment.

An affirmative answer to this question would be in conflict with the decisions of the courts rendered prior to the time when the contract herein was made, and to our understanding of the law upon this subject as it then existed. The general rule of law governing the liability of innkeepers when these defendants made their agreement with the plaintiff—the rule which had received the approval of every court which had ever decided the question, so far as we have been able to discover—was that an innkeeper was not an insurer of the safety of the person of his guest against injury, but that his obligation was limited to the exercise of reasonable care for the safety, comfort, and entertainment of his visitor. Calye's Case, 8 Coke, 32a, 33b; Sandys v. Florence, 47 L. J. C. P. N. S. 598; Weeks v. McNulty, 101 Tenn. 499, 43

L. R. A. 185, 70 Am. St. Rep. 693, 48 S. W. 809; Curtis v. Dinneen, 4 Dak. 245, 30 N. W. 148, 153; Sheffer v. Willoughby, 163 Ill. 518, 521, 522, 34 L. R. A. 464, 54 Am. St. Rep. 483, 45 N. E. 253; Gilbert v. Hoffman, 66 Iowa, 206, 55 Am. Rep. 263, 23 N. W. 632; Overstreet v. Moser, 78 Mo. App. 72, 75; Stanley v. Bircher, 88 Mo. 245, 248; Stott v. Churchill, 15 Misc. 80, 36 N. Y. Supp. 476, 477; Sneed v. Moorehead, 70 Miss. 690, 13 So. 235.

In another class of cases, those involving the liability of common carriers and of the operators of palace cars to their passengers, this measure of liability has in later years been extended to include responsibility for the wilful and negligent acts of those to whom the carriers intrust the transportation of their passengers, such as brakemen, porters, and conductors, upon the ground that these servants, when upon the trains or steamboats, are engaged in the course or scope of their employment to conduct the safe transportation of the passengers, whatever they may be doing. The reasons for this extension of liability are well stated in Bass v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Wis. 450, at page 463, 17 Am. Rep. 495, and in Mallach v. Ridley, 24 Abb. N. C. 181, 9 N. Y. Supp. 922.

In the former case the court said: "These officers [the conductors and other servants in charge of the train] may be guilty of acts of arbitrary oppression, beyond endurance, towards passengers, which might warrant resistance. But we feel warranted by principle and authority to hold that, in the enforcement of order on the train, and in the execution of reasonable regulations for the safety and comfort of the passengers, and for the security of the train, the authority of these officers, exercised upon the responsibility of the corporations, must be obeyed by passengers, and that forcible resistance cannot be tolerated. They act on the peril of the corporation, and their own. Indeed, as that fictitious entity, the corporation, can act only through natural persons, its officers and servants, and as it of necessity commits its trains absolutely to the charge of officers of its own appointment, and passengers of necessity commit to them their safety and comfort in transitu, under conditions of such peril and subordination, we are disposed to hold that the whole power and authority of the corporation, pro hac vice, is vested in these officers, and that, as to passengers on board, they are to be considered as the corporation itself, and that the consequent authority and responsibility are not generally to be straitened or impaired by any arrangement between the corporation and 69 L. R. A.

the officers; the corporation being responsible for the acts of the officers, in the conduct and government of the train, to the passengers traveling by it, as the officers would be for themselves, if they were themselves the owners of the road and train. We consider this rule essential to public convenience and safety, and sanctioned by great weight of authority."

In the latter case the court declared: "It was long held by the courts that a common carrier was not responsible for a wilful assault by one of its employees upon a passenger. This rule, however, has been abrogated upon the theory that the common carrier invites the passenger to subject himself to the protection and care of the employee of the corporation, and under these circumstances the common carriers should be responsible for all the acts of the subordinates toward the passenger while under his custody and control."

Counsel for the plaintiff insists that the liability of the innkeepers should be extended in the case at bar even beyond that of common carriers, so that the defendants should be held liable for the injuries inflicted by the wilful or careless act of their servant when he was not acting within the course or scope of his employment. The argument in support of this contention is that common carriers are liable for the negligent or wilful acts of their servants to whom they intrust the care, custody, and control of the passengers they transport, and that the liability of innkeepers to their guests is similar to that of carriers to their passengers. There are many reasons, however, why this argument is not persuasive, and why it fails to demonstrate that an innkeeper insures the safety of the persons of his guests against injuries inflicted by his servants when they are not engaged in the discharge of their duties as employees.

While there are many loose statements in the books to the effect that the liability of common carriers to their passengers and the liability of innkeepers to their guests are similar; and while that proposition may be conceded,—it is certain that the limits of these liabilities are by no means the same. A railroad company is liable to its passengers for a failure to exercise the utmost care in the preparation of its road and the operation of its engines and trains upon it, because the swift movement of its passenger trains is always fraught with extraordinary danger, which it requires extraordinary care to avert. But an innkeeper's liability for the condition and operation of his hotel is limited to the failure to exercise ordinary care, because his is an ordinary occupation fraught with no extraordinary danger. Sandys v. Florence, 47 L. J. C. P. N. S. 598, 600. It no more follows, from the similarity of the liability of the carrier to that of the innkeeper, that the latter is liable for the wilful or negligent acts of its servants beyond the scope of their employment, than it does that the latter is liable for a failure to exercise the highest possible care to make his hotel and its operation safe for its guests, because the carrier must exercise that degree of care in the management of its railroad, engines, and trains.

Again, there is a marked difference in the character of the contracts of carriage on a railroad or steamboat and of entertainment at an inn, and a wide difference in the relations of the parties to these contracts. In the former, the carrier takes and the passenger surrenders to him the control and dominion of his person, and the chief, nay, practically the only, occupation of both parties is the performance of the contract of carriage. For the time being all other occupations are subordinate to the transportation. The carrier regulates the movements of the passenger, assigns him his seat or berth, and determines when, how, and where he shall ride, eat, and sleep, while the passenger submits to the rules, regulations, and directions of the carrier, and is transported in the manner the latter directs. The contract is that the passenger will surrender the direction and dominion of his person to the servants of the carrier, to be transported in the car, seat, or berth and in the manner in which they direct, and that the latter will take charge of and transport the person of the passenger safely. The logical and necessary result of this relation of the parties is that every servant of the carrier who is employed in assisting to transport the passenger safely, every conductor, brakeman, and porter who is employed to assist in the transportation, is constantly acting within the scope and course of his employment while he is upon the train or boat, because he is one of those selected by his master and placed in charge of the person of the passenger to safely transport him to his destination. Any negligent or wilful act of such servant which inflicts injury upon the passenger is necessarily a breach of the master's contract of safe carriage, and for it the latter must respond. But the contract of an innkeeper with his guest, and their relations to each other, are not of this character. The innkeeper does not take, nor does the guest surrender, the control or dominion of the latter's person. The performance of the contract of entertainment is not the chief occupation of the parties, but it is subordinate to the ordinary business or pleasure of the guest. The innkeeper assigns a room to his guest, but neither he nor his servants direct him when or how he shall occupy it; but they leave him free to use or to fail to use it, and all the other means of entertainment proffered, when and as he chooses, and to retain the uncontrolled dominion of his person and of his movements. The agreement is not that the guest shall surrender the control of his person and action to the servants of the innkeeper, in order that he may be protected from injury and entertained. It is that the guest may retain the direction of his own action, that he may enjoy the entertainment offered, and that the innkeeper will exercise ordinary care to provide for his comfort and safety. The servants of the innkeeper are not placed in charge of the person of the guest, to direct, guide, and control his location and action, nor are they employed to perform any contract to insure his safety; but they are engaged in the execution of the agreement of the master to exercise ordinary care for the comfort and safety of the visitor. The natural and logical result of this relation of the parties is that when the servants are not engaged in the course or scope of their employment, although they may be present in the hotel, they are not performing their master's contract, and he is not liable for their negligent or wilful acts.

Moreover, the authorities in the cases involving the liability of common carriers, of owners of palace cars, of steamboats, and of theaters, upon which counsel for the plaintiff seems to rely, when carefully examined, are found to be cases in which the servants were acting within the course or scope of their employment, and they do not rest upon the proposition that the defendants in those cases were liable for the wilful or negligent acts of their employees beyond that scope.

In Duinelle v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 120 N. Y. 117, 126, 127, 8 L. R. A. 224, 17 Am. St. Rep. 611, 24 N. E. 319, the porter of a sleeping car, who had taken up the ticket of a passenger, was held to be acting within the scope of his employment when he struck the passenger during an altercation between them relative to the return of the ticket.

In Stewart v. Brooklyn & O. T. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 588, 591, 43 Am. Rep. 185, the court declared the limit of the company's liability to be "to protect the passenger against any injury arising from the negligence or wilful misconduct of its servants while engaged in performing a duty which the carrier owes to the passenger," and held that a driver of a street car, who was also the conductor, and who beat a passenger in the car, was within the scope of his employment to carry the passenger safely when he committed the assault.

In Goddard v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 57 Me. 202, 203, 2 Am. Rep. 39, a brakeman, who had authority to collect tickets, and who, after collecting one from a passenger, demanded another of him, and grossly insulted him because he declined to pay for his passage again, was held to have been acting within the scope of his employment, and the company was charged with the damages he inflicted.

So in Craker v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Wis. 657, 673, 17 Am. Rep. 504, a conductor who kissed a passenger; in Pendleton v. Kinsley, 3 Cliff. 416, 427, 428, Fed. Cas. No. 10,922, the clerk of a steamer who assaulted a passenger while trying to collect his fare; in Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Fleznan, 103 Ill. 546, 42 Am. Rep. 33, a brakeman who struck a passenger because during a search for a lost watch he said he thought the brakeman had it; in Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Jackson, 81 Ind. 19, 22, a conductor or brakeman who drenched a passenger with water; in Campbell v. Pullman Palace Car Co. 42 Fed. 485, a porter of a sleeping car who made indecent proposals to a passenger; in Williams v. Pullman Palace Car Co. 40 La. Ann. 421, 8 Am. St. Rep. 538, 4 So. 85, a porter of a Pullman car who assaulted a passenger; and in Dickson v. Waldron, 135 Ind. 507, 24 L. R. A. 483, 41 Am. St. Rep. 440, 34 N. E. 506, 35 N. E. 1, the ticket taker and special policeman of a theater, who, in endeavoring to sell the tickets to a customer, assaulted him,—were all held to be, and undoubtedly were, acting within the scope of their various employments when they inflicted the injuries for which the defendants were made to pay.

When all these authorities, and others cited by counsel for the plaintiff, are carefully considered, it clearly appears that the controlling reasons why common carriers have been held liable for the wilful or negligent acts of their servants in these cases are (1) that they owe to their passengers the highest degree of care, and (2) that during the transportation they intrust the entire care, custody, and control of their trains, steamboats, and passengers to these servants, and the passengers yield obedience and control of their movements to these servants, under conditions of peril and subordination in which the passengers are confined and helpless, and the servants in charge of the train are practically the vice principals of the defendants. Bass v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Wis. 450, 463, 17 Am. Rep. 495. There are no such reasons for the existence of the liability of innkeepers for the wilful or negligent acts of their servants beyond the scope of their employment, and the argument of counsel in support of such an extension by analogy with the liability of common carriers fails (1) because innkeepers are not liable to their guests for extraordinary care, while carriers are liable to their passengers for the highest degree of care; (2) because innkeepers do not intrust to their servants the absolute control and dominion of their hotels and of the persons of their guests, nor do the latter surrender themselves to the dominion and direction of such servants; and (3) because the wilful and negligent acts of their servants, for which carriers have been held liable, were committed in the discharge of the duties which they were employed to perform, while those of the servants of innkeepers, now under consideration, were done outside the actual and the apparent scope of their employment.

In addition to the argument by analogy which we have been considering, our attention is called to the remarks of Chief Justice Shaw in Com. v. Power, 7 Met. 596, 601, 41 Am. Dec. 465, a case in which the question was whether a railroad company had the right to exclude a disorderly person from its railroad station, and Chief Justice Shaw, in discussing that question, said: "An owner of a steamboat or railroad, in this respect, is in a condition somewhat similar to that of an innkeeper, whose premises are open to all guests. Yet he is not only empowered, but he is bound, so to regulate his house, as well with regard to the peace and comfort of his guests, who there seek repose, as to the peace and quiet of the vicinity, as to repress and prohibit all disorderly conduct therein; and, of course, he has a right, and is bound, to exclude from his premises all disorderly persons, and all persons not conforming to regulations necessary and proper to secure such quiet and good order."

It is also called to the opinion of Judge Story, of the same tenor, in Jencks v. Coleman, 2 Sumn. 221, Fed. Cas. No. 7,258, a case which involved a similar question, to wit, the right of the owner of a steamboat to exclude a disorderly person therefrom; to the decision of the supreme court in Rommel v. Schambacher, 120 Pa. 579, 6 Am. St. Rep. 732, 11 Atl. 779, that an innkeeper who furnished liquor to make a man drunk, and then with gross carelessness permitted him to attach a paper to the back of one of his customers and to set it on fire in his plain sight, was liable for the injury; and to the opinions of various courts in cases in which the liability of innkeepers for the loss or destruction of the property of their guests was in question. These cases have been examined, but neither the decisions of the questions there presented, nor the opinions of the courts concerning them, are either decisive or persuasive in the consideration and determination of the question here under consideration, whether or not an innkeeper is an insurer of the safety of the person of his guest against the wilful or negligent acts of his servants beyond the scope of their employment, because that question was not considered or determined, and clearly was not in the minds of the judges who rendered the decisions and opinions to which reference has been made. This is also true of all the cases, opinions, and expressions which have been cited by counsel for the plaintiff. To them all the declaration of Chief Justice Marshall in Oaken v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. 264, 399, 5 L. ed. 257, 290, applies in all its force: "It is a maxim not to be disregarded that general expressions in every opinion are to be taken in connection with the case in which those expressions are used. If they go beyond the case, they may be respected, but ought not to control the judgment in a subsequent suit, when the very point is presented for decision."

Finally, counsel for plaintiff presents for our consideration the opinion of the supreme court of Nebraska, rendered since the case in hand was argued and submitted to this court, in an action brought by the father of the plaintiff in this action for the damages which he suffered from the very accident here involved, and in which that court has held that the innkeepers were liable for the act of the bell boy which inflicted the injury, although he was then acting beyond the course and scope of his employment. Clancy v. Barker, ante, 642, 98 N. W. 440. This opinion is entitled to, and it has received, great respect and grave consideration. But, after all, the question here is, not what the supreme court of Nebraska has made the law and the contract of innkeepers since the parties to this action made their agreement, but what that law was, and what the contract between these parties was, when their minds met upon the terms of their agreement. At that time no court had ever held, so far as our research and the authorities cited by counsel have disclosed the decisions, that the contract of an innkeeper was to insure the safety of the person of his guest against the negligent or wilful acts of his servants without the scope of their employment. The pregnant fact that no case can be found in the entire field of English and American jurisprudence in which an innkeeper was ever held to be an insurer of the safety of his guest, or to be liable for the wilful or negligent acts of his servants beyond the scope of their employment, is the most complete demonstration that this was not the law. If it had been, judgments founded upon it would not have been lacking. Every court that had ever decided the question had declared that the liability of the innkeeper was limited to the exercise of reasonable care, that it did not extend to a guaranty of safety, and hence that it extended only to the acts of his servants within the scope of their employment. This was declared to be the general rule of law in the digests and in the textbooks. 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 546, 547, note 6.

In Calve's Case, 8 Coke, 32a, 33b, the court declared that, "if the guest be beaten in the inn, the innkeeper shall not answer for it."

In Sandys v. Florence, 47 L. J. C. P. N. S. 598, 600, a case in which a ceiling fell upon a guest in a hotel, Mr. Justice Lindley said: "I pass over the previous allegation that it was the defendant's duty 'to keep the said hotel in a secure and proper condition, so as to be safe for persons using the same as guests,' because I think that duty is too widely alleged, and that the defendant's duty is not to insure his guests, but to see only that they do not suffer from want of reasonable and proper care on his part."

In Weeks v. McNulty, 101 Tenn. 496, 499, 43 L. R. A. 185, 70 Am. St. Rep. 693, 48 S. W. 809, an action for damages for the death of a guest in a hotel by fire, the court said: "The general rule of law governing the liability of an innkeeper is that he is not an insurer of the person of his guest against injury, but his obligation is merely to exercise reasonable care that his guests may not be injured by anything happening through the innkeeper's negligence."

In Sheffer v. Willoughby, 163 Ill. 518, 521, 522, 34 L. R. A. 464, 54 Am. St. Rep. 483, 45 N. E. 253, a case in which an attempt was made to apply the rule of absolute liability for the loss of the property of a guest in support of a claim for damages caused by the administration of unwholesome food to his guest by the keeper of a restaurant, the court held that the limit of the latter's liability was for the failure to exercise reasonable care.

In Stanley v. Bircher, 78 Mo. 245, 246, 248, an action was brought by the plaintiff,

Stanley, against the executors of the estate of Bircher for injuries to her person resulting from her fall down an elevator shaft of a hotel operated by Bircher. She alleged that she was a guest at this hotel, that it became his duty, and that he agreed, to furnish safe accommodations for the reasonable wants of the plaintiff, and that he did not perform the duty or keep the agreement, in that the door to the elevator pit was dangerously constructed and negligently left open by Bircher and his servants, so that she walked into it and was injured. A demurrer was interposed to this complaint on the ground that the cause of action did not survive the death of Bircher. Mark that the complainant clearly alleged a breach of a contract to keep the guest safely, as well as a failure to discharge the duty to exercise ordinary care as in the case at bar, and that the question was whether or not the innkeeper's obligation included a contract of safe-keeping. If it did, the cause of action survived, and the action could be maintained; otherwise, it could not be. The supreme court of Missouri held that the obligation of an innkeeper comprised no such contract, that the action could not be changed from an action on the case for a breach of the duty to exercise ordinary care to one for a breach of contract of safe-keeping by an averment or proof of such contract and breach, because no such contract arose out of the relation of innkeeper and guest. That court said: "But it is claimed by counsel for plaintiff that the action is for the breach of a contract, and that it is not an action on the case for injuries to the person. The allusions in the petition to the formal contract between the plaintiff and the proprietor of the hotel, whereby the plaintiff became a guest in the hotel, cannot change the true character of the action. In setting forth an action of trespass on the case, the pleader often finds it proper, although not absolutely necessary, to mention matters of contract connected with the tort, by way of inducement and explanation. In this case the relation of host and guest, which originated in contract, explains how the defendant's testator came to owe the plaintiff a duty. That duty, however, the law imposes. It is a public duty, which is not defined by the contract. Neither can the proprietor relieve himself from that duty by contract. The action in truth is for a violation of the duty which the law imposes, independent of the contract. Neither the damages nor the scope of the action can be measured or limited by the contract."

And in Curtis v. Dinneen, 4 Dak. 245, 30 N. W. 148, 149, 152, the supreme court of Dakota territory directly decided the very questions presented in this case in accordance with this general rule and in favor of the innkeeper. The complaint in that case alleged, among other things, that "The defendant undertook, for a compensation paid her by the plaintiff, to keep safely and from harm and in a proper manner this plaintiff while she should remain in the defendant's inn or hotel; that while this plaintiff was stopping at the inn or hotel of the defendant this plaintiff was, by the wrongful and spiteful acts of the defendant's servants, greatly injured."

The evidence tended to show that one of the defendant's servants assaulted and inflicted serious injury upon the plaintiff while she was in the hotel as a guest, but the court held that the guest could not recover, because the assault and battery, although committed by the defendant's servant in her hotel, was not inflicted while the servant was acting within the actual or apparent scope of his employment.

The result is that when the defendants made their contract to entertain the plaintiff at their hotel the law was, and in our opinion it still is (Rahmel v. Lehnendorff, 142 Cal. 681, 65 L. R. A. 88, 100 Am. St. Rep. 154, 76 Pac. 659), notwithstanding the late decision of the supreme court of Nebraska to the contrary, that their agreement was to exercise reasonable care for his safety, comfort, and entertainment, and that their agreement did not include an insurance of his person against the wilful or negligent acts of their servants beyond the course of their employment. A change of this law and an extension of the liability of the innkeepers now, after the execution of the contract, so as to make the agreement include such an insurance, is to make a new agreement for the parties after the event, and to impose upon the defendants a liability which they could not foresee and to which they did not assent. A retroactive decision, which makes and applies a new rule of law, and attaches another and unforeseen liability to a contract after its execution, is as vicious as an ex post facto statute.

The judgment below enforced the contract which the parties made in strict accordance with the law which governed it, and it is affirmed.

Thayer, Circuit Judge, dissenting:

The important question in this case is whether an innkeeper is exempt from liability to one of his guests who is injured within the hotel by an act of gross negligence on the part of a servant of the innkeeper, because the servant, at the time he committed the negligent act, was not engaged in rendering any service for his master, but was momentarily off duty and awaiting orders. The majority of the court decide that question in the affirmative, holding, as I understand, that, if the proprietor of a hotel exercises ordinary care in the selection of his servants, he is not responsible to his guests for any of their acts committed, even within the hotel, no matter how rash, negligent, or brutal they may be, nor how seriously a guest may be injured, provided the servant was not at the moment engaged in some work for and in behalf of the master. I am unable to assent to this doctrine.

The relation existing between a carrier and a passenger has on numerous occasions been likened to that existing between an innkeeper and his guest. Thus, in Com. v. Power, 7 Met. 596, 601, 41 Am. Dec. 465, Chief Justice Shaw said: "An owner of a steamboat or railroad in this respect is in a condition somewhat similar to that of an innkeeper whose premises are open to all guests. Yet he is not only empowered, but he is bound, so to regulate his house, as well with regard to the peace and comfort of his guests who there seek repose as to the peace and quiet of the vicinity, as to repress and prohibit all disorderly conduct therein; and, of course, he has a right and is bound to exclude from his premises all disorderly persons and all persons not conforming to regulations necessary and proper to secure such quiet and good order."

This remark was quoted with approval by Ryan, Ch. J., in Bass v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Wis. 450, 459, 17 Am. Rep. 495.

Also in Jencks v. Coleman, 2 Sumn. 221, 226, Fed. Cas. No. 7,258, Mr. Justice Story compared the rights and duties of a carrier with those of an innkeeper, upon the evident assumption that the relation of an innkeeper to his guest was practically like that of a carrier to a passenger.

In Norcross v. Norcross, 53 Me. 163, 169, the supreme court of that state remarked, when considering an innkeeper's liability for the property of his guest, that "innkeepers are under the same liability as common carriers."

And in the case of Dickson v. Waldron, 135 Ind. 507, 24 L. R. A. 483, 41 Am. St. Rep. 440, 34 N. E. 506, 510, 35 N. E. 1, the supreme court of Indiana remarked: "But common carriers, innkeepers, merchants, managers of theaters, and others who invite the public to become their patrons and guests, and thus submit personal safety and comfort to their keeping, owe a more special duty to those who may accept such invitation. Such patrons and guests have a right to ask that they shall be protected from injury while present on 69 L. R. A.

such invitation, and particularly that they shall not suffer wrong from the agents and servants of those who have invited them."

Also in the case of Pinkerton v. Woodward, 33 Cal. 557, 585, 91 Am. Dec. 657, it was held that the liability of innkeepers and of common carriers is founded upon the same considerations of public policy in the one case as in the other.

In the absence of express authority on this point I should be of opinion that an innkeeper is under the same obligation to protect his guests against the wrongful and discourteous acts of his servants, committed within or upon his premises, as a carrier to protect its passengers against like acts of its employees. A guest comes to a hotel on the invitation of the proprietor, and for the latter's profit and advantage, and upon the implied understanding that while on the premises as a guest he shall receive courteous and considerate treatment from the proprietor and all persons who are his servants, or, at least, upon the implied understanding that while beneath his roof the life of the guest shall not be imperiled by the rash, inconsiderate, or wrongful acts of those who are his servants. The general law of hospitality would seem to impose such an obligation upon an innkeeper. He promises suitable entertainment to all his guests, as well as respectful, considerate, and proper treatment on the part of all his servants. If a servant of a hotel, when off duty, should meet a guest outside of the hotel, and not on the premises, and there assault him, it is doubtless true—although the case at bar requires no decision on that point—that the innkeeper could not be charged with responsibility for the servant's conduct; and it is probably true that the innkeeper would not be responsible for an assault committed on one of his guests within the hotel by a stranger, provided he has taken all reasonable precautions to prevent such occurrences by excluding disorderly persons from his premises. But in my opinion the law casts on the innkeeper an obligation to see to it that his guest is not injured, while within the hotel, by the wrongful, inconsiderate, or negligent acts of those who are his servants.

It is said in the opinion of the majority that an innkeeper is not an insurer of the safety of the person of his guest while within the hotel. The same may be said of carriers. They do not insure the personal safety of passengers, but only to exercise a very high degree of care, or, as it is sometimes said, "the utmost care," for their protection. Yet it is now well settled that this duty is so comprehensive that it renders the carrier responsible for injuries inflicted on passengers so long as the relation of carrier and passenger exists, not only by the negligent acts of its servants done while in the performance of some duty, but also by their wilful and wrongful acts, such as assaults committed on passengers or indignities offered to them. The obligation also rests on the carrier to protect its passengers while in transit, not only against the wilful and wrongful acts of its own servants, but so far as practicable from acts of violence committed by strangers and copassengers. It makes no difference, as it seems, what motive may have actuated a servant of the carrier in committing the wrongful act complained of, or whether it was done in conformity with the carrier's orders, or in express violation thereof and on the sole responsibility of the servant; for, if it was done while the relation of carrier and passenger existed, the carrier is responsible, and it cannot defend on the ground that the act of its servant was done without its sanction and at a moment when he was not rendering any special service to the carrier. A different rule obtains, of course, as respects wilful and wrongful acts done by employees to those to whom the carrier at the time owed no other or greater duty of protection than it owed to every other person in the community; but, when the peculiar relation of carrier and passenger exists, the modern rule appears to be that the carrier is under an obligation to see to it that a passenger suffers no harm on account of the wrongful and wilful acts of its servants, and that every practicable precaution is taken to protect him against the wrongful acts of strangers and copassengers. Stewart v. Brooklyn & C. T. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 588, 43 Am. Rep. 185; Dioinelle v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 120 N. Y. 117, 125, 8 L. R. A. 224, 17 Am. St. Rep. 611, 24 N. E. 319; Goddard v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 57 Me. 202, 213, 2 Am. Rep. 39, and cases there cited; Bryant v. Rich, 106 Mass. 188, 8 Am. Rep. 311; Spohn v. Missouri P. R. Co. 87 Mo. 74, 80; Craker v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 38 Wis. 657, 17 Am. Rep. 504; Pendleton v. Kinsley, 3 Cliff. 416, 427, Fed. Cas. No. 10,922; Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Fleaman, 103 Ill. 546, 42 Am. Rep. 33; Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Jackson, 81 Ind. 19.

Now, it is true that a hotel is an immovable structure, and does not run on wheels like a train of cars; but in all other respects the relation existing between an innkeeper and his guest is like that existing between a carrier and passenger, and this fact has always been recognized, as shown by the cases above cited. An innkeeper, like a carrier, is engaged in a quasi public service. When he embarks in the business of keeping a hotel, he is bound to provide entertainment for all travelers who seek a place of rest and refreshment, provided they come to him in a fit condition to be entertained as guests, and are able to pay the customary charges. Unless relieved of the obligation by an express statute, the innkeeper, like the carrier, is an insurer of his guests' baggage against loss occasioned otherwise than by an act of God or the public enemy. 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 528, and cases there cited. Besides, an innkeeper is vested with the same power of control over his premises which the carrier exercises over such means of public conveyance as he provides. An innkeeper has the right to exclude from his premises all disorderly persons, and to suppress all disturbances therein that tend to disturb his guests or imperil their safety, and, according to the decision of Chief Justice Shaw in the case above cited (7 Met. 596, 601), it is his common-law duty to exercise this power. Aside from these considerations, the innkeeper, like the carrier, has the exclusive right to select all of the persons who are to aid him in the discharge of his quasi public functions. I have been unable, therefore, to discover any sufficient reason why he should not be held responsible to his guests for the consequences of any wilful and wrongful acts of his servants, committed within the hotel, to the same extent that the carrier is responsible to his passengers for like wrongful acts of its servants; and within the authorities above cited a carrier would be clearly responsible to one of its passengers for an injury inflicted by one of its employees under such circumstances as those disclosed in the present case.

Relative to the authorities cited in the majority opinion and not already referred to, this may be said: Calye's Case, 8 Coke, 32a, 33b, contains the single detached statement that, "if the guest be beaten in the inn, the innkeeper shall not answer for it." But it does not say by whom beaten, whether by a servant of the innkeeper or by a stranger. This, however, is a very old case, decided in 1584, and the statement quoted is purely dictum since the case involved no question respecting the liability of an innkeeper for an assault committed upon a guest within the hotel. Moreover, as the learned editor of the American & English Encyclopædia of Law remarks, in substance (vide vol. 16, 2d ed. p. 545), it may well be doubted whether the statement above quoted would be accepted at the present day as authority for the doctrine which it enunciates, since the modern authorities are opposed to the view that an innkeeper cannot be held responsible for an assault committed upon one of his guests within the hotel by a servant, or even by a stranger when the innkeeper has not taken proper care to exclude disorderly persons from his premises.

Curtis v. Dinneen, 4 Dak. 245, 30 N. W. 148, was a case in which a guest of a hotel kept by a married woman sought to hold her responsible for an assault and battery committed by her husband without her consent or ratification. The husband was living with the wife in the hotel, as he had a right to do, and was assisting her to operate it, so that the case was embarrassed by the existence of the marital relation; the court holding that under the circumstances the wife could not be held responsible for the tort of the husband.

The other cases that are referred to are without exception cases where it was sought to hold the innkeeper responsible for some defect in the hotel premises, and in one of them (Sandys v. Florence, 47 L. J. C. P. N. S. 598, 600) it was remarked, arguendo, in discussing a demurrer to the complaint, that an innkeeper's duty "is not to insure his guests, but to see only that they did not suffer from want of reasonable and proper care on his part." None of the cases, however, discuss the particular question which is presented in the case at bar, whether an innkeeper is liable to his guest for the reckless conduct of one of his servants committed upon the hotel premises, whereby the life of the guest is jeopardized. In my judgment an innkeeper ought to be held liable for an act of that nature, and as respects that question I concur in the view which was expressed by the supreme court of Nebraska in Clancy v. Barker, ante, 642, 98 N. W. 440, that was decided upon the same state of facts which this record discloses.

I think the judgment below should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

John H. SAWYER.

(.....Tenn.....)

The duty to sound warnings when trains approach a trestle over a highway depends upon the dangerous character of the place, which is a question for the determination of the jury.

(March 25, 1905.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Williamson County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John Bell Kuhle, C. E. Berry, and Henderson & Henderson for appellant.

Messrs. Hearn, McCorkle, & Lane for appellee.

McAllister, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in error, Sawyer, recovered

NOTE.—As to duty to give signal when trains approach a trestle over highway, see also, in this series, Rupard v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 7 L. R. A. 316.

a verdict and judgment against the company for the sum of $1,300 damages for personal injuries. The company appealed, and has assigned errors.

The gravamen of the action, as alleged in the declaration, is that Sawyer was driving in a buggy along a turnpike road, and, when about to pass under the overhead trestle of the company, a train of cars rapidly came upon the tracks, frightening plaintiff's horse, overturning the buggy, and throwing plaintiff to the ground, as the result of which he sustained serious personal injuries. The theory of the plaintiff below was that this was a dangerous crossing, and the company was guilty of negligence in not warning the public of an approaching train.

The declaration comprises five counts, but the substance of the complaint, as alleged in the first count, is: "Said defendant, Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, through and by its agents and servants, did carelessly, wantonly, negligently, and wrongfully, and without notice or warning to plaintiff, run, drive, and propel one of its said engines and trains of cars up to, upon, over, and across said overhead bridge, directly over and above said line of pike road upon which plaintiff was traveling in the way and manner aforesaid, on account of which careless, wanton, negligent, and wrongful act of defendant railroad company, the horse which plaintiff was driving became frightened," etc.

There is no complaint, either in the declaration or proof, that the horse was frightened in consequence of any excessive or unusual whistling or ringing of the bell or escaping of steam, which is usually the foundation of such actions, as illustrated by the case of Mitchell v. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. 100 Tenn. 329, 40 L. R. A. 426, 45 S. W. 337.

But it is conceded that the train approached this overhead bridge under which the plaintiff was about to pass almost noiselessly.

The complaint in this declaration is that it was the legal duty of the railroad company to warn travelers upon the highway, about to pass under the railroad track, of the approach of the train, and the failure of the company to perform this duty was the proximate cause of the accident.

There is proof tending to show that at the locus in quo of the accident the Louisville & Nashville Railroad crosses the Franklin & Nolensville Turnpike by means of an overhead trestle, resting upon massive rock walls, which project out on either side of the railroad, forming a narrow and restricted passageway under the railroad. The view of the approaching train was to some extent obstructed by houses, walls, hedges, etc.; and, though plaintiff was looking and listening for any train that might be coming from either direction, he neither saw nor heard the approaching train until about to start under the overhead bridge, when this train, running at the rate of about 40 miles an hour, suddenly appeared and passed over said trestle while plaintiff was passing under it, or just as he emerged from it on the eastern side. As a result thereof, plaintiff's horse became frightened, throwing plaintiff from the buggy to the ground, breaking his collar bone, and inflicting other serious personal injuries. There is proof tending to show that, as a consequence of the fracture of plaintiff's collar bone, a knot or malformation had appeared on that part of his breast and shoulder where said collar bone was broken. According to the proof, the whistle was not sounded, nor the bell rung, as the train approached this overhead crossing. It is insisted that the company was under no obligation to ring the bell or sound the whistle at this point in obedience to the requirements of the statute, since the obstruction was not upon the track of the company, but beneath it.

The theory of the plaintiff is that the company was under a common-law duty to sound the whistle on approaching a public highway extending under the railroad trestle, and which crossing, by reason of the topography of the country and the surrounding environment, was dangerous to the public traveling along the highway. On the other hand, it is insisted on behalf of the company there is no common-law obligation on a railroad company to sound signals at an underpass, and no liability for any injury resulting from the frightening of a horse by the lawful and reasonable operation of a train over an underpass. The company therefore assigns as error the following instruction of the trial judge on this subject, viz. :

"It was the duty of the defendant company to give plaintiff reasonable warning of the approach of its trains, by the usual signals, so as to put plaintiff upon his guard on his approaching or passing under the track. If you believe from the evidence in this case that the plaintiff, on approaching the overhead bridge, was in the exercise of due care and caution, as defined to you above, and while passing under the overhead bridge the defendant's train ran over the bridge, having given plaintiff no reasonable warning of the approach in the usual way, by ringing the bell or blowing the whistle; and if the noise of the sudden approaching train passing over the road scared the plaintiff's horse and caused him to run away, throwing the plaintiff out of his buggy; and if the negligence of the defendant, through its servants or agents, by failing to give such warning, was the proximate cause (that is, the direct and efficient cause) of his injuries, without which his injuries would not have occurred, —then the defendant company is liable, and your verdict should be for the plaintiff."

It is conceded by counsel on both sides that the question thus presented by the charge of the trial judge is one of first impression in this state. It is conceded by counsel for the company that, under the authorities, if this were a grade crossing, the company would be operated with some common-law duty to warn travelers of its approach, but claimed that no such duty applies when the traveler is not compelled to pass over the railroad track, but beneath it.

As illustrating the position of counsel for the company, the case of Favor v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 114 Mass. 350, 19 Am. Rep. 364, is cited, in which the court used this language, viz. :

"Where a railroad crosses a highway at grade, the law imposes upon it the duty of giving notice to travelers of the approach of its trains. . . . This rule applies because at grade crossings the traveler on the highway and the railroad enjoy a common privilege on the highway itself, and each must use such privilege with due regard to the safety and rights of the other. . . . And as a train of cars is a dangerous power when in motion, and capable of doing great injury, a high degree of care is demanded of the railroad in controlling it, and some notice of its approach to the highway is required both by the rules of the common law and by statute. But where a railroad crosses a highway by a bridge, it does not, in common with the traveler, have any privilege in or use of the highway itself. Though the track and the highway are near and adjacent to each other, they are entirely distinct and separate. The railroad has no rights in the highway, and consequently the same duties are not imposed upon it that are imposed when it passes over the highway itself in common with the traveler. It has the right to use its roadbed and bridge as a railroad may use them,—by running its trains at the common rate of speed, accompanied by the usual noises attendant upon such exercise of its rights. It is not bound by law to notify the traveler of its intention to use its bridge in the ordinary and usual manner."

In Ryan v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 132 Pa. 304, 19 Atl. 81, it appeared that plaintiffs were driving under defendant's railroad upon a public street, when a train crossing overhead frightened their horse so that it became unmanageable and ran away, inflicting serious personal injuries, and resulting in the death of one of the children. The court said: "The defendant company was operating its road in a lawful manner. No defect was shown in the construction of the road. On the contrary, it was the work of competent engineers, approved by the chief engineer and surveyor of the city, and in pursuance of an ordinance of councils expressly authorizing it. The sight and sound of a moving train always have a tendency to frighten horses. In this case the fright was occasioned by the sound. We cannot measure, nor can a jury be properly allowed to measure, the amount of sound which may be made by a railroad train, either in crossing bridges at overhead crossings or at other places. The defendant company, under all the authorities, has the right to operate its road in a lawful manner; and, when it does so without negligence and without malice, it is not responsible for injuries occasioned thereby."

In Ransom v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 62 Wis. 178, 51 Am. Rep. 718, 22 N. W. 147, liability was adjudged against the company for breach of a statute of that state requiring certain precautions to be observed by railroad companies before crossing any highway; causing a horse to run away near a crossing, and inflicting personal injuries on plaintiff's wife. The court said: "There is no statute, and we are aware of no common-law rule, which, under such circumstances, requires railroad companies to observe those precautions to avoid accident. If, therefore, the defendant is liable in this action, it is so because it failed to comply with the requirements of the statute prescribing its duty when its train approached the crossing of the highway."

In Jenson v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 86 Wis. 589, 22 L. R. A. 680, 57 N. W. 359, the court said as follows: "It is certainly no wrong for the train to be run over such bridges in the usual and ordinary way, and even in this way some horses going under the bridge, or being near it at the same time, might be frightened by it. The trains must necessarily make considerable noise going over the bridge. They cannot be run without it. It is not by any means certain that a train would make less noise going over slowly than faster. What degree of noise must it make, to frighten horses? . . . As to ringing the bell and blowing the whistle, they are only required, if at all, in order to avoid frightening horses, and, with that view, to warn the traveler on the highway to stop. Where should he stop, and how near the bridge? If near the bridge, and his horse is liable to be frightened and run away, he will be in a much more dangerous condition than if he should drive on and take his chances, for the horse, facing the train rushing over the bridge, would turn suddenly around to escape danger, and upset the carriage."

The cases just mentioned comprise all those cited by counsel for the company in support of their contention that the charge of the circuit judge was erroneous. The authorities holding the contrary doctrine will now be considered. Rapalje & Mack, in their Digest of Railway Law, vol. 3, § 92, p. 493, state the law thus: "Independently of statute, it is the duty of those in charge of a train to give notice of their approach at all points of known or reasonably apprehended danger;" citing Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Dillon, 123 Ill. 570, 5 Am. St. Rep. 559, 15 N. E. 181; Pennsylvania Co. v. Krick, 47 Ind. 368; Winstanley v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 72 Wis. 375, 39 N. W. 856. "The absence of a statute requiring the ringing of a bell or the sounding of a whistle in approaching highway crossings will not excuse the company for a failure to do so under all circumstances. Where the view of approaching trains is obstructed, or it is impossible or very difficult to hear them, and in similar cases, it is clearly the duty of the company to give such signals, although not required by statute;" citing authorities. "Whether, in a given case, ordinary care requires the giving of such signals, is a question for the jury;" citing Indianapolis, C. & L. R. Co. v. Hamilton, 44 Ind. 76.

Again, the same author, at § 97, p. 494, vol. 3, says: "Where the view of an approaching train is obstructed, though the company is not required by statute to sound a whistle or ring a bell when its train approaches a highway, yet, where such appliances are available, a failure to use them is negligence;" citing cases. "Where an approaching engine is concealed from the view of persons approaching a highway crossing at a place of much travel, regardless of the statute, the duty of the company to operate its train at a moderate rate of speed, and to give the usual signals of its approach, is more imperative than at a place of less danger;" citing authorities.

Again, the same author, at § 154, p. 524, vol. 3, says:

"The provisions of New York act of 1850, § 39 [p. 232, chap. 140], prescribing a penalty for running a locomotive past highway crossings without giving signals, applies to a crossing where the track is carried over the highway on a bridge;" citing People v. New York C. R. Co. 13 N. Y. 78, Affirming 25 Barb. 199. "It is as much the duty of a company to give notice of the approach of trains where highways pass under or over the track as where they cross at grade, if danger is likely to result to persons or property from a failure to do so;" citing Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Barnett, 59 Pa. 259, 98 Am. Dec. 346.

This latter case seems to be the leading authority relied on by counsel for the plaintiff below, and we shall therefore proceed to notice it in extenso. The facts of that case are that the public road crossed the railroad by a bridge 19 feet above the track. The plaintiff was traveling along this road, and while driving over the bridge an express passenger train passed under it, whistling as it passed, at which his horse took fright and ran away, overturning the carriage and throwing plaintiff out, in consequence of which he was seriously and permanently injured. It appeared that a mill on the east side of the public road obstructed the view of the railroad to some extent. About 100 rods east of the bridge there was a whistling post, and it was usual for trains going west to sound an alarm whistle as they passed, but at the time of the accident the whistle was not sounded until the train was passing under the bridge. The court, in the midst of its opinion, said: "The degree of care demanded of the company in running its train depended on circumstances, and whether it observed due care in approaching the bridge, or was guilty of negligence in not sounding an alarm whistle, was a question which properly belonged to the jury to determine." 69 L. R. A.

. . . If there was no danger to the persons and property of those who might be traveling along the public road in running its trains without giving any notice of their approach to the bridge, then the company is not chargeable with negligence in not giving it. But if danger might be reasonably apprehended, it was the duty of the company to give some notice or warning in order that it might be avoided. . . . Whether, therefore, the company exercised proper care and diligence in running the train in order to prevent injury to the persons and property of those who were lawfully on the public road and in the vicinity of the crossing, was a question for the jury."

It was further insisted in that case that the company would not be liable for failing to sound the alarm whistle except at points on the road where injury might result to persons on the track at road crossings at grade and stations. The court held that whether it is the duty of the company to give notice of the approach of its trains at any point on the road depends altogether upon circumstances. Where there is no reasonable apprehension of danger, no such notice is required. But if danger to the person or property of others may be reasonably apprehended or is likely to result from the running of its trains without giving such notice, then it is the duty of the company to give it, and its omission is negligence. The court approved the charge of the circuit judge in saying that it was the duty of the company to give notice wherever danger may result to persons rightfully traveling on a public road that crosses the track, whether at grade, or over or under the railroad, where danger would be the consequence of want of notice. It will be observed that the substance of this opinion is that, whether or not it was negligence on the part of the company to fail to warn travelers of the approach of the train to a public crossing, was a question for the determination of the jury, in view of all the surrounding circumstances, and it was immaterial whether the railroad crossed the public road at a grade, or over or under the public road.

Another case very much relied on by counsel for plaintiff below is Rupard v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 88 Ky. 280, 7 L. R. A. 316, 11 S. W. 70. In that case it appeared that the wife of plaintiff, while riding horseback on the public road at a point where the railroad crosses said road on a high trestle, was thrown from her horse in consequence of his fright from the noise of the train as it passed over the trestle. The ground of liability asserted in that case was the failure of the company to give notice of the approach of the train to the crossing. The court, in considering the liability of the company, repudiated the doctrine laid down in Favor v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 114 Mass. 350, 19 Am. Rep. 364, in which a distinction was drawn between the duty of the company to warn travelers of the approach of a train to an overhead bridge or to a grade crossing. In the Kentucky case the court held that it is the duty of a railroad company, where a train crosses a public highway on a trestle, and there is danger of catching a traveler thereunder unawares, and frightening the horse that he is riding or driving, to give some timely warning of the approach of the train to the crossing. The court, in its opinion, while disagreeing with the conclusions reached by the court in Favor v. Boston & L. R. Corp., approved the principles enunciated in Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Barnett, 59 Pa. 263, 98 Am. Dec. 346.

It was further held in that case that the question of negligence in failing to give notice should be left to the determination of the jury. Counsel for plaintiff in error cites the case of Farley v. Harris, 186 Pa. 440, 40 Atl. 798, which case, it is claimed, is a modification of the rule laid down in Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Barnett, 59 Pa. 259, 98 Am. Dec. 346. In that case it appeared that the plaintiff was crossing an overhead bridge when his horse became frightened, ran away, and injured the plaintiff. The grounds of recovery alleged in that case were two: (1) That the whistle had been negligently sounded when the locomotive was immediately under the bridge; and (2) that no whistle had been sounded by the locomotive on approaching this overhead bridge. The court said that the rule applicable to grade crossings—that it is negligence in railroad companies not to give warning on approaching them—has no application to under and over crossings at every street crossing in a city. The court, in concluding its opinion, says that the cases cited by the appellant (Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Barnett, 59 Pa. 259, 98 Am. Dec. 346, and other cases) are all applicable to a different state of facts than are presented here.

A careful examination of Farley v. Harris, 186 Pa. 440, 40 Atl. 798, will show that the gravamen of the action was the blowing of the whistle when Farley was on the bridge, and the locomotive was directly beneath it. The proof was that the fright of the horses was caused solely by the blasts of the whistle when Farley was in the middle of the bridge. It is true that in the midst of the opinion the court said that the rule applicable to grade crossings has no application to under and over crossings at every street crossing in a city. "In fact," continued the court, "such crossings are constructed on the theory that, by adopting them, travel is unobstructed, and danger to travelers on parallel and crossing streets is lessened by the absence of the . . . screams of steam whistles necessary to give warning at grade crossings." The court then said that Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Barnett, 59 Pa. 259, 98 Am. Dec. 346, and other cases cited, are all applicable to a different state of facts, and concludes by saying: "Our decision is based solely on the circumstance of an accident at a properly constructed overhead bridge at one of the many street crossings of a steam railroad in a city." After an examination of all the authorities cited, we think the true rule deducible therefrom is that, if the place is dangerous, then the company is onerated with the duty of warning travelers on the highway of the approach of its trains, but whether the place, as a matter of fact, is dangerous, is a question for the determination of the jury. The law imposed no absolute duty upon the company to give notice at this particular crossing. That duty was only required, as matter of law, in the event the jury should find that danger was to be reasonably apprehended at this conjunction of underpass and overhead bridge. The charge of the trial judge in this case made the duty of the company absolute to give warning of the approach of the train to the crossing. Said the court: "It was the duty of the defendant company to give plaintiff reasonable warning of the approach of the train by the usual signals, so as to put plaintiff upon his guard on his approaching or passing under the track." There was no such absolute duty resting upon the company either at common law or by statute, but its duty in this respect was entirely dependent upon the question of fact whether the place was dangerous. The charge of the court should have been so formulated as to leave to the determination of the jury the dangerous character of the place as the predicate for the application of the principle of law announced. For the error indicated, the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Minnesota, Resp't.,
v.

Robert H. EDWARDS et al., Appts.

(.....Minn.....)

- *1. Section 2, chap. 225, p. 246, Laws 1899, requires a commission merchant, duly licensed to sell grain on commission, to render a true statement to the consignor within twenty-four hours of making a sale, showing the grain sold, price received, name and address of purchaser, and the date, hour, and minute when sold, with vouchers for charges and expenses. Held: This law contemplates an actual purchaser, other than the consignee, and the purchase by him of such grain, after close of business hours, at the highest price of the day upon the board of trade, is not a sale within the meaning of this act, and a report of such sale to the consignor is not a compliance with its provisions. If the consignee makes such purchase, and subsequently sells the same at an advance, such sale inures to the benefit of the consignor, and the failure to return to him a true statement, as provided, constitutes a violation of the law.
2. The consignor is not estopped from repudiating a purchase of grain by his consignee, unless he acquiesces therein, and ratifies the same after being fully informed of the entire transaction, including a subsequent sale at a profit.
3. The statement in the criminal complaint that defendants wilfully and unlawfully made a false report is immaterial. The penalty is imposed for a failure to render the report as provided, irrespective of intent, and it is immaterial that the consignee acted in good faith and in accordance with the custom of commission merchants in that locality.
4. Chapter 225, p. 246, Laws 1899, is constitutional, and not in conflict with the Federal Constitution, as an interference with interstate commerce.

(February 17, 1905.)

APPPEAL by defendants from an order of the Municipal Court of Duluth denying a new trial after their conviction for alleged violation of the statute governing returns by commission merchants. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

There is no law making it unlawful for those who follow the business of grain commission merchants under the act here under consideration also to buy grain on the open market, on their own account, and to sell the same at an advance, if possible.

The disability which the law, from considerations of public policy, imposes upon the defendants in this transaction, is also imposed upon all parties occupying towards others certain confidential or fiduciary relations.

The agent with power to sell, if he violates his instructions, and, instead of selling to an actual purchaser, makes the purchase himself, in effect puts himself in a position of allowing his principal to treat the matter as a sale, or to treat it as a nullity, when all the facts are known.

Looked at from the standpoint of the consignee, it is an absolute nullity.

Mr. Bert Fesler also for respondent.

Lewis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon the complaint of Charles P. Staples, a member of the State Railroad & Warehouse Commission, defendants, commission merchants, doing business at Duluth, were charged with having violated the provisions of § 2, chap. 225, p. 246, Laws 1899, in failing to render a true statement to the consignor concerning a consignment of flax. A plea of not guilty was entered, and the trial resulted in a verdict of guilty. The case is brought here upon appeal by defendants from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

It is undisputed that the consignor, Victor Carlson, resided at Hallock, Minnesota, and shipped a carload of flax to defendants at Duluth, to be sold by them on commission; that the car was shipped from Hallock, January 14th, over the Great Northern Railroad, reaching Duluth January 19, 1903. Carlson made a draft upon defendants for $700, attached the bill of lading, and sent it through a bank for collection. The flax was inspected January 19th at Duluth, and was ready to be sold upon the market that day. The evening of January 19th defendants wrote consignor the following letter:

Duluth, Minn., Jany. 19th, 1903.

Mr. Victor Carlson, Hallock, Minn.

January 20th, defendants sold the carload of flax to the Hall Elevator Company at Duluth at $1.20 per bushel, an advance of ½ cent, but of this sale made no report to consignor. Defendants claim the sale was made to themselves at the close of the business day, January 19th, and that the letter of that date, and the account stated, of date January 22d, constituted a report of the transaction within the requirement of the statute. Defendants further claim that there was a subsequent ratification of the transaction by the consignor.

At the trial, the court instructed the jury that, when grain is consigned to commission merchants to be sold upon commission, it is their duty to sell it in the open market for the best obtainable price, and remit to the shipper the amount of the sale, less commission and necessary disbursements; that commission merchants have no right, when grain has been consigned to be sold on commission, to themselves purchase it, and that an attempt so to do is not binding upon the shipper; that if such an attempt is made, and thereafter the grain is sold to an actual purchaser, the law requires the commission merchants to make a true report of the amount received at the sale to the actual purchaser within twenty-four hours thereafter; and, further, that, if the jury found from the evidence that the car in question was consigned to defendants to be sold on commission, then defendants had no right or authority to themselves purchase the grain, and any such attempt at purchase would not relieve them of the positive duty to report to Carlson the sale to a subsequent legal purchaser. The court refused to instruct the jury, upon request of defendants, to the effect that they were not guilty if the jury should find that the duly authorized agent of defendants sold the carload of flax to them, paying therefor the highest market price of that date, and duly reported the same to the consignor within twenty-four hours thereafter. The court also refused to instruct the jury that, if such sale was made to defendants in accordance with the usages and customs of the board of trade at Duluth, at the highest price obtainable on that day, and duly reported the same to the consignor within twenty-four hours thereafter, and the consignor did not, within a reasonable time thereafter, repudiate the transaction, then such act would constitute ratification by the consignor. Error is also assigned in refusing defendants' offer to prove it was the custom among members of the Duluth board of trade to purchase for themselves consignments of grain shipped to them to be sold upon commission at the highest market price for the day, in the event that other purchasers could not be obtained. The instruction of the court to the following effect is also questioned: "The offense charged is that of omitting to perform a positive duty enjoined upon the commission merchants by the law of the state, and it is immaterial whether he actually knew anything about the transaction, if the grain was shipped to them to be sold upon commission, or was sold by them, or any authorized person acting for them, on commission."

Section 1, chap. 225, p. 245, defines the purpose of the act, and declares it to be unlawful to do business without procuring a license and giving a bond for the benefit of persons intrusting commission merchants with consignments; that, if such commission merchant receive grain for sale on commission, the bond shall be conditioned that he faithfully account and report to all persons intrusting him with grain for sale, less commission and disbursements; and that, if he does not receive grain for sale on commission, the bond shall be conditioned upon the faithful performance of his duties as such commission merchant. The record shows that defendants were duly licensed to sell grain, exclusive of other agricultural products and farm produce, on commission, at Minneapolis and Duluth, and that they duly executed and delivered their bond, as provided by law, conditioned to faithfully account and report to all persons intrusting them with grain to be sold on commission, less commission earned and actual disbursements. The law does not prohibit defendants from engaging in the business of directly buying and dealing in grain, but, so far as shown, they did not take advantage of that privilege, and take out a license for that purpose. Having held themselves out as commission merchants to sell grain on commission, defendants entered into an obligation to use their knowledge and position in disposing of the grain for the greatest benefit of their patrons; and were required to take all reasonable and usual means and precautions to dispose of the grain to the best advantage of the consignor immediately upon its arrival; and if for good reason they failed to dispose of it on the day of its arrival, and it was necessary to sell it at private sale after business hours of the board of trade, or to carry the grain over the day, the same duty followed them, and they were still required to exercise reasonable diligence on behalf of the shipper. They could not shift such responsibility by bidding in the property for themselves after business hours, and subsequently turn it over to some one else at a profit, and not be held accountable therefor. The record conclusively shows that on the following day the car of flax, without being unloaded, was disposed of by defendants to the Hall Elevator Company at an advance of $\frac{1}{2}$ cent a bushel. Under the law of agency such sale inured to the benefit of defendants' principal, and the attempted sale to themselves, as testified by their agent, was, prima facie, a nullity. We cannot accept as applicable to this case the proposition that, if the shipper made no protest after receiving the report of the alleged sale and the proceeds thereof, he thereby accepted and ratified the sale. On the other hand, it was the duty of defendants to clearly show that the shipper not only knew the sale was made to themselves, upon which point the report of sale is silent, but that he also knew that subsequently defendants sold the flax at an advanced price, and, being possessed of all these facts, he accepted the proceeds of the sale to defendants as final, and waived his right to profits on account of the subsequent sale. In this respect the evidence entirely fails. Conceding there is evidence tending to show that the manager, Mr. Taylor, sold the flax to defendants, and made a report thereof, the evidence fails to show that the consignor ever accepted the transaction after being put in full possession of all the facts.

The complaint charged that defendants wilfully and unlawfully neglected and failed to render the statement within the time required, but, on the contrary, wilfully and unlawfully made and rendered to the consignor a false report and statement in writing, in and by which they pretended and represented they had sold the flax for the sum of $1,007.38, whereas in fact they sold it for $1,011.54. The gist of the offense is one of omission, in failing to render a true statement to the consignor, showing what portion of such consignment had been sold, the price received, and the name and address of the purchaser, the date, hour, and minute when such sale was made, with vouchers for all charges and expenses paid or incurred; and defendants were put on trial upon that charge, and none other. The statement in the complaint that they wilfully made a false report was unnecessary, and mere surplusage. Upon the trial, however, in support of the offense charged, it was proper to prove what reports were made, and that such reports were not those required by law. Defendants' business was conducted through their local manager, and, it may be admitted, they were acting in good faith, in accordance with the custom of commission merchants in Duluth, and the agent may, in good faith, have been endeavoring to comply with the law in making the stated reports, but the question of good faith or intent is not involved in this action. If, under such circumstances, a sale to themselves was unauthorized and prohibited, defendants could not avoid the effect of the statute in failing to report the sale which they did make, no matter what their intentions may have been. In State v. Robinson, 55 Minn. 169, 56 N. W. 594, it was held that the owner of a drug store was not liable for a sale by one of his clerks, not a registered pharmacist, and made without his knowledge or assent. Here, however, that principle has no application. Mr. Taylor was defendants' general manager, and the only person in charge of the Duluth office, and was held out to the world as their representative to transact their business, and no claim was made at the trial that he was not authorized to do the very things which he did. On the contrary, it was insisted that his attempted purchase of the flax was justified under the law, and was in accordance with the general custom. In this connection the case of State v. O'Connor, 58 Minn. 193, 59 N. W. 999, may be considered, wherein it was held that, in order to excuse himself from liability for permitting a saloon to be kept open on Sunday, the master would have to show that it was opened against his will, and notwithstanding all reasonable efforts by him to keep it closed. The question of intent is not material in this class of statutory offenses. As remarked by Judge Cooley in People v. Roby, 52 Mich. 577, 50 Am. Rep. 270, 18 N. W. 365, such statutes are in the nature of police regulations, and impose a penalty irrespective of intent to violate them, the object being to require a degree of diligence for the protection of the public which shall render violations impossible. The statute makes the act criminal without regard to intent. State v. Heck, 23 Minn. 549. For the reasons already stated, it was immaterial that it was the custom among commission merchants at Duluth to buy grain at the highest figure for the day, in case not sold on the market. They could not make that lawful which was unlawful, and it was just such irregularities that the statute was intended to correct.

The law under consideration is assailed upon the ground that it is in violation of the Federal Constitution, as an interference with interstate commerce. In State ex rel. Beek v. Wagener, 77 Minn. 483, 46 L. R. A. 442, 77 Am. St. Rep. 681, 80 N. W. 633, 778, 1134, this law was declared to be not in conflict with the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution, nor with §§ 2 or 7, art. 1, of the state Constitution. The court at that time, after exhaustive argument, put at rest all of the questions touching upon the constitutionality of the law, except, possibly, an intimation that the statute did not apply to interstate business, but what was stated in the opinion on that point was by way of precaution or reservation only.

In the case before us, the consignor resided within the state; but, to our minds, that fact is not significant. The law applies to all shipments, from beyond as well as within the state. The object of the statute is to protect the public in its dealings with commission merchants against an infringement upon the rights of shippers of grain. Indeed, the law might be open to the objection of an unjust discrimination were its benefits conferred only upon the citizens of the state. The question of transportation is not involved. It is immaterial from whence the grain is shipped, over what route or through what states it travels to the point of destination. The provisions involved in this case take no account of the grain as an article of commerce until it has been sold; and, even then, only to require the consignee to make a true report of the transaction within a reasonable time. The subject-matter of the law as applicable to this case no more relates to interstate commerce than the criminal statutes which protect grain from larceny after arrival within the borders of the state. If it be an interference with the prerogative of Congress to require commission merchants to make a true report of their dealings with citizens of Dakota or Wisconsin, for their protection, why is it not equally an interference with interstate commerce when our criminal laws are put in force to arrest and punish for the larceny of such grain upon arrival within the borders of our lines? We fancy there is no crying demand on the part of the citizens of our sister states to be excluded from the benefit of these protective measures.

This cause was submitted to the jury upon the right theory, and we find no error in the instructions or rulings. The order appealed from is accordingly affirmed.

Scope.

It will be observed that the foreign decree involved in PROCTOR V. PROCTOR, purported to affect directly real property in Illinois. In this respect the case is distinguishable from those that involve merely the collateral or incidental effect upon real property in one state or country, of a decree of divorce, or other decree, rendered in another, which does not purport upon its face to affect real property beyond the ERROR to the Superior Court for Cook County to review a decree in favor of plaintiff in a suit to dissolve a marriage and secure alimony. Reversed in part.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Clarence A. Burley and William H. McSurely, with Mr. Edward R. Hills, for plaintiff in error:

A decree for divorce is a proceeding in rem so far as it fixes the status of the parties by dissolving their marital relations. But, so far as it disposes of any other matter than the marriage, it is a proceeding in personam.

2 Freeman, Judgm. 584; 2 Black, Judgm. 933; 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 745; Rigney v. Rigney, 127 N. Y. 413, 24 Am. St. Rep. 462, 28 N. E. 405; 2 Bishop, Marr.

territorial jurisdiction, a. g., the effect upon dower rights in real property in one state of a decree of divorce rendered in another which contains no provision with respect to the property. The latter class of cases is not included in this note, it being confined to cases involving the jurisdiction of equity over suits the avowed purpose of which is to affect real property beyond the territorial jurisdiction, either directly by a decree in rem, or indirectly by a decree in personam. For similar reasons, the cases dealing with the effect upon real property in one state or country of a decree rendered in another admitting a will to probate or determining its construction or validity are also omitted.

I. In general; jurisdiction limited to suits in personam.

It should be stated at the outset that real property is subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the courts of the state or country in which it is located. Davis v. Headley, 22 N. J. Eq. 115. No other courts may properly exercise any jurisdiction over it, and this is as true of courts of equity as of courts of law. Therefore, it is beyond the power of a court of one state or country to entertain a suit in rem in respect of land in another, or to render a decree either in a suit in rem or in a suit in personam which shall, ex proprio vigore, affect the title to real property in another state or country. The following cases illustrate the principle just stated:

While, by means of its power over the person of a party, a court of equity may, in a proper case, compel him to act in relation to property not within its jurisdiction, its decree does not operate directly upon the property, nor affect the title, but is made effectual through the coercion of the defendant. Carpenter v. Strange, 141 U. S. 87, 35 L. ed. 640, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 960.

In Clopton v. Booker, 27 Ark. 482, the court said that it was well settled that the title to land, and the right of possession thereto, must be determined by the courts of the state wherein the land lies; that contracts may be made and obligations passed at points remote from the land intended to be affected thereby, & Div. 1891 ed. § 79; Lynn v. Sentel, 183 Ill. 387, 75 Am. St. Rep. 110, 55 N. E. 838; Dunham v. Dunham, 57 Ill. App. 475.

Process from the tribunals of one state cannot run into another state and summon a party there domiciled to respond to proceedings against him; and process sent to him out of the state is unavailing in a proceeding to establish a personal liability.

Harkness v. Hyde, 98 U. S. 476, 25 L. ed. 237; Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565; Cloyd v. Trotter, 118 Ill. 391, 9 N. E. 507.

The authority of every tribunal is necessarily restricted by the territorial limits of the state in which it is established.

Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 722, 24 L. ed. 569; Lynn v. Sentel, 183 Ill. 387, 75 Am. St. Rep. 110, 55 N. E. 838.

but whenever litigation must be had to test the validity of the claim to such land, whether the contract be express or implied, direct or in secret trust, resort must be had to the local laws and local courts. This seems to state the exclusive jurisdiction of the courts of the state where the land lies too broadly; for a court of a state having jurisdiction of the parties may undoubtedly declare and enforce a trust with reference to real property in another state. See infra, III. a.

No court, state or Federal, can reach, or confer title to, or sell under decree, lands situated in a state in which it does not sit. Every attempt of a court to found jurisdiction of such lands must, from the very nature of the case, be utterly nugatory. Williams v. Nichol, 47 Ark. 254, 1 S. W. 243.

While a court of chancery which has acquired jurisdiction over the person of a party may, in a proper case, by virtue of its power to enforce obedience to its decrees, enforce the performance of contracts of lands situated in another state, such court has no power to divest title to real estate in another state. Winn v. Strickland, 34 Fla. 610, 16 So. 606.

While a court of the state in which the husband is domiciled has jurisdiction to grant a divorce upon service by publication against the wife, who is a nonresident, it has no power to settle the title to lands in another state; and a general order made by it, purporting to bar the rights of the wife in the real and personal property of the husband, is ineffectual, so far as real property in another state is concerned. Rodgers v. Rodgers, 56 Kan. 483, 43 Pac. 779.

The courts of one state or country are without jurisdiction over title to lands in another state or country. Lindley v. O'Reilly, 50 N. J. L. 636, 1 L. R. A. 79, 7 Am. St. Rep. 802, 15 Atl. 379.

A court of one state cannot, by its judgment or decree, pass title to land situated in another state. Johnson v. Kimbro, 3 Head, 557, 75 Am. Dec. 781.

A court of one state cannot decree a sale of lands lying in another state. Polindexter v. Burwell, 82 Va. 507.

The courts of Virginia are without jurisdiction to sell and convey land situated beyond the limits of the state. Gibson v. Burgess, 82 Va. 650.

So a court cannot directly, and by virtue of 69 L. R. A.

Ricks, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in error filed her bill in the circuit court of Cook county on the 18th day of April, 1901. The bill alleged the marriage of the parties, desertion for over two years on the part of plaintiff in error, and prayed that the marriage be dissolved, and that the plaintiff in error be required to pay permanent alimony and solicitors' fees. No personal service was had in this state upon the plaintiff in error. The service on the plaintiff in error was by copy of the bill, with notice of commencement of suit, and was made at Piqua, Ohio, his place of residence. No appearance was entered by or for the plaintiff in error. The plaintiff in error was defaulted, and at the trial of the cause the bill was taken pro confesso. The its decree alone, create a lien upon land in another state. Hansel v. Chapman, 2 App. D. C. 361; Short v. Galway, 83 Ky. 501, 4 Am. St. Rep. 168; Almsley v. Mead, 3 Lans. 116.

A decree of a court of the testator's domicile in a suit brought by the widow against the legatees and others, reciting that the defendants were heirs of the deceased and entitled to participation in the distribution of his estate, can have no effect upon the real property of the deceased in another state. Cooper v. Ives, 62 Kan. 395, 63 Pac. 434.

Real property situated in one state cannot be subjected to the payment of a widow's allowance either by a statute or by a decree of a court of another state, in which the owner of the property was domiciled at the time of his death. Smith v. Smith, 174 Ill. 52, 43 L. R. A. 403, 50 N. E. 1083.

So a decree rendered in one state, revoking the probate of a will, does not conclusively affect the title to land in another state. Doe ex dem. Pritchard v. Roe, 2 Penn. (Del.) 553, 47 Atl. 376.

So in Harrison v. Harrison, L. R. 3 Ch. 342, the court said: "As against the real estate in Scotland, the courts of England have no jurisdiction at all. Any jurisdiction which they can exercise as to the real estate in Scotland can only be through the medium of some personal equity attaching to the owner in Scotland of that real estate."

Originally courts of chancery acted only in personam, and never in rem; and, although they are now commonly authorized by statute to render a decree in rem when the interests of justice require, they still act in personam when occasion demands. Therefore, when a case otherwise properly cognizable in equity is presented, a court of equity having personal jurisdiction of the parties may, in the exercise of its discretion, assume jurisdiction of the subject-matter, although land in another state may be affected, if it can grant effective relief by a decree acting solely upon the person whose title or interest in the land is to be affected, as distinguished from a decree acting directly upon the land. In other words, the court may, in a proper case for equitable intervention, by virtue of its jurisdiction over such person, and its consequent power to enforce obedience to its decree in personam, compel him to do with respect to land beyond the territorial jurisdiction court decreed that the marriage between the defendant in error and the plaintiff in error be dissolved, and that the defendant in error recover of the plaintiff in error the sum of $5 a week as alimony, and the sum of $50 solicitors' fees, together with an undivided one-third interest in a house and lot belonging to the plaintiff in error, situated in the city of Piqua, county of Miami, and state of Ohio. From the above decree the plaintiff in error sued out a writ of error from this court to reverse the decree in so far as it relates to the recovery of $5 per week as alimony, $50 as solicitors' fees, and an undivided one-third interest in a house and lot belonging to plaintiff in error, situated in the city of Piqua, county of Miami, and state of Ohio. The record shows plaintiff in error had no property within the state.

what it could not itself and without its intervention accomplish. This principle lies at the foundation of all of the cases subsequently cited in this note which uphold the jurisdiction of a court of equity of one state or country over a suit the avowed purpose of which is to affect real property in another. For a general statement of the principle, see especially the cases cited in infra, II., a.

The Lord Chancellor (Nottingham), in Arglasse v. Muschamp, 1 Vern. 75, thus quaintly replied to an objection that a court of equity of England had no jurisdiction of a suit for relief from a fraudulent conveyance of land in Ireland: "This is surely only a jest put upon the jurisdiction of this court by the common lawyers; for when you go about to bind the lands, and grant a sequestration to execute a decree, then they readily tell you that the authority of this court is only to regulate a man's conscience, and ought not to affect the estate, but that this court must agere in personam only; and when, as in this case, you prosecute the person for a fraud, they tell you, you must not intermeddle here, because the fraud, though committed here, concerns lands that lie in Ireland, which makes the jurisdiction local, and so would wholly elude the jurisdiction of this court."

The following case states sharply and concisely the nature and general scope of the peculiar jurisdiction discussed in this note.

The jurisdiction acquired by the courts in one state over parties to an action incidentally affecting lands in another state is a jurisdiction purely in personam. The decree or judgment cannot have any extraterritorial force in rem. Bullock v. Bullock, 52 N. J. Eq. 561, 27 L. R. A. 213, 46 Am. St. Rep. 528, 30 Atl. 676.

It will be observed, in addition to the other objections to giving effect to the Ohio decree involved in PROCTOR V. PROCTOR, so far as real property in Illinois was concerned, that it was not a decree in personam, but a decree in rem, purporting to affect directly the property in question.

II. Conditions of jurisdiction.

a. Necessity of proper case for equitable intervention.

As will be shown in II. b, the ability to 60 L. R. A.

The grounds relied on are that the court did not acquire such jurisdiction of the person of plaintiff in error as authorized it to enter the money decree against him, and did not have jurisdiction to enter any decree affecting real estate in the state of Ohio.

That the court had no such jurisdiction of the person of plaintiff in error as authorized a money decree or decree in personam seems to be settled by the case of Cloyd v. Trotter, 118 Ill. 391, 9 N. E. 507. In that case a bill was filed to remove a cloud from real estate situated in this state. James C. Cloyd, the defendant to the bill, resided in the city of New York, and service was had upon him in that city by a copy of the bill, and notice, as in the case at bar. The defendant defaulted, and the relief prayed was granted, and a judgment for grant effective relief by a decree operating solely against the person in a necessary condition of the jurisdiction of a court of equity over a suit, the purpose of which is to affect real property in another state or country. That, however, is not the only condition of such jurisdiction. To warrant the court in entertaining such a suit, it must also appear that the case, independently of the location of the land beyond the territorial jurisdiction, is a proper one for equitable intervention. Chief Justice Marshall defined this indirect jurisdiction as follows: "In a case of fraud, of trust, or of contract, the jurisdiction of a court of chancery is sustainable wherever the person be found, although lands not within the jurisdiction of that court may be affected by the decree." This statement of the jurisdiction has been very frequently quoted and approved in subsequent cases. See, for example, Carpenter v. Strange, 141 U. S. 87, 35 L. ed. 640, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 960; Binney's Case, 2 Bland, Ch. 99; DeKlyn v. Watkins, 3 Sandf. Ch. 185; Davis v. Morris, 76 Va. 21. It follows that a court of equity of one state or country will not assume jurisdiction of a suit that in its essence involves merely the title or possession of land in another, and presents no ground of equitable intervention. In other words, if the action is one which, if it related to real property within the territorial jurisdiction, would be at law, and not in equity, a court of equity will not assume jurisdiction merely because, the property being beyond the territorial jurisdiction, a court of law cannot entertain an action in respect of it.

Thus, Chief Justice Marshall said, in Massie v. Watts, 6 Cranch, 148, 3 L. ed. 181, that, if the cause of action in that case were to be considered as involving a naked question of title to land in Virginia, the court of Kentucky would not have had jurisdiction.

An action of ejectment cannot be maintained in the circuit court of the district of Michigan for land in any other district. Northern Indiana R. Co. v. Michigan C. R. Co. 15 How. 233, 14 L. ed. 674.

A decree recovered in the courts of Kentucky in a real action to try the title of lands in New Jersey, or in ejectment for the possession, would be a perfect nullity. No action could be brought upon it in New Jersey to obtain execution of it. It would be simply void. A decree to deliver possession of lands in New Jersey costs against the defendant, Cloyd, was awarded. On error this court held that, in so far as the proceeding was in rem, the decree was valid, but that the court was without jurisdiction to enter a decree for costs against Cloyd, as that was in personam. In so far as the proceeding at bar related to the marital relation and its dissolution, the proceeding is regarded as one in rem, and the court was warranted in entering its decree dissolving the same. But the court could go no farther. It could not enter any binding decree in personam against plaintiff in error. 2 Black, Judgm. § 933; 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 745; Rigney v. Rigney, 127 N. Y. 413, 24 Am. St. Rep. 462, 28 N. E. 405; Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 727, 24 L. ed. 570.

So much of the decree as sought to vest

in defendant in error an interest in real estate in Ohio was extraterritorial and beyond the jurisdiction of the court. That part of the decree was purely a proceeding in rem, and the res, having its situs in another state, must be controlled by the laws of the state of its situs. Lynn v. Sentel, 183 Ill. 382, 75 Am. St. Rep. 110, 55 N. E. 838; Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 727, 24 L. ed. 570; Story, Conf. L. § 539.

In decreeing alimony, solicitors' fees, and an interest in the land in Ohio, the court was in error, and in those respects the decree is reversed. As to the divorce no reversal is asked, and the decree remains in force and is affirmed. Plaintiff will have judgment for costs.

Decree reversed in part.

might be enforced by the courts of Kentucky; if in possession of the person of the defendant, he could be imprisoned, or even subjected to paine forte et dure until he actually delivered it. Davis v. Headley, 22 N. J. Eq. 115.

A court of one state has no jurisdiction of a suit which, in its essence, involves the possession of real property in another state, such possession not being incidental to the enforcement of a contract, or trust, or relief from fraud, but being in itself the foundation of the controversy. Lindsley v. Union Silver Star Min. Co. 26 Wash. 301, 66 Pac. 382.

Thomas v. Hukill, 181 Pa. 298, 18 Atl. 875, affirmed a decree dismissing a bill filed by a second lessee, out of possession, of oil lands situated in another state, alleging a forfeiture incurred by a prior lessee, in possession for failure to perform his covenants, and praying for an injunction to restrain further operations and for a decree declaring the prior lease void, and for an account. The supreme court said that, while the proceeding was in form a bill in equity, it was in substance a possessory action involving the title to real estate; that the decree of the court could only affect the person of the litigants, and could not control the title and possession of the land; and therefore the exercise of such jurisdiction would be of at least doubtful propriety, even though the parties were residents of Pennsylvania.

A court will not entertain jurisdiction where the naked question of title is involved, or a mere trespass or nuisance on extraterritorial real property is sought to be restrained. Chase v. Knickerbocker Phosphate Co. 82 App. Div. 400, 53 N. Y. Supp. 220.

Equity acts in personam when the parties are within the jurisdiction of the court, though the lands affected be within another state, but not to the extent of awarding relief more appropriately obtainable in a common-law action of ejectment triable by a jury of the vicinage. Genet v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 13 Misc. 409, 35 N. Y. Supp. 147. In this case the court said that a determination that a contract relating to land in another state should be rescinded on account of breaches, with a decree requiring the defendants to remove from the lands all their apparatus, etc., and to surrender the premises to the plaintiff, would, in effect, be to enforce an action of ejectment from the 69 L. R. A.

lands, a jurisdiction which the court could not assume; the rule being that actions for the possession of real property must be brought in the forum rei sitae.

b. Ability to grant effective relief by a decree in personam the criterion of jurisdiction.

The nonresidence of the defendant, and the inability to subject him personally to the jurisdiction of the court, do not necessarily defeat the jurisdiction of a court of equity over a suit affecting lands within the territorial jurisdiction, since, as stated in supra, I., such courts are now commonly empowered by statute to grant decrees in rem in respect of land within the territorial jurisdiction. It is otherwise in respect of real property beyond the territorial jurisdiction. Assuming that a proper case for equitable intervention is presented, the criterion of the jurisdiction of a court of equity over a suit, the purpose of which is to affect real property beyond the territorial jurisdiction, is its ability to grant effective relief by a decree in personam; and, therefore, in order to uphold the jurisdiction, the defendant must be personally subject to the jurisdiction of the court; and to subject him personally to the jurisdiction, he must, if a nonresident, either have appeared, or have been served personally within the jurisdiction; constructive service, or service outside of the jurisdiction, is not sufficient (see note to Pinney v. Providence Loan & Invest. Co. 50 L. R. A. 577); though, according to the weight of authority, such service is sufficient if the defendant is a resident, though temporarily absent from the jurisdiction (see same note).

An exception to the rule that the defendant must be personally subject to the jurisdiction of the court was, however, made in the case of Ward v. Arredondo, 10opk. Ch. 213, 14 Am. Dec. 543, which held that a court of equity might enforce specific performance of a contract for the sale of land outside the state, notwithstanding that the vendor was out of the jurisdiction, by laying hold of a deed which he had sent to an agent within the state to be delivered upon the payment of a certain sum, which was in excess of that found to be due him upon an accounting. This seems to be the only case in which the jurisdiction of a suit in personam, the purpose of which is to affect real property in another state or country has been upheld, when the owner of the title or interest to be affected was not personally subject to the jurisdiction of the court; and in this case the jurisdiction was upheld only because of the court's control over the deed.

In Cookney v. Anderson, 32 L. J. Ch. N. S. 427, 9 Jur. N. S. 736, 8 L. T. N. S. 295, 11 Week. Rep. 629, it was held that the court of chancery of England had no power, in a suit to carry out trusts under a deed made in Scotland, to order a copy of the bill to be served on the defendants out of the jurisdiction, it appearing that they were nonresidents. It was further held in this case that, the defendants having appeared and demurred to the bill, the demurrer must be allowed, although the defendants did not move to discharge the order of service.

A decree requiring the conveyance of property in another state by nonresidents who are not personally, but only constructively, before the court, would be nugatory. McGaw v. Gortner, 96 Md. 489, 54 Atl. 133.

Existence or nonexistence of the power to make a decree which the court can enforce is a good test by which to try the jurisdiction of the court. Ibid.

Ordinarily a court of equity having personal jurisdiction of the defendant will, in case of fraud, of trust, or of contract, grant relief, although lands not within the jurisdiction of the court will be affected by the decree, upon the principle that, in equity, the primary decree is in personam, and not in rem; still, in such cases relief will not be granted unless that sought is of such a nature as the court is capable of administering in the particular case. Harris v. Pullman, 84 Ill. 20, 25 Am. Rep. 416.

The power of a court of equity to require one personally subject to its jurisdiction to execute a conveyance is the most prolific source of its jurisdiction of suits the purpose of which is to affect real property beyond the territorial jurisdiction. And a court of equity having personal jurisdiction of the parties may entertain a suit, otherwise cognizable in equity,—or at least any such suit arising out of fraud, of trust, or of contract,—in which effective relief may be granted by a decree requiring a conveyance of land in another state or country. Massie v. Watts, 6 Cranch, 148, 3 L. ed. 181; Lewis v. Darling, 16 How. 1, 14 L. ed. 819; Corbett v. Nutt, 10 Wall. 464, 19 L. ed. 976; Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 2 L. ed. 565; Tardy v. Morgan, 8 McLean, 358, Fed. Cas. No. 18,752; Lyman v. Lyman, 2 Paine, 11, Fed. Cas. No. 8,628; McGee v. Sweeney, 84 Cal. 100, 23 Pac. 1117; Enos v. Hunter, 9 Ill. 211 (obiter); Gilliland v. Inabnit, 92 Iowa, 46, 60 N. W. 211; Seixas v. King, 39 La. Ann. 510, 2 So. 416; Vreeland v. Vreeland, 49 N. J. Eq. 322, 24 Atl. 551; Bullock v. Bullock, 52 N. J. Eq. 561, 27 L. R. A. 213, 46 Am. St. Rep. 528, 30 Atl. 676; Mead v. Merritt, 2 Paige, 402; Mitchell v. Bunch, 2 Paige, 606, 22 Am. Dec. 669; Chase v. Knickerbocker Phosphate Co. 32 App. Div. 400, 53 N. Y. Supp. 220; Orr v. Irwin, 4 N. C. (2 Car. Law Repos.) 465; Kirklin v. Atlas Sav. & L. Asso. (Tenn. Ch. App.) 60 S. W. 149; Moseby v. Burrow, 52 Tex. 396; Morris v. Hand, 70 Tex. 481, 8 S. W. 210; Farley v. Shippen, Wythe (Va.) 135.

Where the necessary parties are before a court of equity, it is immaterial that the res of the controversy, whether it be real or personal property, is beyond the territorial jurisdiction. It has power to compel the defendant to do all things necessary, according to the lex loci rei sitæ, which he could do voluntarily, to give full effect to the decree against him. Without regard to the situation of the subject-matter, such courts consider the equities between the parties, and decree in personam according to those equities, and enforce obedience to their decrees by process in personam. Phelps v. McDonald, 99 U. S. 298, 25 L. ed. 478.

Excluding cases where a suit is brought in one state or country to restrain legal proceedings in another in respect of lands situated in the latter, it may be said for practical purposes that a court of equity will not, by virtue of its jurisdiction over the person whose title or interest is to be affected, compel him to take any action in respect of real property beyond the territorial jurisdiction, unless a case is presented of which equity might take cognizance if the land were within its territorial jurisdiction. The converse of this proposition is not necessarily true, since the location of land within the territorial jurisdiction of a court of equity may enable it to grant relief by a decree in rem, which could not be effectually granted by a decree in personam. See infra, III., j, with reference to a suit for partition.

c. Nonresidence of defendant as affecting jurisdiction.

In some of the cases the rule with respect to the jurisdiction of equity over suits in personam, the purpose of which is to affect real property in another state or country, is stated with the condition or qualification that the suit must be against a resident of the state or country where the suit is brought.

Thus, in Todd v. Lancaster, 104 Ky. 427, 47 S. W. 836, the court said: "It is well settled that suits for rescission, or for specific performance of agreements respecting land, are transitory, and not local. Kendrick v. Wheatley, 8 Dana, 84; Bullitt v. Eastern Kentucky Land Co. 99 Ky. 324, 36 S. W. 16. But this rule is not applicable to suits against nonresidents. In such cases the courts where the land is situated have jurisdiction to rescind the contract for fraud or other reason, or enforce its specific execution. This is a rule of necessity."

So, in Wicks v. Caruthers, 13 Lea, 353, it was said that courts of equity act in personam in most cases where they have jurisdiction of the person, and compel parties to perform contracts for conveyance of lands in foreign countries; but the essential qualification of the rule is, "if the parties are resident within the territorial jurisdiction of the court."

In Solenberger v. Herr (Va.) 27 S. E. 839, the court said that, if a bill to compel one to acknowledge the trust character of his holding of real property had otherwise set forth a proper case for the intervention of equity, it could not be sustained in view of the fact that the defendant was a resident of Pennsylvania, and that the subject of the alleged trust was real estate in West Virginia; since the court had jurisdiction neither of the trustee nor of the subject of the trust, and it could acquire no jurisdiction of either unless he came forward and voluntarily submitted himself to its jurisdiction, which it could not be expected that he would do.

A court of equity will not entertain a suit by a person residing within its jurisdiction against parties residing in Scotland in respect of real property situated there, and upon a contract entered into there which contains no special provision affecting, in any way, the jurisdiction of the locus contractus. Cookney v. Anderson, 32 L. J. Ch. N. S. 305, Affirmed in 32 L. J. Ch. N. S. 427.

Matthaei v. Galitzin, L. R. 18 Eq. 340, sustained a demurrer to a bill filed by a foreigner against another foreigner, and against an English company formed for working a Russian mine, to restrain the English company from paying to the codefendant a part of the profits of the mine, which were claimed by the plaintiff, and for an account of profits against the company, upon the ground that the matter related to foreign property, and that the substantial controversy was between parties who were both foreigners. See also Norris v. Chambres, 29 Beav. 246, Affirmed in 3 De G. F. & J. 583, infra, II., d, and Blake v. Blake, 18 Week. Rep. 944, infra, III., g, 1.

It is doubtful, however, whether these courts intended to make the residence of the defendant within the jurisdiction where the suit is brought an absolute condition of the jurisdiction considered from the broad point of view of private international and interstate law. Practically, of course, the nonresidence of the defendant will frequently defeat the jurisdiction because of the inability to subject him personally to the jurisdiction of the court, which, as shown in supra, II., a, is a condition of the jurisdiction of a suit the purpose of which is to affect land beyond the territorial jurisdiction. If, however, the defendant, though a nonresident, is personally served within the state or country where the suit is brought, or voluntarily appears, it would seem, upon principle, that his nonresidence would not necessarily defeat the jurisdiction; and in many of the cases cited in infra, III., the jurisdiction was upheld, notwithstanding that the defendant was a nonresident, he having been personally served within the jurisdiction, or having appeared. Most of these cases seem to assume, without questioning the point, that if the defendant is personally subject to the jurisdiction, his residence or nonresidence is immaterial. But in Mussina v. Belden, 6 Abb. Pr. 165, which held that the supreme court of New York had jurisdiction of a suit for fraudulent conspiracy by defendants in another state to divest the plaintiff of his title to land in that state, the relief sought being damages for the wrong and an accounting and payment of rents and profits, the court said that it was not necessary that the defendants should be residents of New York; it was sufficient if they were served with process within the state, however brief their sojourn there.

In Wicks v. Caruthers, 13 Lea. 371, supra, the court held that a decree requiring a nonresident to convey should not be granted, although he had been personally served within the state, it appearing that he was no longer within the state. The court said that a decree ordering him to convey would only give authority in Tennessee, and be waste paper as soon as he crossed the line of Mississippi; and that the court would not make a mere declaration of right which it could not enforce. This suggests a practical difficulty in enforcing the decree when the defendant is a nonresident, 69 L. R. A.

though within the jurisdiction at the time of the commencement of the suit, since he may depart from the jurisdiction before the decree, and thus render the court powerless, for the time, at least, to enforce the decree. The difference in this respect, however, between a nonresident and a resident is merely one of degree, since even a defendant who is a resident at the time of the commencement of the suit may depart from the state pending the suit. At most the nonresidence of the defendant, assuming that he is at any time after the commencement of the suit personally subject to the jurisdiction, would seem to be a matter that merely affects the discretion of the court in exercising the jurisdiction or the practical possibility of enforcing the decree, rather than the existence of the jurisdiction.

d. Discretion as to exercising jurisdiction.

The existence of the jurisdiction is one thing, and the discretion of the court with respect to its exercise is another. As will appear from the cases cited in the subdivisions of infra, III., the courts have frequently refused, as a matter of discretion, to entertain suits, the purpose of which was to affect lands beyond the territorial jurisdiction, even though the existence of the jurisdiction was conceded. For example in Norris v. Chambres, 29 Beav. 246 (Affirmed in 3 De G. F. & J. 583), it was said that some special state of circumstances must exist in order to enable a court of England, in a suit between residents of England, to enforce a lien on immovable property situated out of the jurisdiction.

In a number of cases the courts have, in the exercise of their discretion, refused to entertain the suit, because under all the circumstances the interests of justice required that the litigation be determined by the courts of the place where the property was situated.

III. Particular subjects of jurisdiction.

a. Creation and enforcement of trusts; substitution of trustees.

It will be observed by referring to supra, II., a, that the case of "trusts" was specifically mentioned by Chief Justice Marshall as a proper one for the jurisdiction of a court of chancery, when the person can be found within the jurisdiction, although lands not within the jurisdiction may be affected; and it is settled by the great weight of authority that a court of equity of one state or country, having personal jurisdiction of the necessary parties, and the consequent power to compel a conveyance, may declare and enforce a trust relating to real property in another state or country.

Thus, Massie v. Watts, 6 (ranch, 148, 3 L. ed. 181, upon the ground that the action arose out of a contract or an implied trust, held that a court of Kentucky had jurisdiction to compel defendant to convey to the plaintiff land in Ohio, for which he had procured a patent in his own name in violation of his duty under a contract by which he was employed to locate the land for the plaintiff's assignor.

A court of equity having jurisdiction of the parties may entertain a suit for the establishment of a resulting trust in lands in another state. Moore v. Jaeger, 2 McArthur, 465. This was a case of fraud and resulting trust arising from the purchase of an outstanding title to real property by one who had previously conveyed it by a deed of trust to secure a debt due the complainant.

Questions of trust are personal, and not local; and are, therefore, subject to the jurisdiction of a court of the District of Columbia, although the land in respect of which the trust has arisen is situated elsewhere. Whitney v. Frisbie, 6 D. C. 262. This also was a case of a constructive trust.

A court having jurisdiction of the person of defendants may entertain a suit in equity to have the defendants declared trustees ex maleficio of an undivided interest in real property in Mexico. Butterfield v. Nogales Copper Co. (Ariz.) 80 Pac. 345.

A court of equity of another state having personal jurisdiction of the parties has jurisdiction of a suit to declare that a legal title to lands in Iowa is subject to a trust; and a decree of such court dismissing the bill is therefore conclusive upon the parties in Iowa. MacGregor v. MacGregor, 9 Iowa, 65.

A court of equity of one state has jurisdiction of a bill to set aside a conveyance of land in another state, which an agent, appointed to sell the land, caused to be conveyed to himself. Sturdevant v. Pike, 1 Ind. 277.

The general principle that a court having jurisdiction of the parties has jurisdiction to enforce trusts, although in doing so the title to lands lying beyond its territorial limits is incidentally affected, is asserted in Manley v. Carter, 7 Kan. App. 86, 52 Pac. 915, although in that case it is merely applied as between courts of different districts of the same state.

A court of one state, having personal jurisdiction over the trustee of a resulting or constructive trust of land in another state, may compel him to make a conveyance to the beneficiaries of the trust. McQuerry v. Gilliland, 89 Ky. 434, 7 L. R. A. 454, 12 S. W. 1037. The court said that, in such a case, the subject-matter is not the recovery of the land, and the action is not a proceeding in rem; that it is true that the title to the land is to be affected by the decree in so far as it compels the party to convey, but, by reason of his trust or contract duty, he is personally obliged to convey, and that duty may be discharged in one state as well as another, although the land may not be situated in such state.

In Hawley v. James, 7 Paige, 213, 32 Am. Dec. 623, the chancellor directed a decree declaring that, in consequence of the invalidity of the express trust declared in a will with reference to land in Illinois, there was a resulting trust in favor of the heirs at law, and requiring the trustees to convey the property to such heirs by a conveyance duly executed to pass the legal title according to the laws of Illinois, and to be recorded according to the laws of that state. The chancellor said that the court had no jurisdiction to make a decree which would directly affect either the legal or equitable title to lands situated in another state; and that, if the legal title to the lands in question had been in any of the infant parties according to the laws of Illinois, or if those who had the legal title had been out of the jurisdiction of the court, so that it would have been impossible to operate upon them personally to compel them to execute the trust, or to convey the legal title according to the decree, he would have dismissed the application and referred the parties to the courts of the 69 L. R. A.

state where the trust property was situated; but that the court would not decline the jurisdiction of the case so long as it had power to execute its decision through the medium of the holders of the legal title.

The New York supreme court has jurisdiction to compel the conveyance by defendant, who has appeared in the suit, of land in a for-

Gardner v. Ogden, 22 N. Y. 327, 78 Am. Dec. 192. It was alleged in this case that the plaintiff had been fraudulently induced to convey the land to defendant; but the ground of the suit was that the defendant stood in such relation to the plaintiff that he became a trustee of the former with respect to the land in question.

A court of equity of North Carolina, having jurisdiction of the person of the trustee, may compel the execution of the trust with reference to real property in another state by compelling him to pay over the sum for which the land was sold. Henderson v. McBee, 79 N. C. 219.

A court of one state has jurisdiction of a bill to compel the conveyance, by a trustee residing within the state, of the outstanding legal estate in lands situated in other states. Vaughan v. Barrav, 6 Whart. 392.

Where the legal title to a tract of land, partly in Tennessee and partly in Mississippi, is held subject to a constructive trust in favor of a decedent's estate, a decree may be rendered, in a suit for that purpose, requiring the holder of the legal title to convey the entire tract of land, including that in Mississippi, as well as that in Tennessee, to the administrator for the purposes of the estate; and a sale of the land may then be decreed to be made by the administrator in such manner and on such terms as will be most beneficial to the trust. Miller v. Birdsong, 7 Baxt. 536. The court said it was obvious that no decree could be made in the first instance for a sale of the Mississippi portion of the land, but, after determining that complainant was entitled to the land as assets of the estate, it had power to make such decree in personam as would coerce him to convey the land to complainant for the benefit of the estate.

A court of equity in Virginia may compel persons residing within that state to account for lands in Kentucky descended to them as heirs, as a trust subject to the payment of the ancestor's debts, in accordance with the law of Kentucky. Dickinson v. Hoomes, 8 Gratt. 353, 410.

An executrix as such cannot be held to an account and settlement by a court of a state other than that in which her letters were granted; but the court of another state may, for the purpose of determining whether real property in the latter state is held by her subject to a constructive trust in favor of the heirs of the testator, compel her to disclose whether the property was purchased with the funds of the estate. Clopton v. Booker, 27 Ark. 482.

In Cranstown v. Johnston, 3 Ves. Jr. 182, the court decreed a reconveyance of an estate in the West Indies, which the defendant had purchased under his own execution under circumstances making his purchase a security for the debt. The decision was upon the ground that such a decree acts in personam, and not in rem.

In Kildare v. Eustace, 1 Vern. 405, Lord Chancellor Jefferies doubted his jurisdiction to entertain a bill to be relieved touching trusts created in Ireland of lands in that Kingdom, notwithstanding that both plaintiff and defendant were in England. Upon the subsequent argument, however, before himself, Lord Chief Justice Beddingfield and Lord Chief Baron Atkins (1 Vern. 419) it was held that the court had jurisdiction.

An English court has jurisdiction to administer a trust under the will of a person domiciled in Scotland, not only as to the estate in England, but as to that in Scotland. Ewing v. Ewing, L. R. 9 App. Cas. 34.

In Falke v. Terry, 32 Colo. 86, 75 Pac. 425, however, it was held that a court of Colorado had no jurisdiction, in an action by legatees against a foreign executrix charged with conversion of the assets of the estate to her own use in fraud of the rights of the legatees, to adjudge the title of real estate situated in another state, the title of which was in her name, to be the property of the legatees, and to be held by her in trust for them. The decree of the trial court, which was reversed, adjudged that the real estate situated in New York standing in the defendant's name upon the records, was the property of the plaintiffs, and decreed that the same should be held by her in trust for them.

In Servis v. Nelson, 14 N. J. Eq. 101, the court said, in effect, that a trust sought to be established in land in New York could not be enforced in a court in New Jersey. The case, however, was decided on other grounds.

The decision in Pickett v. Ferguson, 86 Tenn. 642, 8 S. W. 386, denying any relief under a bill to establish a resulting trust in land in Arkansas by reason of its purchase by defendant at a judicial sale while holding it under a lease from the complainant, was upon the ground that a resulting trust does not arise under such circumstances, and the question of the jurisdiction of the court of Tennessee to entertain such a suit, assuming the existence of a trust, was not decided. Upon the original hearing in the case, however, the court was of the opinion that it would not have jurisdiction of a suit to enforce a constructive trust based upon the mere relation of landlord and tenant in the absence of any actual fraud on the latter's part. It is said that the authorities limited the jurisdiction of the courts of equity to make decrees respecting land situated in other states or countries to cases of contract, trust, and fraud, and that the rationale of that limitation required that the contract, trust, and fraud, intended by the court in establishing the limitation, should be understood to be an express contract, a direct trust, an actual fraud; that the constructive trust arising from actual fraud should be classed under the head of "fraud" in the statement of the limitation. Upon a reconsideration of the case, however, the court came to the conclusion that the decision ought to be placed upon the fundamental ground already stated, and said that its former opinion was not to be regarded as a precedent.

While a court may, by virtue of its personal jurisdiction of the parties, declare and enforce a trust with respect to real property beyond the jurisdiction, a court of one state or country cannot, by its decree appointing a new trustee in the place of one named in a will, deed, or trust, affect the real property in another; and a conveyance by such substituted trustee is equally ineffectual.

Thus, a court of one jurisdiction cannot, by its decree appointing a new trustee in place of the one named in a will, affect the title to real property in another state. Corbett v. Nutt, 10 Wall. 464, 19 L. ed. 976.

A court of another state has no jurisdiction to appoint a trustee to convey property in the District of Columbia. And the decree appointing him, and his sale of the property thereunder, are an absolute nullity. Contee v. Lyons, 8 Mackey, 207.

A court of the state in which the testator was domiciled, and in which a will creating a trust estate in lands in Illinois was executed, cannot, by the appointment of a trustee in the place of the person designated in the will, who refused to serve, effect a transfer of title to such appointee. That court can only act in personam, and the outside limit of its powers would be to compel those having the legal title to convey it to the trustee after his appointment. West v. Fitz, 109 Ill. 425. The court, however, did not concede, except for the purposes of the argument, that the court of the testator's domicile would have the power to compel such a conveyance.

Glen v. Gibson, 9 Barb. 634, refused to recognize, or give any effect to, a decree of a court of Maryland appointing trustees in place of a deceased trustee, under a deed of trust relating to real property in New York, and directing them to carry out a contract of sale for such land. In this case, however, the trust estate vested in the court of chancery of New York upon the decease of the original trustee.

A sale of land in Ohio by a trustee substituted by a court of Virginia in place of the deceased trustee designated by the conveyance is invalid. Henry v. Doctor, 9 Ohio, 49.

The appointment of a trustee by the court of another state, in the place of a deceased trustee to whom land in Pennsylvania had been conveyed, vests no title in the trustee thus appointed so as to enable him to maintain ejectment for it, notwithstanding that the creator of the trust was domiciled in the other state. Williams v. Maus, 6 Watts, 278, 31 Am. Dec. 465.

Smith v. Davis, 90 Cal. 25, 25 Am. St. Rep. 92, 27 Pac. 26, however, held that a court of a state in which a trust deed respecting land in another state is executed may, if it has jurisdiction of the parties, appoint a new trustee to carry out the trust if the trustee named in the deed refuses to act, and the deed provides for the appointment of a new trustee in such event. The court said that, if the title to the realty does not vest in the new trustee, there is no basis whatever for the contention that the decree affects the title to real property; and that, if the title to the realty does vest in the trustee, it must be by operation of law, or by virtue of the contract of the parties, since the decree does not so provide, and does not purport ex proprio vigore to vest a title in the trustee.

It will be observed that the last case begs the question as to the effect of its decree, merely contenting itself with rendering the decree without concerning itself with the effect of the decree when rendered. Usually, however, as pointed out in supra, II., b, a court of equity does not assume jurisdiction of a suit, the purpose of which is to affect land in another state or country, unless its decree, when rendered, will be effective to accomplish the purpose for which the suit is brought. In other words, the courts will not go through the form of entertaining a suit for the purpose of rendering a decree which can have no practical effect.

In Barger v. Buckland, 28 Gratt. 850, where a deed of trust was executed to secure a debt on a tract of land which, at the time, was wholly within Virginia, but part of which was subsequently incorporated into West Virginia, the court, upon default of payment (there being no trustee to execute the contract of the parties to sell the land and pay the debt), decreed that, unless the grantor should pay the debt within a prescribed period, certain named persons should execute the trust by selling the land and applying the proceeds in payment of the debt.

In the subsequent case of Polindexter v. Burwell, 82 Va. 507, it was said that the decision in the last case might be taken at first glance as an exception to the rule that the courts of one state cannot decree a sale of lands lying in another; but that the case was distinguishable from the rule by reason of its peculiar circumstances.

b. Suit for specific performance.

See also Mariposa Co. v. Garrison, 26 How. Fr. 448, infra, III., h.

In Penn. v. Baltimore, 1 Ves. Sr. 444, 2 White & T. Lead. Cas. in Eq. 928,—one of the first cases which asserted the indirect jurisdiction of equity in respect of land beyond the territorial jurisdiction,—the chancellor decreed specific performance of articles executed in England concerning the boundaries of two provinces in America. And the specific performance of contracts relating to real property has since been one of the favorite subjects of this peculiar jurisdiction.

In Archer v. Preston, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 133, cited in 1 Vern. 77, the defendant coming into England, a bill was exhibited against him there to answer a contract made of land in Ireland; and, notwithstanding that the land lay in Ireland, and was under the act of settlement there, yet a ne exeat regno was granted, and process against him to answer; and when he afterwards went into Ireland without answering he was sent for by special order from the King, and made to answer the contempt and to abide the justice of the court.

So, courts, having personal jurisdiction of the parties, have frequently asserted and exercised jurisdiction to enforce specific performance upon the part of the vendor of contracts to convey land in another state or country, upon the ground that the decree in such case is in personam, and not in rem, and that the vendor may be compelled by process against the person to execute a conveyance which shall be sufficient, according to the law of the place where the land is situated, to pass the title. Montgomery v. United States, 36 Fed. 4; Smith v. Davis, 90 Cal. 25, 25 Am. St. Rep. 92, 27 Pac. 26 (obiter); Winn v. Strickland, 34 Fla. 610, 16 So. 606 (obiter); Cloud v. Greasley, 125 Ill. 313, 17 N. E. 826; Bethell v. Bethell, 92 Ind. 318 (obiter); Rea v. Ferguson (Iowa) 102 N. W. 778; Brown v. Desmond, 100 Mass. 267; Olney v. Eaton, 66 Mo. 563; Davis v. Headley, 22 N. J. Eq. 115; Potter v. Hollister, 45 N. J. Eq. 508, 18 Atl. 60 L. R. A.

Y. 587, 67 Am. Dec. 89; Burnley v. Stevenson, 24 Ohio St. 474, 15 Am. Rep. 621; Conover v. Wright, 9 Pa. Dist. R. 688; Johnson v. Kimbro, 3 Head, 557, 75 Am. Dec. 781 (obiter); Morris v. Hand, 70 Tex. 481, 8 S. W. 210; Montgomery v. Ruppensburg, 31 Ont. Rep. 433. See also Ward v. Arredondo, Hopk. Ch. 213, 14 Am. Dec. 543, supra, II., b.

In Episcopal Church v. Wiley, 2 Hill, Eq. 584, 30 Am. Dec. 386, it was held that a court of South Carolina may entertain a suit by the vendor, who tenders title deeds, to compel the specific performance by the purchaser of a contract for the purchase of lands in Georgia. Johnston, Chancellor, however, said that he was not prepared to go to the length of the decisions which hold that a defendant within the jurisdiction may be compelled to make conveyances or deliver possession of lands in foreign parts; and that he was inclined to think that he would not have sustained a bill by the purchaser against the vendor for specific performance. This intimation against the jurisdiction to compel specific performance upon the part of the vendor is clearly against the great weight of authority as shown above.

It is also settled that a suit will lie in one state by the vendor against the purchaser to enforce specific performance, although the land lies in another state. Garden City Sand Co. v. Miller, 157 Ill. 225, 41 N. E. 753; Robinson Mineral Spring Co. v. De Baulte, 50 La. Ann. 1281, 23 So. 865; Myers v. De Mier, 4 Daly, 343; Baldwin v. Talmadge, 7 Jones & S. 400. And see Episcopal Church v. Wiley, 2 Hill, Eq. 584, 30 Am. Dec. 386.

A court of equity may compel a purchaser of land specifically to perform his contract of purchase, although the land is situated abroad, and the contract was made and was to have been performed abroad, and the plaintiff is a nonresident; the defendant being duly served with process, and subject to the jurisdiction. Cleveland v. Burrill, 25 Barb. 532.

In a suit in the Federal courts for specific performance of telegraph right-of-way contracts with certain consolidated railroad companies, the necessary parties being subject to the court's jurisdiction, it is immaterial that a portion of the property affected is beyond the court's territorial jurisdiction. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Pittsburg, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 137 Fed. 435.

On a bill in equity for specific performance of an agreement to assign a bond for the conveyance of land in another state, the court will entertain jurisdiction against third persons residing in that state, who have taken a conveyance of the land pending the suit with notice of the plaintiff's rights, and, being made parties to the suit, have been served with process in the state, and have once appeared and answered without objecting to the jurisdiction. Pingree v. Coffin, 12 Gray, 288.

Penn v. Hayward, 14 Ohio St. 302, while conceding the general proposition that a court of one state may enforce specific performance of a contract to convey real property in another, refused to entertain such a suit, because only part of the persons by whom the conveyance must be executed in order to pass the complete title were personally subject to the juisdiction of the court, the others being non-residents, and not served personally within the state.

Willhite v. Skelton (Ind. Terr.) 82 S. W. 932, held that a court of Indian territory should not take jurisdiction of a suit to enforce the specific performance of an agreement for the joint purchase and operation of a lease of oil lands in Oklahoma, where the terms of the contract as respects the manner of working, the extent to which the operations should be carried on, and the consequent royalty, were such that they could not be enforced so as to do justice between the parties without the constant supervision of the court.

Kansas & E. R. Constr. Co. v. Topeka, S. & W. R. Co. 135 Mass. 34, 46 Am. Rep. 439, held that a suit would not lie in Massachusetts for the specific performance by a railroad company of a construction contract with the complainant, whereby the former agreed to deliver certain bonds and certificates of stock in payment of work to be performed by the complainant in a foreign state. The decision is upon the ground that the liabilities which the defendant is under in regard to the construction of the roadway in the other state, as well as those which the complainant has assumed, must be determined by the local law of that state, as administered by its appropriate tribunals; and that at every step such tribunals must have the right to determine, as occasions for intervention arise, whether the duty imposed upon the railroad company is being performed and the laws of the state observed.

Port Royal R. Co. v. Hammond, 58 Ga. 523, held that a court of Georgia would not entertain a suit for the specific performance of an agreement by a railroad company, a domestic corporation, with respect to opening ditches on complainant's land in South Carolina, keeping them open to a certain depth, and constructing and keeping in repair cattle guards thereon. The court said that, if the act required to be done on the part of the defendant, in the sufficient execution of the contract, were required to be performed in Georgia, there would not seem to be any well-founded objection to the jurisdiction of the court, notwithstanding that the land was situated in another state.

c. Suit to remove cloud upon title; to cancel void mortgage.

See also Monnett v. Turple, 132 Ind. 482, 32 N. E. 328, infra, III., g. 1.

A United States court sitting in one state having personal jurisdiction of the defendant may entertain a suit to remove a cloud on the title of real property in another, the case being one of asserted fraud, or of a constructive trust created by operation of law. Briggs v. French, 1 Sumn. 504, Fed. Cas. No. 1,870.

A court of equity having jurisdiction of the parties has also jurisdiction to compel defendant to release and discharge an apparent cloud upon the title to land situated in another state. Remer v. Mackay, 35 Fed. 86. The court said: A suit to remove a cloud upon title is a proceeding in equity, and equity, as a rule, operates wholly in personam. It operates upon the conscience of the defendant by decreeing him to do, or refrain from doing, some special act; and the general effect and scope of a decree in a court of equity is aimed at the voli-tion or conscience of the defendant. The court, therefore, having jurisdiction of the defendant, can direct its decree upon him, and compel him to do what is equitable and right, under the circumstances. The court is not asked to pass upon the title to the land, but only to say whether the defendant shall be compelled to release and discharge an apparent cloud upon title if the court shall find that in equity he ought to do so.

A court of chancery of one state having personal jurisdiction of all the necessary defendants may entertain a suit for the establishment of the right of the complainant to a tract of land in another state, and, as an incident of that relief, to restrain the defendants from interfering with the complainant's possession, and for a removal of their claim as a cloud upon the complainant's title. Kirklin v. Atlas Sav. & L. Asso. (Tenn. Ch. App.) 60 S. W. 149.

A court of Indiana, having personal jurisdiction of the parties, has power to declare a note and a mortgage securing the same void, because executed by a married woman as security for a debt of her husband, and to enjoin defendant from attempting to enforce either the note or mortgage, although the mortgaged land lies in another state. Ft. Wayne Trust Co. v. Sihler (Ind. App.) 72 N. E. 494.

A court of equity of one state has jurisdiction to compel the defendant to cancel and execute a discharge of a mortgage upon land in another, given to secure a usurious contract. Williams v. Fitzhugh, 37 N. Y. 444.

A court of one state has the right and power, in a proper case, to decree a mortgage upon real estate void for usury, and to compel the party holding it to surrender it up to be canceled, although the lands mortgaged lie in another state. Williams v. Ayrault, 31 Barb. 368.

It will be observed that the jurisdiction of a suit to remove a cloud on the title of real property beyond the territorial jurisdiction depends upon the proposition that such a suit is, or at least may be, a suit in personam, and not in rem; and support for this proposition is found in Hart v. Sanson, 110 U. S. 151, 28 L. ed. 101, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 586, which held that the decree in such a case, unless otherwise provided by statute, is clearly not in rem, establishing a title in land, but operates in personam only by restraining the defendant from asserting his claim, and by directing him to deliver up his deed to be canceled, or to execute a release to the plaintiff; and, because the decree, in the absence of statute, is in personam and not in rem, the court denied the power to render such a decree, even with respect to land within the jurisdiction, upon constructive service against a nonresident.

d. Foreclosure of mortgage or other lien.

It is clear that a court of equity may entertain a suit for the strict foreclosure of a mortgage upon land in another state or country, since a decree in personam is entirely adequate for the purpose.

A court in New York having jurisdiction of the parties may maintain an action for the strict foreclosure of a mortgage upon lands in another state. House v. Lockwood, 40 Hun. 532.

A foreclosure decree being a decree in per- sonam depriving the mortgagor of his personal right to redeem, an English court of chancery has jurisdiction to make such a decree in respect to a mortgage between an English mortgagor and mortgagee upon land in one of the colonies. Paget v. Ede, L. R. 18 Eq. 118. The decision was upon the assumption that the legal title was in the mortgagee, and that the mortgagor merely had an equity of redemption, which was not, in the proper technical legal sense, an estate in the land.

A court of equity in England having jurisdiction of the person of the defendant may entertain a bill to require him to redeem a mortgage upon land outside of England, or be foreclosed. Toller v. Carteret, 2 Vern. 495.

But, a power of sale in a mortgage on land without the state, and proceedings under it, are not regulated by the New York statutes with reference to the foreclosure of mortgages by advertisement. Elliott v. Wood, 45 N. Y. 71.

Because of the principle referred to in IV., infra, that a sale or conveyance of real property in one state or country by a master, or commissioner, or other officer appointed by a court of another state or country, is entirely ineffectual, it has sometimes been supposed that a court of one state or country has no jurisdiction of a suit for the foreclosure of a mortgage upon land in another, if a judicial sale is necessary in order to make the decree of foreclosure effectual; and this principle would be fatal to the jurisdiction, in such a case. If the court were limited to a decree directing the sale of the property. But, while that is the usual form of a decree of foreclosure when the property is within the territorial jurisdiction, the court may add to it a direction that the mortgagor, or the owner of the equity of redemption, shall convey or release his title to the purchaser at the sale. While, therefore, a decree of foreclosure in the usual form, merely directing a sale of the property, is of itself void, and without effect so far as property beyond the territorial jurisdiction is concerned, the jurisdiction of a court of one state or country to decree a sale under a mortgage of property used as an entirety, lying in part in the state in which the suit is brought and in part in another state or states, and to direct the mortgagor or owner of the equity of redemption to execute a deed to the purchaser, has been upheld in a number of cases.

Thus, in a foreclosure of a mortgage upon a railroad lying partly in one state and partly in another, a court of equity in one state may decree a sale of the entire road lying in both states, and direct a deed to the purchaser. Muller v. Dows, 94 U. S. 444, 24 L. ed. 207. The action was brought in a Federal court sitting in Iowa, and the decree covered a part of the line in Missouri, as well as the part in Iowa. The decree directed a sale of the entire property covered by the mortgage, directed the master to execute a good and sufficient deed to the purchaser, declared that the defendants be barred and foreclosed from all interest in the property, directed the mortgagor to surrender to the purchaser the property sold and conveyed upon the execution, approval, and delivery of the master's deed, and, as a further assurance, directed the mortgagor to execute a deed of the property to the purchaser. The decision is expressly referred to the general principle that a court of equity, having jurisdiction of the person, may decree a conveyance by him of land in another state, and may enforce the decree by process.

A United States circuit court has jurisdiction of a suit to foreclose a mortgage upon a bridge located partly in Texas and partly in Mexico, as to that portion of the bridge lying in Mexico. International Bridge & Tramway Co. v. Holland Trust Co. 26 C. C. A. 469, 52 U. S. App. 240, 81 Fed. 422. The suit was brought by the trustee named in the mortgage, and the decree directed a sale by a master; and the bridge company, its officers and directors, were required to execute conveyances, good and sufficient under the laws of Texas, to the purchaser for such part of the property as was situated in that state, and good and sufficient conveyances, according to the law of Mexico, for such of the property as was in Mexico.

A court of chancery has jurisdiction of a bill for the foreclosure of a railroad mortgage, although embracing property out of the state as well as property within it. Mead v. New York, H. & N. R. Co. 45 Conn. 199.

A court having jurisdiction over a railroad corporation owning a continuous line located partly in the state and partly in an adjoining state may, in the exercise of its equitable powers, make a decree foreclosing a mortgage upon the road with respect to the property situated in both states; and may effectuate the decree by directing a sale of the whole property, and an execution of the proper conveyance to the purchaser by the receiver, the trustee, and the mortgagor. McTighe v. Macon Constr. Co. 94 Ga. 306, 32 L. R. A. 208, 47 Am. St. Rep. 153, 21 S. E. 701.

A state court has jurisdiction, where all the parties in interest are before it, to direct a sale as an entirety, under a power in a mortgage, of a canal and its franchises extending into another state; but, if the portion within that state is in the possession of receivers appointed therein, a concurring or ancillary decree must be obtained before a sale can be had. Brown v. Chesapeake & O. Canal Co. 73 Md. 567.

That a portion of a railroad covered by a mortgage lies in another state does not deprive a court of New York of jurisdiction of a suit to foreclose the mortgage. The decree of foreclosure cannot be directly executed in a foreign state; but the mortgagor, if subject to the jurisdiction, can be ordered to execute a conveyance in aid of the sale under it in the performance of a covenant for further assurance. Union Trust Co. v. Olmsted, 102 N. Y. 729, 7 N. E. 822.

The decree rendered by the supreme court in the last case was an ordinary decree of foreclosure, and the property in both states was sold in pursuance thereof. The court of appeals held that the order requiring the mortgagor to convey could be made after the report of sale and by way of amendment to the decree.

An ordinary decree of foreclosure of a mortgage, directing the sale of the part of the mortgaged premises that are situated in another state, as well as those that are situated in the state in which the decree is rendered, may be amended, even after a sale, by a provision requiring the mortgagor to execute to the purchaser a deed of the mortgaged property lying outside the state. Ibid.

A court has jurisdiction of an action to foreclose a mortgage upon land located partly in the state and partly in another state, and may, when the mortgagors are residents of the state, and have personally been served with process therein, provide in the decree that the referee shall sell all the mortgaged land, and that the mortgagors shall convey the land in the other state to the purchaser. Mead v. Brockner 82 App. Div. 480, 81 N. Y. Supp. 594. The court said that the principle upon which the jurisdiction is exercised in such cases is that, while a court of equity has no power to transfer the title to the alien land by a judgment in rem, it can compel a conveyance by a decree in personam against a party who holds the title, and over whom it has acquired jurisdiction. The reason for its exercise is found in the necessity and convenience of disposing of property by a single sale where it cannot be advantageously sold in fragments, and it is quite as applicable in kind, if not in degree, to the case of a house and lot, or of a farm situated in two adjoining states, as to the case of a railroad.

A court having jurisdiction of the trustee under a mortgage covering railroad property in two or more states may, by its decree operating upon the trustee himself, authorize him to sell and convey whatever interest of the railroad company will pass under the terms of the mortgage, wherever the property may be situated. McElrath v. Pittsburg & S. R. Co. 55 Pa. 189.

King v. Tuscumbia, C. & D. R. Co. Fed. Cas. No. 7,808, denied the jurisdiction of a district court of the United States sitting in Alabama to decree foreclosure and sale of land in Mississippi under a mortgage. The court said that it might, in a proper case, compel the railroad company to convey to the complainants, but that it could make no decree which would operate directly upon the land, and that it therefore could not decree a foreclosure, nor a sale of the land lying in Mississippi.

Guarantee Trust & S. D. Co. v. Delta & P. Land Co. 43 C. C. A. 396, 104 Fed. 5, held that a sale of lands owned by a railroad company in Mississippi, by a master or commissioner appointed by a decree rendered in a United States circuit court for the western district of Tennessee, in a suit to foreclose a mortgage upon the property, does not affect the title, since the court had no jurisdiction to decree the sale. The case is distinguished from Muller v. Dows, 94 U. S. 444, 24 L. ed. 207, supra, upon the ground that in the latter case the sale was made at the instance of the trustees in the mortgage, who, notwithstanding the appeal, could be directed by the trial court to join in a conveyance; and that the mortgagor was required to execute a deed of assurance to the purchaser at the sale; whereas, in the case at bar the action was brought by a bondholder, and there was no deed of assurance either by the trustees or by the mortgagor. It is further pointed out that the property involved in the case at bar did not constitute a part of the railroad, but was wild and uncultivated land. This fact in itself, however, would not seem to be sufficient to distinguish the case, on principle, from the Muller Case, though it is obvious that there is a greater necessity for the exercise of the power to decree a sale of so much of the property as is within another state when the property constitutes a part of the line of the road, than when it is not a part of such line; and, therefore, such fact 69 L. R. A.

might affect the court's discretion as to the assumption of jurisdiction.

A decree of foreclosure rendered in New York, and a deed executed by a referee appointed pursuant to that decree, covering real property in New York and Connecticut, are invalid so far as the property in Connecticut is concerned, since the courts of the state in which land is situated will not recognize the right of the courts in other states to affect directly the title to real estate in the former. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Postal Teleg. Co. 53 Conn. 334, 3 Am. St. Rep. 53, 11 Atl. 184. The decree in this case was simply the ordinary decree of foreclosure and sale, without any direction for a conveyance by the mortgagor or owner of the equity of redemption to the purchaser at the sale; and the decision is, therefore, not inconsistent with those above cited which sustain the jurisdiction.

A decree of sale of real property upon foreclosure of a mortgage and a deed made in pursuance of it are ineffective to pass the title to real property in another state, whether the sale is made through the instrumentality of some officer designated by statute, or appointed by the court. Pittsburgh & State Line R. Co. v. Rothschild, 8 Sadler (Pa.) 83, 4 Atl. 385. This decision seems to be explainable in the same way as the preceding one.

In the two cases next cited the court seems to have been of the opinion that it was impossible to make a decree of foreclosure effective with respect to property beyond the jurisdiction, though neither expressly denies the power to make the decree thus effective by the requisition of a conveyance or release from mortgagor or owner of the equity of redemption.

The courts of Ohio have no jurisdiction to enforce the remedy of bondholders by the foreclosure of a mortgage upon the part of a railroad in another state. Eaton & H. R. Co. v. Hunt, 20 Ind. 457. The court said that, although the court of one state may act in personam upon an individual touching real property owned by him in another state, even to ordering him to sell it, yet, if he refuses obedience to the order, the court cannot appoint a commissioner to make the sale in his stead, and is powerless to effect the sale.

A court of New York has no jurisdiction, in a suit for foreclosure of a mortgage covering real property situated in New York and other states, and used as an entirety by a telegraph company, to decree a sale of so much of the property as is situated beyond the limits of the state. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Bankers' & M. Teleg. Co. 44 Hun, 400. The decree in this case, in addition to the direction of a sale, adjudged that the purchaser of the property should be let into the possession and enjoyment thereof, and that every person in possession thereof should surrender the same upon the production of the referee's deed, and that the purchaser should hold and enjoy the property. The court intimated that there was no way in which such provision could be enforced or made effective.

In Cook v. Welgley (N. J. Eq.) 59 Atl. 1029, it seems to be assumed that the jurisdiction of a suit in New Jersey to foreclose a mortgage upon an island in the Hudson river was dependent upon whether the island, under the boundary agreement between New York and New Jersey, was within the latter's jurisdiction. As a matter of fact, however, it was held that the defendants were already precluded as to the jurisdictional question by the foreclosure decree.

Whether or not the parties to a mortgage covering real property in New York and other states may, with respect to the property in New York, exclude the jurisdiction of the court to foreclose the mortgage by an express provision therein making a sale of the premises by the mortgagee the exclusive remedy in case of default in payment, they may do so with respect to land in the other states in the absence of statutes of such other states upon the subject. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Bankers' & M. Teleg. Co. 44 Hun, 400.

A court of a province has no power to order a sale as an entirety of a division of a railway, part of which is within and part without its jurisdiction. Grey v. Manitoba & N. W. R. Co. [1897; P. C.] A. C. 254, 66 L. J. P. C. N. S. 66. The court said in this case: "The thing asked for by the bill is a judicial sale of land partly within and partly out of the jurisdiction as an entire thing, and with specific directions by the court. It is impossible to do that; the decree of the court below does not do it directly, and it has been hardly more than suggested at the bar that there is any principle or authority to justify it." The question was not presented as to the power to grant a decree directing a sale of land beyond the jurisdiction, in connection with a decree requiring a conveyance by the mortgagor or owner of the equity of redemption to the purchaser at the sale.

In Strange v. Radford, 15 Ont. Rep. 145, an action in Ontario for sale, for delivery of possession, and for relief under a covenant in a mortgage upon land in Manitoba, the court said that the plaintiff might have a judgment of foreclosure, as such judgment would operate in personam to extinguish the mortgagor's personal right of redemption; but that the court would not go further and decree a sale of the property.

A suit to foreclose a lien created by the transfer to plaintiff, as collateral security, of a receipt evidencing the ownership of an equitable estate in common in lands in New York, is in rem and local, and cannot, therefore, be maintained in Michigan. Richard v. Boyd, 124 Mich. 396, 83 N. W. 106. The Michigan statute provides that actions for the recovery of any real estate, or for the recovery of the possession of real estate, shall be tried in the county where the subject of the action shall be situated.

It will be observed that in the cases above cited, which sustained the jurisdiction of a court of one state or country of a suit to foreclose a mortgage in respect of real property in another state or country, the property in question was part of a parcel used as an entirety, and another part of which was within the territorial jurisdiction of the court; and such fact to some extent undoubtedly qualifies and limits those decisions. As a matter of principle, however, and so far as the absolute right to take jurisdiction is concerned, it would seem to make no difference whether all, or only part, of the property covered by the mortgage is beyond the territorial jurisdiction. When, however, the mortgaged property, which is used as an entirety, is partly within and partly without the territorial jurisdiction, the inconvenience and disadvantage of selling it in parcels furnish a strong reason for the exercise of discretion in favor of the jurisdiction,—a reason which is lacking when the entire mortgaged property is beyond the territorial jurisdiction.

Thus, Eaton v. McCall, 86 Me. 346, 41 Am. St. Rep. 561, 29 Atl. 1103, asserted the jurisdiction of a court in a proper case to foreclose a mortgage upon land in another state, and to make the decree effective by a deed requiring the mortgagor to convey; but held that the court will not exercise such jurisdiction where the entire property is situated without the state, and no reason is shown why the mortgage cannot be foreclosed according to the laws of the place where the land is situated, without loss or inconvenience.

e. Suit to redeem.

An action may be maintained in New York which is substantially to redeem from a forfeiture in a lease of land in another state; and the court will confer the final relief of possession, and may, as an incident, decree defendant to deliver up possession of the land to the owner. Chase v. Knickerbocker Phosphate Co. 32 App. Div. 400, 53 N. Y. Supp. 220.

A court having jurisdiction of the parties may relieve against the forfeiture of a lease of mining property in another state for nonpayment of rent, although it cannot restore the property to the possession of the lessee. Sunday Lake Min. Co. v. Wakefield, 72 Wis. 204, 39 N. W. 136.

It was held in Henderson v. Bank of Hamilton, 23 Can. S. C. 716, however, that a court of Ontario had no jurisdiction of a suit, by one who had recovered a judgment in Manitoba, which, being registered, was, by virtue of a statute of Manitoba, a lien upon real property there, to redeem from a prior mortgage upon the land. The decision was upon the ground that the charge upon the land was exclusively a real right, affecting the lands, unaccompanied by any personal liability or equity enforceable in personam; and that the courts of Manitoba restrict the right which they give in such cases to a sale of the lands.

f. Suit to reform deed; or to have deed declared a mortgage.

A court of one state has jurisdiction of a suit to reform a deed of land in another state by incorporating therein a personal covenant of seisin. Bethell v. Bethell, 92 Ind. 318. The decision is upon the ground that a decree correcting a mistake operates upon the contract and parties; and, where the contract is made in the state where the parties reside, the suit to reform it is properly brought in that state.

A court of equity of the state in which the parties reside has jurisdiction to decree that a deed, absolute in form, to property in another state, is, in effect, a mortgage merely. Reed v. Reed, 75 Me. 264.

So, Clark v. Seagraves, 186 Mass. 430, 71 N. E. 813, held that a bill would lie in Massachusetts to have a deed absolute on its face declared a mortgage, and to redeem therefrom, though the land lay outside the state, particularly where the deed was made in and between citizens of the state; since such a bill is one for relief against fraud, and is not a bill dealing with the title to an estate in land.

A. 79, 7 Am. St. Rep. 802, 15 Atl. 379, seems to assume that a bill to have a deed absolute on its face declared a mortgage, and to redeem therefrom, would lie in one state in respect of land in another, and that a reconveyance pursuant to the decree in such a case would be effectual; although it held that a decree rendered by a court of Pennsylvania, having jurisdiction of the parties, which declared that a deed of land in New Jersey, absolute on its face, was intended as a mortgage, and that the defendant secured had been paid, and which directed the executor of the deceased grantee to execute and deliver to the grantor a deed of reconveyance, though conclusive within Pennsylvania, could not be allowed to affect the title to the lands, and did not extinguish the grantee's title, in the absence of a conveyance pursuant to the decree.

Gunn v. Harper, 30 Ont. Rep. 650, while conceding that a bill would lie in Ontario to have a deed absolute on its face declared a mortgage, and for redemption, although the land affected was out of the province, if the action were against the original grantee alone, held that the suit would not lie where the original grantee had conveyed to other persons. The decision is upon the ground that the jurisdiction in case of land beyond the territorial jurisdiction is confined to cases in which there is either a contract between the parties, or something in the nature of a trust.

g. Relief from fraud.

1. As between parties or privies.

A court of equity of one state or country, having personal jurisdiction of the parties may grant relief to a party who has been fraudulently deprived of the title, or evidence of title, to real property in another state or country, by requiring a reconveyance.

Thus, it was held by Lord Chancellor Nottingham, in Arglasse v. Muschamp, 1 Vern. 75, that courts of equity in England may relieve against conveyances obtained by fraud, on land in Ireland. The decision was affirmed on rehearing by Lord Keeper North (1 Vern. 135), who said that the objection that the court was deficient in power to compel a performance of its decree because it could not sequester the lands in question was of no weight; and it did not appear but that the defendant had lands in England, and then those would be subject to a sequestration.

It was held in King v. Pillow, 90 Tenn. 287, 16 S. W. 469, that a court of chancery may compel a grantor within its jurisdiction to supply a conveyance to a tract of land in Arkansas, a deed of which he had obtained possession fraudulently, and destroyed after delivery.

The same position was taken in Pillow v. King, 55 Ark. 633, 18 S. W. 764, which held that the Tennessee court had jurisdiction to grant the decree involved in the last case.

McGee v. Sweeney, 84 Cal. 100, 23 Pac. 1117, held that a court of California, by reason of its control over the parties, had jurisdiction of a suit to have a deed to real property in Pennsylvania declared void, and for a reconveyance.

A court of Michigan, having jurisdiction of the person of defendant, has jurisdiction of a suit by the grantor to set aside a deed, and compel a reconveyance of land in Missouri on the ground of fraud. Noble v. Grandin, 125 Mich. 383, 84 N. W. 465. The court cites 60 L. R. A.

Roberts v. Roberts, 124 Mich. 414, 83 N. W. 132, to the effect that a suit to compel the production of a deed could be maintained in another county than where the lands lay, notwithstanding Mich. Comp. Laws, § 434, providing that a suit in chancery shall be commenced in the circuit court for the county in which the property in dispute is situated, if the subject matter is local.

In D'Ivernois v. Leavitt, 23 Barb. 63, involving an assignment for creditors, made in New York, covering real property in another state, the court said: "The rights relating to the acquisition, enjoyment, and disposition of real property are prescribed and regulated exclusively by the laws of the country in which the property is situated. Every community, independent and sovereign, possesses this power as an inherent and essential element of its sovereignty. No other community can interfere with the method by which real property may be acquired or lost, the tenure by which it may be held, the duration or quantity of interest in it, or the conditions to which the enjoyment of it is subject; but an instrument purporting to dispose of real property situated in another state or country may, nevertheless, be within the reach of the laws of the state in which the instrument is executed, and may be assailed on the ground, for instance, that the instrument was in fraud of its own citizens, or that it was obtained fraudulently from the grantor."

Mussina v. Alling, 11 La. Ann. 568, held that a court of Louisiana had no jurisdiction to compel a reconveyance of land in Texas upon the ground of fraud, although the defendant was within its jurisdiction. The court, while conceding that the courts of Louisiana have both common-law and equity jurisdiction in the sense that they are generally competent to afford such relief to parties as may be demanded in a judicial proceeding, either at law or in chancery, in those states which recognize the English division of remedies, said that it did not follow that all the prerogatives claimed by courts of common law and courts of chancery, and all artificial rules and peculiar dogmas, should be usurped by the courts of Louisiana. This decision, however, seems to have been overruled by Selxas v. King, 39 La. Ann. 510, 2 So. 416, infra.

In Monnett v. Turple, 132 Ind. 482, 32 N. E. 328, the plaintiff prayed a judgment disaffirming and canceling deeds to real property in other states, and asked that the title to lands by decree of the court be reinvested in the plaintiff, free and discharged from all claims of the defendants, upon the ground that the deeds were procured fraudulently and without consideration from the grantor, who was at the time a person of unsound mind. The only point involved in the appeal arose from the action of the trial court in refusing to grant the plaintiff a trial by jury; and the correctness of that ruling turned upon the question whether the action was one to quiet title, in which case, under the provision of the Code, it was triable by jury, or an action for the cancellation of the deeds, in which case it would fall within the exclusive jurisdiction of a court of equity, and therefore be triable by the court without a jury. The court said that the fact that the land lay beyond the territorial jurisdiction conclusively characterized the action as one for equitable relief, since it would be wholly beyond the jurisdiction of the courts of the state to quiet the title to such land, whereas in an action in equity the court having jurisdiction of the person is able, by process against the defendants in personam, to enforce its decrees affecting land without, as well as within, the state.

A court of New York, having jurisdiction of the parties, may entertain a suit by the stockholders of a corporation to have declared void the action of such corporation, and of another corporation controlled by the same directors, in canceling a lease of real property in Mexico. Jacobs v. Mexican Sugar Ref. Co. 104 App. Div. 242, 93 N. Y. Supp. 776. The court said that the plaintiffs did not ask, nor could they have obtained, a judgment which would give them possession of the property.

Some of the cases that concede the jurisdiction of a court of equity of one state or country, having personal jurisdiction of the parties to grant relief from a conveyance, obtained by fraud, of land in another state or country, take the position that the decree must be in the form of one compelling the reconveyance, and that a decree merely canceling the conveyance which is attacked on the ground of fraud, would be beyond the power of the court.

Thus, in Cooley v. Scarlett, 38 Ill. 316, 87 Am. Dec. 298, the court said that it could not affirm a decree canceling, upon the ground of fraud, deeds to real property upon land in another state; but that the decree might be remodeled so as to bring it within the principles of chancery jurisdiction, and still afford some protection to the complainant. It then said that the court could compel the defendants, who were personally within the jurisdiction of the court, to execute to the complainant a release of all claims acquired through the deed from him; and that, if they refused to do so, they could be attached for contempt, and held in custody until they should execute the decree; and that if, in the meantime, it should be made to appear that they were seeking to encumber titles by conveyances to third persons, that also might be treated as a contempt for which the court could attach and punish them; and that, if they went beyond the jurisdiction, the court could appoint a special commissioner to make the conveyance in their stead.

A court of Kentucky has no jurisdiction to render a judgment declaring a deed to real property in New Jersey void; and has no jurisdiction to decree a conveyance or delivery of possession founded on that decree. Davis v. Headley, 22 N. J. Eq. 115. The judgment in this case, which the court of New Jersey refused to recognize or enforce, not only declared that the conveyance should be set aside and held for naught, but also provided that the grantee should be restrained from setting up that conveyance in any suit touching the property.

Seixas v. King, 39 La. Ann. 510, 2 So. 416, overruled an exception to the jurisdiction of a court of Louisiana over a suit against a resident of Louisiana to annul a transfer of real estate in Mississippi. It is implied, however, that the decree must be in the form of a personal decree against the defendant compelling a conveyance, rather than a direct decree in rem annulling the conveyance, to the defendant.

In De Klyn v. Watkins, 3 Sandf. Ch. 185, however, where it was held that a court of equity of one state has jurisdiction of a suit to set aside a conveyance of land in another upon the ground of fraud, the court said that it was difficult to perceive how a bill to set aside a conveyance of land situated abroad related to the title of the land, any more than a bill to have a conveyance decreed; that in each case the object is to divest the title from the person who holds it, and in each case it is attained in the same mode, by process of the court against the person of the owner.

So, in Guerrant v. Fowler, 1 Hen. & M. 5, it was held that a person being within the commonwealth may be decreed to execute a conveyance for lands lying in another state, or to cancel a deed for such lands, obtained by fraud.

But a decree of a court of another state which had jurisdiction of the parties, declaring an exchange of lands void, and requiring reconveyances, does not of itself, and in the absence of conveyances pursuant to the decree, divest the title to land in Texas. Fryer v. Meyers (Tex.) 13 S. W. 1025.

Nor are the parties who procured the decree estopped to assert the title to the land conveyed to them in the exchange, they never having complied with the terms of the decree, nor claimed the lands which they conveyed in the exchange. Ibid.

A court of Texas has jurisdiction of a suit to rescind a sale of land therein on the ground of fraud and lack of consideration, notwithstanding that the purported consideration was the conveyance of land in Tennessee to which, it is alleged, the defendant had no title, and which therefore constituted no consideration for the conveyance of the land in Texas. Paul v. Chenault (Tex. Civ. App.) 59 S. W. 579. The objection made to the jurisdiction was that it involved an inquiry into the title of land in Tennessee, and that the court had no jurisdiction to determine that issue. The court, however, overruled the demurrer to the jurisdiction, and proceeded to pass upon the title to the Tennessee land for the purposes of the suit.

The decision in Cumberland Coal & I. Co. v. Hoffman Steam Coal Co. 30 Barb. 159, that a court of New York would not entertain a suit between two Maryland corporations to annul a conveyance of land in the latter state on the ground of fraud, the conveyance having been executed and acknowledged in Maryland and put upon record there, is not referable to general principles, but to a provision of the Code defining the rights of nonresidents to bring actions against foreign corporations.

In Blake v. Blake, 18 Week. Rep. 944, where the bill was filed to set aside certain deeds relating exclusively to property in Ireland, the parties being residents of Ireland, and the contract out of which the litigation arose having been made there, the court sustained a plea to the jurisdiction, upon the ground that the matter should be decided by the courts of Ireland. Some parts of the opinion in this case indicate that the court declined jurisdiction as a matter of discretion; but it is stated in the report of the case that the defendants were served out of the jurisdiction, and it is not stated that they appeared in the case except to plead to the jurisdiction; and the opinion states that the case is governed by Cookney v. Anderson, 32 L. J. Ch. N. S. 305, Affirmed in 32 L. J. Ch. N. S. 427 (supra, II., c), which would seem to indicate that the decision was upon the ground that the defendants were not personally subject to the jurisdiction.

2. As between one party and creditors of the other.

As shown in the last subdivision, the requisition of a reconveyance affords an adequate means of granting relief from a fraudulent conveyance of real property in another jurisdiction, when the suit is between the parties to the original conveyance, or their privies. The situation is quite different when the suit is by creditors of a grantor, seeking to set aside a conveyance of real property in another jurisdiction as a fraud upon them, since the creditors, even if successful in maintaining their contention, are not entitled to a decree requiring the conveyance of the land to them, but at most are only entitled to a decree which will subject the land to the payment of their claims; and it is difficult to work out this relief by a decree in personam. According to the weight of authority, therefore, a creditor of the grantor cannot maintain a bill in one state or country to set aside a conveyance of land in another, upon the ground that the conveyance was fraudulent as to him.

Thus, a suit will not lie by a judgment creditor in one state to set aside a conveyance by the judgment debtor of land in another state, as a fraud upon the judgment creditor. Gray v. Folwell, 57 N. J. Eq. 446, 41 Atl. 869. The court said that it was quite beyond the power of the court to make any decree which would subject the land outside of the state to the lien, or by any decree apply it to the payment of the judgment.

A judgment creditor's suit cannot be brought in New York, founded upon a judgment in New York, to affect lands of the judgment debtor situated in another state, on the ground that the debtor had fraudulently conveyed them away. Nicholson v. Leavitt, 4 Sandf. 252. This was before the adoption of the Code, and the decision is upon the ground that a judgment creditor's suit proceeds on the footing of a lien, and that there is no such lien under a New York judgment with respect to lands in another state. The court said that it might be that, under the broad provisions of the Code, a judgment creditor may reach the real property of the debtor out of the state.

Lide v. Parker, 60 Ala. 163, held that the Alabama statute, enabling a creditor without a lien to file a bill to subject to the payment of his debt property fraudulently conveyed by his debtor, did not apply to realty in another state.

West Point Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Allen (Ala.) 39 So. 351, is to the same effect as the last case. An execution creditor cannot maintain a suit in a court of the defendant's domicile to set aside conveyances of land beyond the jurisdiction, upon the ground that they were fraudulent as against creditors. Burns v. Davidson, 21 Ont. Rep. 547. The court said: "Where fraud exists in respect to specific property out of the jurisdiction, whereby in conscience it should be the property of the rightful claimant as against the fraudulent holder, these being within the jurisdiction, a court of equity can decree according to the equities, and operate on the person of the defendant so that he shall convey the land to the one entitled. But where the manner of relief is, as here, not to order conveyances inter partes, but to subject land to the exigencies of execution, then no personal judgment can touch the real result to be accomplished. The distinction which separates between cases of fraud where the court will act and will not act is marked by Lord Nottingham in a case of Carteret v. Petty, 2 Swanst. 323, note. He said this court could proceed to a decree where the imprisonment of the person is the most proper means to effect that which is decreed to be done, viz., the payment of money, making a conveyance, or the like. But where no obedience of the person imprisoned, or any act of his, can sufficiently execute such a decree, then it is in vain to hold such a plea."

In the subsequent case of Pavey v. Davidson, 23 Ont. App. Rep. 9, involving the same transaction that was considered in the last case, it appeared that the grantee of the property had given back a mortgage, containing a covenant for payment; and the attempt in this case was not to set aside the conveyance, but to have the mortgagee declared a trustee, for the execution debtor, of the mortgage debt and the moneys secured thereby. The majority of the court of appeals were of the opinion that the action could be maintained, notwithstanding that the mortgaged land was situated in a foreign jurisdiction. The decision was upon the ground that no relief was sought in respect of the mortgaged land, but that it was the debt that was sought to be reached; and the fact that it was secured by lands in another jurisdiction was a mere incident.

This decision was, however, reversed on appeal by the supreme court of Canada (Purdum v. Pavey, 26 Can. S. C. 412). It is difficult to determine the exact ground of the supreme court's decision. In one part of the opinion, it seems to be put upon the ground that the bill sought a declaration of trust, not of the debt alone, but of the security,—that is, of the foreign lands so far as they were a security; in another part, however, the court said that the validity or invalidity of the transaction must depend upon the lex rei sitæ, and that there was no allegation that, according to that law, a constructive trust by operation of law would arise by reason of the intent to hinder or delay creditors, or that even an express trust must necessarily inure to the benefit, or be available to the satisfaction, of creditors; and that no presumption to that effect could be indulged. This would seem to indicate that the plaintiff must fail on the merits even, and without reference to the jurisdiction; but the court said in this connection that, from the fact alone that the question depended upon the lex rei sitæ, it followed that the forum of the situs was the proper forum.

Carpenter v. Strange, 141 U. S. 87, 35 L. ed. 640, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 980, held that a decree of a court of New York which had personal jurisdiction of the parties, declaring a deed executed by testator to real property in Tennessee void as to a debt due by testator to plaintiff, but not directing a conveyance of the land, nor in any other way attempting to exert control over defendant with respect to land, was not binding upon the courts of Tennessee.

Kirdahl v. Basha, 36 Misc. 715, 74 N. Y. Supp. 383, upheld the jurisdiction of a court of New York over a suit in equity by a judgment creditor to have a mortgage, executed by the debtor upon land in New Jersey, declared fraudulent and void, and to compel the mortgagee to execute and deliver a satisfaction of it, and restraining both mortgagor and mortgagee from transferring or assigning any interest in the land pending an action in a New Jersey court to obtain satisfaction of the judgment out of the land in that state. The decision, which rests upon the idea that a decree compelling a release of the mortgage operates in personam, is of doubtful authority, since such a release would extinguish the mortgage, which, at the most, is only invalid as against the judgment creditor, and is valid as between the parties to it.

In Jones v. Geddes, 1 Phill. Ch. 724, where a bill was filed by assignees of a bankrupt to set aside, on the ground of fraud, a heritable bond charged upon the real estate in Scotland, and to enjoin defendants from prosecuting a process of ranking and sale for the enforcement of the bond, which they had commenced in a court of Scotland, the Lord Chancellor said that, the parties being residents of England, the English court of chancery might take jurisdiction; but, in the exercise of discretion, he declined to entertain the suit because the matter could be more conveniently litigated in Scotland.

b. Injunction.

App.) 60 S. W. 149; Ft. Wayne Trust Co. v. Sihler (Ind. App.) 72 N. E. 494.—supra, III., c; Kirdahi v. Basha, 36 Misc. 715, 74 N. Y. Supp. 388, supra, III., g. 2; Bowers v. Durant, 43 Hun, 348, infra, III., j.

An injunction is strictly in personam; and therefore, if a proper case for an injunction is otherwise made out, jurisdiction of the court to grant the same will not be defeated by the fact that it has reference to real property beyond the territorial jurisdiction.

A court of equity of Illinois has jurisdiction of a bill to enjoin defendant from interfering with the right of way claimed by the complainant over land situated in another state, if the defendant is personally served, since the jurisdiction in equity by way of injunction is strictly in personam. Alexander v. Tolleston Club, 110 Ill. 65.

A resident of a state may be enjoined from going into another state and committing acts injurious to the property of the plaintiffs there. Great Falls Mfg. Co. v. Worster, 23 N. H. 462.

A court of equity, at the instance of a grantee in a deed which is sufficient to pass the legal title to real property in another state, but is so defectively acknowledged that it cannot be recorded so as to charge third persons with constructive notice, may enjoin the grantor from conveying the property to third persons. Frank v. Peyton, 82 Ky. 150.

A court of equity of one state has jurisdiction of a suit, by one of its citizens holding a mortgage upon real property in another state, to enjoin a citizen from removing from the property alleged fixtures which he had furnished under a conditional contract of sale,—at least where the nonresident mortgagor voluntarily comes in and submits to the jurisdiction. 69 L. R. A.

Schmaltz v. York Mfg. Co. 204 Pa. 1, 59 L. R. A. 907, 93 Am. St. Rep. 782, 53 Atl. 522.

In Binney's Case, 2 Bland, Ch. 99, 148, the court said: "The dam, the erection of which is complained of, is to be extended entirely across the River Potomac, and, therefore, one part of it must rest upon the territory of Maryland, and the other upon that of Virginia; consequently, to that extent each state must have an exclusive jurisdiction, so far as it may be necessary to prevent its erection by injunction. But the object of preventing the erection of this dam is to put a stop to the expenditure of the funds of the body politic, for other than corporate purposes, within the District of Columbia; and consequently, so far only as the body politic [the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal Company which was proposing to build the dam] may be restrained by injunction from making such illegal expenditures anywhere, the courts of justice of each government must be allowed to have equal and concurrent jurisdiction."

Willey v. Decker, 11 Wyo. 496, 100 Am. St. Rep. 939, 73 Pac. 210, held that a court of Wyoming had jurisdiction, at the instance of owners of land in Montana who had acquired by prior appropriation the right to use the water of a stream for irrigation by means of a ditch and headgate in Wyoming, to restrain others from diverting the water by means of ditches located in Wyoming or in Montana.

So Miller v. Rickey, 127 Fed. 573, held that a Federal court sitting in Nevada had jurisdiction, at the instance of the owners of land in that state, to enjoin defendant from wrongfully diverting in California waters of a stream which flowed through the complainants' land.

Northern Indiana R. Co. v. Michigan C. R. Co. 15 How. 233, 14 L. ed. 874, however, held that the United States circuit court of the district of Michigan had no jurisdiction of a suit by an Indiana corporation, claiming an exclusive right under its charter to build and maintain a railroad in a certain part of Indiana, to enjoin the defendant from constructing a road within such territory. The court said that it would be readily admitted that no action at law could be sustained in the district of Michigan for injuries done in Indiana; and that no action of ejectment, or for trespass on real property, could have a more decidedly local character than the appropriate remedy for the injuries complained of; and that such character was not changed by a bill in chancery. The case is distinguished from Massie v. Watts, 6 Cranch, 148, 3 L. ed. 181, apparently upon the ground that the controversy did not arise out of a contract, or fraud, and was not connected with a trust, express or implied.

In Mariposa Co. v. Garrison, 26 How. Pr. 448, it was said that the court, having obtained jurisdiction of the person of defendant, has jurisdiction to compel specific performance of a contract in relation to lands situate in another state; but that the granting of a preliminary injunction is a matter of discretion; and, where the plaintiff has adequate remedies for the preservation and enforcement of all his rights in the courts of the state in which the land is situated, it is not sound discretion to aid, by injunction, in drawing within the jurisdiction of the court of another state the decision of those questions which can more appropriately be investigated and determined in the state where the land is situated.

In a number of instances the court of equity of one state or country has exercised its jurisdiction to enjoin proceedings in another state or country with respect to real property located in the latter.

In Bunbury v. Bunbury, 1 Beav. 318, an injunction was granted, on terms, to restrain proceedings instituted in a foreign country to recover real estate there. It was said, however, that, if nothing more than an insulated question of title to the land were in litigation between the parties, the injunction would be denied; but that the controversy between the parties involved the determination of questions relating to the conflict of laws, and the effect of the laws of England upon the rights of the parties.

In Beckford v. Kemble, 1 Sim. & Stu. 7, all the parties being in England, an injunction was granted to restrain mortgagees of a West India estate from proceeding on a bill of foreclosure in a colonial court, filed after a decree made in England which directed an inquiry to ascertain the amount of the mortgage debt on a bill to redeem.

In Hope v. Carnegie, L. R. 1 Ch. 320, an order restraining the administration of real and personal estate in the Netherlands, of a decedent who died domiciled in England, was affirmed as to both species of property, though one of the two judges who heard the appeal was of the opinion that the appellant ought to have been left at liberty to carry on the administration as to the real estate, if she could do so without proceeding as to the personal estate. The other judge was of the opinion that, if it were possible to proceed as to the real estate without proceeding as to the personal estate, it was incumbent upon the appellant to show that fact. He also queried whether proceedings, even as to real estate only, ought not to be restrained.

A court of New York has jurisdiction to restrain a trust company incorporated in that state, its officers, agents, and attorneys, from proceeding, in a suit brought by it in another state, to foreclose a mortgage upon real property in the latter state, pending the final hearing and determination of an action in New York for its removal as trustee upon the ground that it had acted in bad faith in the prosecution of the foreclosure action. Gibson v. American Loan & T. Co. 58 Hun, 443, 12 N. Y. Supp. 444.

But a court of one state, having jurisdiction of the parties, will not enjoin the prosecution of a suit pending in another state for the foreclosure of a mortgage upon real property in the latter state, merely because the court of the latter state entertains different views of the law covering the rights than those entertained by the courts of the state in which the injunction is sought, and by the United States Supreme Court. Carson v. Dunham, 149 Mass. 32, 3 L. R. A. 203, 14 Am. St. Rep. 307, 20 N. E. 312.

A court has no power to enjoin a citizen of a foreign state or sovereignty from causing a levy to be made on lands which are situated in the foreign state and beyond its territorial jurisdiction, because it has appointed a receiver of such property, unless the person so enjoined is a party, either in person or by representation, to the litigation in which the receiver has been appointed. Schindelholz v. Cullum, 5 C. A. 203, 12 U. S. App. 242, 55 Fed. 885. 69 L. R. A.

The right to take jurisdiction of a suit for an injunction affecting lands in another state is to be distinguished, upon the one hand, from the discretion with respect to the exercise of such jurisdiction, and, upon the other, from the merits of the case,—in other words, the question whether a proper case for interference by injunction has been made out. In a number of cases the court while assuming, or at least not denying the right to assume jurisdiction, has, in the exercise of its discretion, refused to entertain the suit, or has denied the injunction on the merits. Thus, the court, in Moor v. Anglo-Italian Bank, L. R. 10 Ch. Div. 681, held that an encumbrancer of immovable property situate in a foreign country, who has instituted legal proceedings in that country for the purpose of enforcing his rights, will not be restrained by injunction from prosecuting such proceedings, even though the mortgagor is a company in the course of winding up; at all events, if the party seeking to restrain him may appear before the foreign tribunal and assert his rights.

In White v. Hall, 12 Ves. Jr. 321, the Lord Chancellor refused an injunction to restrain a sale, under a decree of the colonial court, of real property in Demerara, which had been made security for the discharge of a debt in instalments, although he intimated that, if he had had jurisdiction, he would have held, contrary to the decision of the colonial court, that there had been no such default as to subject the property to sale.

So in Jones v. Geddes, 1 Phill. Ch. 724, an injunction granted on a suggestion of fraud, to restrain a resident of England from prosecuting a suit in Scotland to enforce a legal security against lands in that country, was dissolved on appeal, because the question between the parties could be more conveniently litigated in Scotland.

In Norton v. Florence Land & Public Works Co. L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 332, the court denied a motion on behalf of the holders of obligations of a company with an office in London and having real property in Italy, to restrain a bank, also having a London office, from enforcing, in priority to the holders of the obligations, a mortgage held by it upon the Italian property. The decision, was not upon the ground of absolute lack of jurisdiction, but was made as a matter of discretion.

Durant v. Pierson, 19 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 203, 12 N. Y. Supp. 145, refused a motion by defendant, pending an appeal by him from a judgment in favor of plaintiff to set aside an assignment as fraudulent, to stay proceedings taken by the plaintiff in another state to collect his claim out of real estate there situated. Bowers v. Durant, 43 Hun, 348,—infra, III. J. is distinguished by reason of the agreement in that case that the courts of New York should have jurisdiction.

In Harris v. Pullman, 84 Ill. 20, 25 Am. Rep. 416, and Mead v. Merritt, 2 Paige, 402, the jurisdiction to enjoin the further prosecution of actions already commenced in other states with respect to real property was denied, upon the ground that, under the rule in the United States, one state has no power, by process of injunction, to restrain proceedings previously commenced in the court of another state. The general question of jurisdiction suggested by these cases, whether a court of one state may in any case entertain a suit to restrain legal proceedings already commenced in another, is beyond the scope of the note, since the question is the same whether real property is involved or not. It may, however, be remarked that the position taken in these cases is contrary to the weight of modern authority. See, especially, Cole v. Cunningham, 133 U. S. 107, 33 L. ed. 538, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 269.

1. Accounting and incidental relief by requisition of conveyance.

See also Henderson v. McBee, 79 N. C. 219; Dickinson v. Hoomes, 8 Gratt. 353, 410; Clopton v. Booker, 27 Ark. 482,—supra, III., a.

A court of equity has ample jurisdiction of a suit for an accounting of the proceeds and profits arising from real property in another state or country. Thus:

An action may be brought in behalf of an infant for an account of the proceeds of real property in St. Christophers. Roberdeau v. Rous, 1 Atk. 543.

A bill between joint tenants of land in Ireland, for an accounting of the profits and for a partition of the lands, is good as to the profits, which are in the personality, but not so as to the partition, which is in the realty; for a commission to make partition cannot be awarded into Ireland. Cartwright v. Pettus, 2 Ch. Cas. 214, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 133.

In Mercantile Invest. & General Trust Co. v. River Plate Trust Loan & Agency Co. [1892] 2 Ch. 303, the court asserted the jurisdiction of an English court to compel, at the instance of the holders of debenture debts secured by an equitable charge on land in Mexico, an accounting in respect of the proceeds of such property by an English company which purchased the land subject to the payment of the obligations, though, as a matter of discretion, the court refused to appoint a receiver upon the ground that such relief would be useless.

The court, in Re Hawthorne, L. R. 23 Ch. Div. 743, dismissed for want of jurisdiction, a suit for an accounting of the proceeds of a sale of real property in Saxony, notwithstanding that the parties were temporarily in England and within the jurisdiction of the court; it appearing that the rights of the parties depended primarily upon the law of Saxony, as to the devolution of property in that country, there being no contract, fraud, or trust in the case.

The California superior court has jurisdiction of an action to compel an accounting of the profits realized by a California corporation from its operation of a cannery and the use of the personal property of its debtor, under an agreement entered into as security for a debt then due, although the property is situated in Alaska. Peninsular Trading & Fishing Co. v. Pacific Steam Whaling Co. 123 Cal. 689, 56 Pac. 604.

In Hayden v. Yale, 45 La. Ann. 362, 40 Am. St. Rep. 232, 12 So. 633, the court, in the exercise of its jurisdiction in personam, compelled a resident creditor of an insolvent to turn over to a syndic or assignee the proceeds of real property of the insolvent in another state, which such creditor had procured to be sold under attachment in the latter state.

A court of equity of the state in which defendants reside, and which has jurisdiction over their persons by their appearance, has jurisdiction to compel an accounting with respect to the proceeds and profits arising from land outside the state. Wood v. Warner, 15 N. J. Eq. 81.

The courts of one state have jurisdiction of an action for an accounting as to the management and disposition of lands in another state, and the uses made of their proceeds, where the defendant is within the former state. Reading v. Haggin, 58 Hun, 450, 35 N. Y. S. R. 585, 12 N. Y. Supp. 368.

A court of equity of one state may maintain a suit against a railroad company and a mortgage trustee to compel an accounting, in order to determine what amount of net earnings of the railroad has been wrongfully diverted from the payment of the bonds secured by the mortgage, and to restrain similar further payments, although the mortgaged property is in another state. Buel v. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. 24 Misc. 646, 53 N. Y. Supp. 749.

It was held in Moss's Estate, 138 Pa. 646, 21 Atl. 206, that a court of Pennsylvania had jurisdiction to require the application of the proceeds of a sale of land in West Virginia to the discharge of liens covering both that land and land in Pennsylvania, in order to protect subsequent encumbrancers having liens on the Pennsylvania land only.

Local courts have jurisdiction of a fund arising from the sale of real property in another country, when the fund is in the hands of a citizen of whose person they have jurisdiction. Kessler v. Kessler, 3 Pa. Co. Ct. 522.

An objection, in a suit for an accounting and settlement of the partnership business, to an order for the sale of the partnership lands, upon the ground that, as the lands lie in different states, the order cannot be enforced except as to lands within the state in which the court is sitting, is not well founded. Such order does not require the agency of an officer out of the jurisdiction of the court; the order is to act upon the parties in the cause; and the transfer of title is to come from them, and not from the person through whose agency the sale shall be made. Lyman v. Lyman, 2 Paine, 11, Fed. Cas. No. 8,628.

In the last case the bill, in addition to a prayer for an accounting, contained a prayer for the sale of the land in order to pay the amount due the complainants. The decree, however, did not direct such a sale; and the court said that it was unnecessary to consider whether it could at all interfere either with the sale of the land, or with the disposition of the proceeds of such sale.

The jurisdiction of the courts of equity extends to all matters necessary to wind up the affairs of a partnership, including the sale of real estate; and the jurisdiction is not local, even though a part of the assets consists of real property situated in another state. While the decree itself in such case would not directly effect the transfer of title, it binds the consciences of the parties, and can be enforced by the court within the territory where the property is located. Dunlap v. Byers, 110 Mich. 109, 67 N. W. 1067. In this case a court of Michigan gave effect to a decree rendered in Ohio in a suit for a dissolution of a partnership and an accounting, which directed a sale of land of the partnership in Michigan, the land having been purchased by one of the parties to the suit, and the other party having been ordered to quitclaim, but never having done so.

The courts of Wisconsin have jurisdiction of an action in personam, though it may indirectly relate to lands in a foreign state or country, by seeking to compel the defendant to convey such land, or some interest therein, to the plaintiff. Gates v. Paul, 117 Wis. 170, 94 N. W. 55. This was an action for the dissolution of, and an accounting under, a partnership formed for the purpose of dealing in land in other states.

In Harris v. Pullman, 84 Ill. 20, 25 Am. Rep. 416, it was held that a court of equity of Illinois should not take jurisdiction of a suit to compel an accounting in respect of real property in another state, and to require the surrender of the possession of the property to the complainant; but this was upon the ground that the court had personal jurisdiction of only part of the defendants necessary to enable it to grant the relief prayed for, some of them, who were nonresidents, having been merely served by publication. As a further reason why a court of Illinois should not entertain the jurisdiction, it was said that the same litigation was pending in the courts of the state where the property was situated, and that the parties ought to resort to that jurisdiction.

J. Partition.

The jurisdiction of a court of equity of one state or country over a suit for partition of land in another has been uniformly denied, generally upon the ground that a partition cannot be accomplished without giving the decree a direct extraterritorial effect.

In Cartwright v. Pettus, 2 Ch. Cas. 214, the plaintiff and defendant were joint tenants of land in Ireland. The plaintiff prayed an account of profits and a partition of lands. The Lord Chancellor declared that, as to the profits, the bill was good, the person being in England; but, as to the partition, which was in the reality, he could not proceed in England, for he could not award a commission into Ireland.

So in Kennedy v. Cassilis, 2 Swanst. 323, on a bill for a partition of lands in Ireland, and an account of waste committed there, a demurrer was allowed as to the partition, and overruled as to the account.

If a defendant be found within the jurisdiction, he may be decreed to pay money, or to account for the rents and profits of land lying in another or a foreign country, which he has held and enjoyed; or, if a deed of land in a foreign country be found to be fraudulent, it may be ordered to be delivered up and canceled; or, in specific performance of a contract for land in another state, such a conveyance may be ordered as shall be sufficient, according to the law of the state where it lies. But the court will not decree a partition of such land, or in any manner directly decide upon the title to it, or upon the validity of a deed or will as a material part of the title: nor found the relief granted upon the strict title to such property itself. Bluney's Case, 2 Bland, Ch. 99.

Proceedings under the Nebraska statute for the partition of lands involve a division of the lands by referees appointed by the court, and, under certain circumstances, a sale thereof by such referees. Such proceedings, therefore, are essentially in rem, and the rule that the courts of one state have no jurisdiction of lands lying in another applies with full force. Schick v. Whitcomb (Neb.) 94 N. W. 1023. The appellant conceded that the court would have no jurisdiction of lands in another state, but insisted that a personal adjudication would bind the parties as in the case of a decree for specific performance for the conveyance of land in another state enforceable by injunction, attachment, or like process against the person, or which would be available in an action between the same parties in such other state concerning the title to the lands lying there. The court said that such argument was based on the assumption that the maxim, Equity operates in personam, and not in rem, applies to cases of partition; but that such was not the case.

A court of one state has no jurisdiction to make a decree which will directly affect either legal or equitable title to lands situated in another state. The doctrine is that, if the person to do the act decreed is within the jurisdiction of the court, and the act may be done without the exercise of any authority operating territorially within the foreign jurisdiction the court may act in personam, and oblige the party to convey, or otherwise comply with its decree. But it is not competent to the court to decree touching a foreign subject when the act to be done can be accomplished and perfected only by an authority operating territorially. Thus, a conveyance may be decreed of lands abroad if the defendant is within the jurisdiction of the court, but not a partition of land as between joint tenants, tenants in common, or coparceners. Polndexter v. Burwell, 82 Va. 507.

A court of Virginia has no jurisdiction to partition lands situated in another state, although all the parties have appeared and answered. Wimer v. Wimer, 82 Va. 890, 3 Am. St. Rep. 126, 5 S. E. 536. The court said that, in order to make a partition, the court must invade, by its officers, the soil of another state, and divide up its lands to suit the views of another jurisdiction. The decree in this case, which was reversed, appointed commissioners to make the partition, and they did make and report such partition, as well of the lands lying in West Virginia, as of those lying in Virginia.

A court of Virginia has no jurisdiction to decree a partition of so much of a tract of land as lies beyond the limits of the state. Pillow v. Southwest Virginia Improv. Co. 92 Va. 145, 53 Am. St. Rep. 804, 23 S. E. 32.

In Johnson v. Kimbro, 3 Head, 557, 75 Am. Dec. 781, commissioners appointed in North Carolina had partitioned lands of a decedent in Tennessee, as well as those in North Carolina. The report of the commissioners was affirmed by the North Carolina court, but there was no decree vesting the title in the heirs in severalty to the lands allotted to them respectively. It was held that such proceedings were ineffectual, so far as the land in Tennessee was concerned, since they were in rem. The court said that it was not necessary to consider what would have been the legal effect of a decree of the court, based upon the partition divesting and vesting the title in severalty, pursuant to the allotments made by the commissioners.

As a matter of discretion, at least, the court ought, undoubtedly, under ordinary circumstances, to decline to entertain a suit for the partition of real property in another state or country; but it is not apparent why the court cannot, if desirable, assume jurisdiction of the suit, even if the land is beyond the territorial jurisdiction, if the circumstances are such that it can do justice between the parties by requiring mutual conveyances and releases in severalty without sending commissioners into the state where the property is located; nor why, if a partition in kind is inexpedient, the court cannot, in analogy to foreclosure cases, grant effective relief by a decree requiring a judicial sale and conveyances to the purchaser by the owners of the undivided interests,—at least, if the parties sustain contractual relations toward each other so as to bring the case within the rule as stated by Chief Justice Marshall. See supra, II., a.

In Page v. McKee, 3 Bush, 135, 96 Am. Dec. 201, the court held that the title of minor heirs to real property in Kentucky was not devastated by a decree of a court of Indiana (where the intestate and all the parties were domiciled), in a suit for the partition of the Kentucky land and land in Indiana; and that a conveyance by the guardian of the minors was equally ineffectual to devast them of their title. The Kentucky court said that the Indiana court had jurisdiction of all the parties and all the subject-matter of the suit, save the Kentucky land; that, while it could not perfect its judgment of partition by an enforced conveyance, yet the adult heirs were voluntarily bound by the judgment, and then voluntarily joined in the conveyance; and that, so far as they were concerned, they were estopped to set up any claim; but that it was otherwise as to the minor heirs. The intimation that an enforced conveyance from the adults would not have devastated their title is obiter. The principle referred to in infra, IV., that the conveyance, in order to be effectual, must be made by the very person whose title or interest is to be affected, would be sufficient to justify the decision as to the minor heirs, without disputing the general proposition that a court of one state, having jurisdiction of parties sui juris, may grant effective relief in a suit, the purpose of which is to partition lands in another state or country, by the requisition of mutual conveyances or releases.

A court of one state has no jurisdiction, in a suit in chancery for the construction of a will, to determine the manner in which lands in another state belonging to the testator at the time of his death, or the proceeds thereof in case of sale, are to be distributed. Parsons v. Millar, 189 Ill. 107, 59 N. E. 606.

In Bowers v. Durant, 43 Hun, 348, which affirmed an order restraining defendant from prosecuting partition suits in Iowa and Nebraska in respect of lands situated in those states in violation of his agreement that a partition might be brought in the courts of New York for the purpose of partitioning all the real estate of his father, whether the same was situated in that state or elsewhere; and that the agreement might be pleaded as conferring jurisdiction; and that he would execute deeds in accordance with any judgment that might be rendered in such action,—the court said that, having secured, by means of such agreement, his ends in securing the probate of his father's will, he is estopped from denying the jurisdiction of the courts of New York.

k. Appointment of receiver.

tion over suits, the specific purpose of which is to secure the appointment of a receiver of real property situated in another state or country, or to subject such property to a receivership; and does not deal with the general subject of the power of a receiver appointed in one state or country over real property in another. It will be observed that this distinction is a specific application of the distinction outlined at the beginning of the note in defining its scope.

In _____ v. Lindsey, 15 Ves. Jr. 91, a receiver was appointed of an estate in the East Indies, no question being raised as to the jurisdiction.

In Hibbert v. Hibbert, 8 Meriv. 681, a receiver was appointed of the real and personal estate of the testator in the West Indies, no question being raised as to the jurisdiction.

In Houlditch v. Donegal, 8 Bligh, N. R. 301, 2 Clark & F. 479, the Lord Chancellor held that the court of chancery of England, acting in personam, had jurisdiction to appoint a receiver of real property in Ireland, which was subject to a trust for the payment of debts; although he assumed that the assistance of a court of Ireland would be necessary to make such appointment effectual, since a foreign judgment is merely prima facie evidence or ground of an action, and is not conclusive.

The supreme court of New York has power to compel a judgment debtor to convey lands in another state to a receiver for the benefit of his creditors in such a manner as to vest in the grantee the legal title. Bailey v. Ryder, 10 N. Y. 363.

Smith v. Tozer, 11 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 343, denied the power of a court to direct a conveyance to a receiver, appointed in supplementary proceedings, of lands of the debtor in another state. The decision, however, was upon the ground that under the Code of Civil Procedure, the property of a judgment debtor cannot be reached in supplementary proceedings, unless the judgment is a lien thereon.

1. Miscellaneous.

In Tulloch v. Hartley, 1 Younge & C. Ch. Cas. 114, the court, without mentioning any doubt as to the jurisdiction, entertained a bill to settle the boundaries of real estate in Jamaica.

In Athol v. Derby, 1 Ch. Cas. 220, a contract respecting the Isle of Man, though out of the jurisdiction, was enforced by a court of chancery in England.

That land of a testator, charged by his will with the payment of legacies, is beyond the limits of the state and of the district in which a Federal court is sitting, does not prevent it from granting appropriate relief to the legatee. It is true that the court cannot, in such a case, order the land to be sold for payment of any decree which it may make in favor of the plaintiff; but it is not without power to act efficiently to cause the defendants to pay any such decree. Lewis v. Darling, 16 How. 1, 14 L. ed. 819.

A residuary legatee in a will executed in North Carolina by a person domiciled in that state, which appointed four executors (two of whom resided in Tennessee), and directed the executors to raise from land in the latter state such sum as would be sufficient to pay all his debts, cannot maintain a bill in North Carolina against the acting executor there for the sale of the land in Tennessee, in order to reimburse him for the portion of the residue of the estate which had been applied, by the acting executor in North Carolina, to the payment of the testator's debts. The court conceded that the residuary legatee was clearly entitled to be reimbursed; but held that his right could not be vindicated in a suit in North Carolina. Blount v. Blount, 8 N. C. (1 Hawks) 365.

A court of equity may entertain a suit by a wife to obtain a settlement out of her equitable estate if the husband is within its jurisdiction, notwithstanding that the real property involved is in another jurisdiction. Guild v. Guild, 16 Ala. 121.

The courts of a state have jurisdiction of a suit to rescind promissory notes, executed and made payable in that state to a resident thereof, which are secured by a mortgage, recorded therein, of land therein situated, although they were given to secure payment of the purchase price of land situated in a foreign country, notwithstanding that the restoration by the plaintiffs of the property in the foreign country for which the notes were given is a condition of relief. Loatza v. Superior Court, 85 Cal. 11, 9 L. R. A. 376, 20 Am. St. Rep. 197, 24 Pac. 707.

In Pike v. Hoare, 1 Ambl. 428, the Lord Chancellor dismissed a bill by an heir at law for an issue to try the validity of a will, mainly because the land lay in Pennsylvania; though he said that, under the circumstances of the case, he would have dismissed the bill even if the will had concerned lands in England.

An English court will not entertain a bill of discovery to obtain inspection of documents in the defendant's possession in England, in aid of proceedings about to be taken for the recovery of land in India the defendant being capable of being sued in India. Reiner v. Salisbury, L. R. 2 Ch. Div. 378.

A bill cannot be maintained in behalf of an infant to compel the delivery of possession of lands in a foreign country. Roberdeau v. Rous, 1 Atk. 543.

A suit to subject land descended to an heir to the payment of a debt of the ancestor is in rem, and can only be maintained in the jurisdiction in which the land is situated. Williams v. Ewing, 31 Ark. 229.

Ross v. Ross, 23 Ont. Rep. 43, denied a motion for judgment by plaintiff in a suit asking for a declaration that real property in the Northwest territory the title to which was in the name of the plaintiff's father at the time of his death, belonged to the plaintiff, and praying that defendants, the administrators and heirs of the deceased, be ordered to convey it to him, notwithstanding that the adult defendants admitted the plaintiff's right to the land, and that the guardian of the infant defendants submitted their rights to the court. Street, J., said that the action was one for directly determining the title to land lying outside of the province; and, in reply to the contention that, the defendants all being residents of the province, the court could act upon them in personam, he said he would first of all have to inquire whether, by the lex rei sitæ, the land belonged to the plaintiff or defendants, and that, if he found that point in favor of plaintiff, he would then have to find some method of effectually vesting in him the estate then vested in the infant defendants.

IV. Form of relief; effect and enforcement of decree.

As to the form and effect of the decree in the various kind of suits, see the appropriate subdivision of III.

As has been shown in supra, II., b, the ability to grant effective relief by a decree in personam is the test of the jurisdiction of a court of equity of a suit, the purpose of which is to affect land in another state or country. The mere fact however, that, if the land to be affected were in the state or country where the court is sitting a decree in rem, acting directly upon the land, would be the appropriate form of relief, does not necessarily defeat the jurisdiction when the land to be affected is in another state or country; for the powers of a court of equity are adequate to adjust the form of relief to the exigencies of the case arising from the location of the property beyond the territorial jurisdiction, so long as it does not undertake to grant, in the form of an equitable decree in personam, relief to which the parties are not entitled in any form of action, or which is properly only obtainable in an action at law. It would not be competent for a court of equity to grant relief, in respect of land beyond the territorial jurisdiction, by the requisition of a conveyance or other decree in personam, in a suit which was, in substance, ejectment directly involving the title to the property, and presenting no ground of equitable intervention. In a suit for the foreclosure of a mortgage, however, which is essentially an equitable suit, and in which the relief, when the land is within the territorial jurisdiction, is usually granted in the form of a decree in rem directing the sale of the property without requiring a conveyance or release by the mortgagor or owner of the equity of redemption, the court may, if the property is beyond the territorial jurisdiction, mould the relief into the form of a personal decree by the requisition of such a conveyance.

Enos v. Hunter, 9 Ill. 211, though merely involving the jurisdiction of a court of one county in respect of land situated in another county in the same state, contains a clear statement of the scope and extent of the jurisdiction of suits affecting land beyond the territorial jurisdiction, and of the mode and manner in which such jurisdiction may be effectively exercised. It said, in this connection, speaking of the suit for the specific performance: "The court can grant the necessary relief by coercing the person of the defendant no matter where the land may be situated. The fact that the land is beyond the control of the court makes no difference in relation to the extent of the relief which the court may give, except that probably the court will not compel the defendant to deliver possession to the complainant after the execution of the deed, which it might do if the premises were within its own jurisdiction. That, however, is not essential to the substantial part of the relief sought, and is a matter of discretion with the court, rather than of strict right to the party. The inability to give the party possession will not prevent the court from securing to him the legal title, which the party may convey as well in one place as in another."

In some instances, when the land is beyond the territorial jurisdiction, the court grants a decree which is both in rem and in personam.

though conceding that the decree in rem, if it stood alone, would be entirely ineffective. An illustration of this is furnished in suits for the foreclosure of mortgages upon land lying partly without the jurisdiction, where the usual form of relief is a decree directing the sale of the property (which in itself would be ineffectual to transfer the title so far as the land in the other state or country is concerned), and requiring the mortgagor or owner of the equity of redemption to convey or release to the purchaser at the sale.

If a court of equity, having personal jurisdiction of the necessary parties in a suit presenting a proper case for equitable intervention, requires a conveyance, by the owner of the title or interest to be affected, of land in another state or country, such conveyance, when duly executed pursuant to the decree, and in the manner required by the lex rei sitæ, is as effective, not only in the state or country where the decree is rendered, but in that where the land is located, as if it had been voluntarily executed. This is assumed in all of the cases cited at the close of supra, II., b.

A decree of the court of one state, requiring and directing lands in another state to be conveyed, or charged, or otherwise disposed of, may be enforced by their process; and when enforced or submitted to by the execution of a conveyance, mortgage, or other instrument, as directed, such conveyance, mortgage, or other instrument is effective in the situs rei. Bullock v. Bullock, 52 N. J. Eq. 561, 27 L. R. A. 213, 46 Am. St. Rep. 528, 30 Atl. 676.

A court of equity may compel a person of whom it has jurisdiction either to bring property in dispute, or to which the complainant claims an equitable title, within the jurisdiction of the court, or to execute such a conveyance or transfer thereof as will be sufficient to vest the legal title, as well as the possession of the property, of the lex loci rei sitæ. Mitchell v. Bunch, 2 Paige, 606, 22 Am. Dec. 669.

A court of equity which has jurisdiction of the person may, by the ordinary process of injunction and attachment for contempt, compel him to desist from commencing a suit at law, either in the state or in any foreign jurisdiction; and it may, in the same manner, compel him to execute a conveyance or release in such form as may be necessary to transfer the legal title to the property according to the laws of the place where the same is situated, or which may be sufficient in law to bar an action in any foreign tribunal. Mead v. Merritt, 2 Paige, 402.

It is the conveyance pursuant to the decree, however, and not the decree itself, that passes the title; and the decree without the conveyance does not affect the legal title. Watkins v. Holman, 16 Pet. 25, 10 L. ed. 873; Corbett v. Nutt, 10 Wall. 464, 19 L. ed. 976; Carpenter v. Strange, 141 U. S. 87, 35 L. ed. 640, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 960; Tardy v. Morgan, 3 McLean, 358, Fed. Cas. No. 13,752; Bullock v. Bullock, 52 N. J. Eq. 561, 27 L. R. A. 213, 46 Am. St. Rep. 528, 30 Atl. 676; Lindley v. O'Reilly, 50 N. J. L. 636, 1 L. R. A. 79, 7 Am. St. Rep. 802, 15 Atl. 379; Johnson v. Kimbro, 3 Head, 557, 75 Am. Dec. 781; Paschal v. Acklin, 27 Tex. 173; Morris v. Hand, 70 Tex. 481, 8 S. W. 210.

In cases of contract, trust, or fraud, the equity courts of one state, having jurisdiction 69 L. R. A.

of the parties, are competent to entertain a suit for specific performance, or to establish a trust, or for a conveyance, although the contract, trust, or fraudulent title pertains to lands in another state or country. But a decree in such a suit imposes a mere personal obligation enforceable by injunction, attachment, or other like process, against the person, and cannot operate upon lands in another jurisdiction to create a transfer or vest a title. Lindley v. O'Reilly, 50 N. J. L. 636, 1 L. R. A. 79, 7 Am. St. Rep. 802, 15 Atl. 379.

A decree of a court of chancery is not erroneous so far as it adjudges that a deed for land in another state is inoperative and without legal force for want of delivery, where it further directs that either of the parties shall be at liberty to apply to the court of chancery for further aid and direction as occasion may require. Vreeland v. Vreeland (N. J.) 24 Atl. 551. The court said that the decree could not change or affect the title to the Missouri land directly, but that the chancellor could render the decree effective by constraining the grantee in the deed referred to, to execute a reconveyance.

Under the law of Ohio, a decree for the conveyance of land operates as a conveyance; but, in order that a decree shall thus operate, the land itself must be within the jurisdiction of the court. If the land is within a foreign jurisdiction, the decree cannot operate as a conveyance; it must be enforced by attachment, or otherwise, as the case may require. Daniels v. Stevens, 19 Ohio, 222.

In Burnley v. Stevenson, 24 Ohio St. 474, 15 Am. Rep. 624, however, it was held that the decree, even without such a conveyance, is conclusive of all the rights and equities of the parties who acted therein, when pleaded in the courts of the state in which the land is situated; and may be relied upon as a defense in a suit in the latter state for the possession of the land, where the statute of that state allows equitable, as well as legal, defenses.

A court of equity may enforce obedience to its decree requiring a conveyance of land beyond the territorial jurisdiction by a proper process against the defendant. See Corbett v. Nutt, 10 Wall. 464, 19 L. ed. 976; Selxas v. King, 39 La. Ann. 510, 2 So. 416. This is, of course, implied in all the cases which uphold the jurisdiction to decree a conveyance of land in another state or country.

A decree in personam, requiring a conveyance, must, however, be enforced by the courts of the state or country in which it was granted; and the courts of the state or country in which the land is located will not ordinarily enforce the decree by compelling a conveyance. Davis v. Headley, 22 N. J. Eq. 115; Burnley v. Stevenson, 24 Ohio St. 474, 15 Am. Rep. 621.

A decree rendered in New York, directing defendant to execute a mortgage, as security for the payment of alimony, upon lands in New Jersey, does not affect the lands; and a court of equity of New Jersey will not compel the defendant to perform the obligation imposed upon him by the New York decree. Bullock v. Bullock, 52 N. J. Eq. 561, 27 L. R. A. 213, 46 Am. St. Rep. 528, 30 Atl. 676.

In Dunlap v. Byers, 110 Mich. 109, 67 N. W. 1067, however, a court of Michigan gave effect to a decree rendered in Ohio, in a suit for the dissolution of a partnership and an accounting, which directed a sale of land of the partnership in Michigan; the land having been purchased by one of the parties to the suit, and the other party having been ordered by the decree to quitclaim, but never having done so.

So, it was held in Roblin v. Long, 60 How. Pr. 200, that a court of New York, having acquired jurisdiction of the person of defendant, may compel him to convey lands in Canada, as required by a decree of a court of Canada.

Not only is a decree without a conveyance ineffectual to pass a title, but the conveyance must be executed by the very person whose title or interest is to be affected. A conveyance by a master, or commissioner, or other officer appointed by the court for that purpose is ineffectual. Watkins v. Holman, 16 Pet. 25, 10 L. ed. 873; Corbett v. Nutt, 10 Wall. 464, 19 L. ed. 976; Watts v. Waddle, 1 McLean, 200, Fed. Cas. No. 17,295; Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Postal Teleg. Co. 55 Conn. 334, 8 Am. St. Rep. 53, 11 Atl. 184; McLawrin v. Salmons, 11 B. Mon. 96, 52 Am. Dec. 563; Burnley v. Stevenson, 24 Ohio St. 474, 15 Am. Rep. 621; Moseby v. Burrow, 52 Tex. 396; Morris v. Hand, 70 Tex. 481, 8 S. W. 210.

The last point is also illustrated by the cases cited in supra III., a, holding that a trustee appointed by the court of one state cannot pass the title to real estate in another state; and by cases holding that a court of one state or country cannot confer upon an administrator power to sell the real property of the decedent in another. Watkins v. Holman, 16 Pet. 26, 10 L. ed. 873; Sheldon v. Rice, 30 Mich. 296, 18 Am. Rep. 136; Nowler v. Colt, 1 Ohio, 519, 13 Am. Dec. 640; Allen v. Shanks, 90 Tenn. 359, 16 S. W. 715; Brown v. Edson, 23 Vt. 435.

A deed of real property in Alabama, executed by the widow and administratrix of the deceased owner (she having, by the law of Alabama, no power to dispose of the real estate of her husband, except for the payment of the debts of his estate), pursuant to a decree rendered by a court of Massachusetts, in proceedings under a statute of that state founded on a title bond given by the deceased, is not valid, and does not affect the title. Watkins v. Holman, 16 Pet. 25, 10 L. ed. 873.

The chancery court of Tennessee cannot compel the heirs of a decedent to convey land located in another state to a commissioner appointed by the court for the purpose of having the land sold for the payment of the debts of the estate. Robinson v. Johnson (Tenn. Ch. App.) 52 S. W. 704.

A curatrix, acting under authority of the probate court of Louisiana, cannot make a valid conveyance of land belonging to the ward situated in Texas. Wren v. Howland (Tex. Civ. App.) 75 S. W. 894.

So, a committee of a lunatic appointed in one state cannot convey land in another. Morris v. Hand, 70 Tex. 481, 8 S. W. 210; Hotchiss v. Middlekauf, 96 Va. 649, 43 L. R. A. 806, 32 S. E. 36.

Nor may a court of equity in one state charge the land of a lunatic in another state, or its proceeds in the hands of his heir, for his past support. Allison v. Campbell, 21 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. Eq.) 132.

In McGee v. Sweeney, 84 Cal. 100, 23 Pac. 1117, the California supreme court affirmed a decree, which directed defendant, in whom the title stood, to convey the title to real property in Pennsylvania to the plaintiff; and provided that, in default of such payment, a commissioner appointed by the court should execute a conveyance. Nothing is said in the opinion, however, with respect to the portion of the decree directing a conveyance by a commissioner, the court merely saying that a court of equity has power to compel a reconveyance of property outside of its jurisdiction by reason of its control over the parties before it.

Van Dyke's Appeal, 60 Pa. 481, illustrates the manner in which equity may, in suits indirectly affecting real property in another state, mould its decree so as to give the parties adequate relief, without exceeding its jurisdiction in respect of the land. The will of a testator domiciled in Pennsylvania gave certain legacies to the testator's daughters, and attempted to devise certain real property in New Jersey to his sons. It, however, was not executed in the manner required to pass the title to real property in New Jersey, and the prayer of the bill was that the daughters (some of whom were minors) should be put to their election either to give effect to the whole will by relinquishing their claim upon the New Jersey property, or from their legacies to compensate the sons for their loss in consequence of the daughters sharing with them the New Jersey property. The court said that, as its decree could not authorize the guardians of the minors to execute releases of their right and title to the New Jersey lands which would be effectual in that state, the last alternative of the prayer furnished the more appropriate form of relief, and, accordingly, decreed that the executors pay to the daughters such sum less than the amount of their respective legacies as would compensate the sons for the value of the daughters' shares in the New Jersey real estate.

V. Summary.

The foregoing review of the authorities seems to warrant the following propositions with respect to the jurisdiction of equity over suits the avowed purpose of which is to affect real property in another state or country:

1. The case must, independently of the location of the land beyond the territorial jurisdiction, be a proper one for equitable intervention; and, according to the usual form of statement with respect to this jurisdiction, must have arisen out of fraud, trust, or contract. The jurisdiction does not extend to a suit that, in its essence, involves merely the title or possession of the land, and presents no ground of equitable intervention. (II., a.)

2. The jurisdiction is confined to suits in personam, and does not extend to suits in rem. (I.)

3. The ability to grant effective relief by a decree in personam is a necessary condition of the jurisdiction. (II., b.)

4. The defendant, whose title or interest is to be affected, must be personally subject to the jurisdiction of the court. If a nonresident, he must either have appeared, or have been personally served within the jurisdiction; constructive or substituted service outside of the state is not sufficient in case of a nonresident. (II. b.)

5. The residence within the jurisdiction of the person whose title or interest is to be affected is not on principle a necessary condi tion of the jurisdiction, though his nonresidence may prevent the court from obtaining personal jurisdiction over him, and thus defeat the jurisdiction of the suit; and the non-residence of such party, even when personally subject to the jurisdiction of the court, may affect the exercise of the court's discretion in respect of assuming jurisdiction. (II. c.)

6. The decree, in order to be effective, must be in personam. (IV.)

7. A deed of land in one state or country, executed by the owner of the title or an interest therein pursuant to a decree of a court of equity of another state or country, which had jurisdiction of his person in a proper case for equitable intervention, is as binding and effective in both jurisdictions as if it had been voluntarily executed. (IV.)

8. The decree requiring the conveyance, however, without the conveyance itself, does not affect the legal title. (IV.)

9. Obedience to the decree requiring the conveyance must be enforced by the courts of the state or country where it was rendered, and will not be enforced by the courts of the state or country in which the land is located. (IV.)

10. The conveyance must be executed by the very person whose title or interest is to be affected; a conveyance by an officer of the court is ineffectual. (IV.)

11. The relief may be varied to suit the exigencies of the case arising from the location of the land beyond the territorial jurisdiction, so long as it does not undertake to grant, in the form of an equitable decree in personam, relief to which the parties are not entitled in any form of action, or which is properly procurable only in an action at law. (IV.)

12. For the specific application of these principles to particular classes, see the various subdivisions of supra, III. G. H. P.

v.

Margaret RAWLE, Admr., etc., of Thomas Rawle, Deceased.

(192 Ill. 626.)

Merely knowledge of an employee of a contractor for the setting of the stone work of a building, of a custom that the scaffolding shall be furnished by the brick contractors, does not amount to a waiver of his right to hold his employer responsible for the safety of a scaffold furnished for him to work upon.

(October 24, 1901.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Superior Court for Cook County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—As to duty of master to furnish safe scaffolding, see Beesley v. F. W. Wheeler & Co. 27 L. R. A. 266.

Messrs. Walker & Payne, for appellants:

A servant, in order to recover for an injury for defects in appliances, is required to establish three propositions: (1) That the appliances were defective; (2) that the master had notice thereof, or ought to have had; (3) that the servant did not know of the defect, and had not equal means of knowing with the master.

Goldie v. Werner, 151 Ill. 551, 38 N. E. 95; Howe v. Medaris, 183 Ill. 288, 55 N. E. 724.

There is no rule for building scaffolds; they must be adapted to each locality and purpose.

There is not one word of evidence to show whether inspection was ever made or not, or that the defect in the material was one which a proper inspection would have revealed, had it been made; which proof is essential before recovery can be had.

Sack v. Doless, 35 Ill. App. 636, Affirmed in 137 Ill. 129, 27 N. E. 62.

That an accident occurs, does not prove that, if an inspection had been made, a defect would have been discovered, and the misfortune averted.

Devlin v. Smith, 89 N. Y. 470, 42 Am. Rep. 311; Butler v. Townsend, 126 N. Y. 105, 26 N. E. 1017; Schultz v. Pacific R. Co. 36 Mo. 32.

Counsel, having chosen to try this case upon the issue as to negligent construction, cannot submit the case on negligence in providing improper material for the construction of the scaffold.

Wabash Western R. Co. v. Friedman, 146 Ill. 583, 30 N. E. 353, 34 N. E. 1111; Bloomington v. Goodrich, 88 Ill. 558; Ayers v. Chicago, 111 Ill. 406; Illinois O. R. Co. v. McKee, 43 Ill. 119.

Appellee cannot recover against these appellants for the negligence relied upon.

A custom prevails in Chicago, of more than a quarter of a century's duration, that, when work is being performed upon buildings of this kind, it is the brick-mason contractor's duty to provide and maintain the scaffolding on the building; and the stone-setting contractors never provide a scaffold for their work, but use the brick mason's scaffold, the brick-mason contractor retaining control of the scaffold, making all repairs and changes necessary.

Unless the evidence shows that appellants undertook, promised, or agreed to furnish a scaffold for deceased's use, or assumed charge or control of the one actually used, appellants cannot be held liable for defects in the material, or in the construction of it.

Appellants could not have built a scaffold if they wanted it. The owner paid the brick-mason contractor for furnishing one on the building, to be used by the other contractors, and only one scaffold could be placed on the premises at the same time. There was only one thing to do, and that was to use the brick mason's scaffold, or abandon the work. Deceased knew it, accepted the employment with full knowledge of it, knew that appellants spent but little time at the building, that there was no one in appellants' employ whose duty it was to inspect the scaffold, unless himself; and, in accepting and continuing in the employment, he assumed the risk.

Channon v. Sanford Co. 70 Conn. 573, 41 L. R. A. 200, 66 Am. St. Rep. 133, 40 Atl. 462; Coughtry v. Globe Woolen Co. 56 N. Y. 124, 15 Am. Rep. 387; Brady v. Norcross, 172 Mass. 331, 52 N. E. 528; Kelly v. Howell, 41 Ohio St. 438.

If a servant cannot recover against a master for a defective scaffold when the scaffold was constructed by an independent contractor, how can a recovery be had against the master in this case, where the custom of the trade provides that the stone-setting contractor shall not furnish the scaffold, but the owner shall contract with the brick-mason contractor to furnish the scaffold for the stone setters?

On petition for rehearing.

He who provides the working place or appliance is the party liable for their non-safety.

Then we have, (1) an invitation to use; (2) an overt act affecting another; both of which must, by diligence, be safe-guarded by the providing party.

Bright v. Barnett & R. Co. 88 Wis. 299, 26 L. R. A. 524, 60 N. W. 418.

Messrs. William Garnett, Jr., and Ira C. Wood, for appellee:

Where a master adopts and uses machinery or appliances furnished and built by another contractor, the liability of the master for their safety and sufficiency is the same as if the master had built the machine or appliances himself.

Where there are several methods of doing work, and competent judges are not agreed as to their relative merits, the selection by the master, or servant, of one rather than the other, cannot be regarded as negligence.

Wilkin, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by appellee, as administratrix of the estate of Thomas Rawle, deceased, in the superior court of Cook county, to recover damages for wrongfully causing the death of her intestate. Appellants were stone-setting contractors, and had a contract for setting the cut stone on the Historical Building in the city of Chicago. Thomas Rawle, the deceased, was in their employ, working upon this building by the day, as an expert stone setter. The first count of the declaration avers that on the 16th day of May, 1893, the defendants were prosecuting the work on this building, and provided the said Thomas Rawle with a certain scaffold upon which to stand while at work; that said scaffold "was improperly and carelessly constructed," and that the defendants failed to test it to see that it was safe; and while the deceased, with due care and diligence, was using said scaffold, pursuing his work, it broke, throwing him to the ground, causing his death. The second count is substantially the same, except that it avers "that it then and there became and was the duty of the defendants, as employers of the said Thomas Rawle, to provide and maintain proper, suitable, secure, strong, and safe scaffolding to be used by him in the prosecution of his work; yet they provided him with an improper, unsuitable, insecure, weak, and unsafe scaffolding." On a plea of not guilty issue was joined, and the cause submitted to a jury, resulting in a verdict of $5,000 for plaintiff. From a judgment of affirmance in the appellate court, defendants prosecute this appeal.

The theory of plaintiff's case is that it was the duty of appellants to furnish the deceased, as their servant, a safe place in which to work, and that his death was caused by their failure so to do. Several defenses were relied upon at the trial, and urged before the appellate court, predicated upon the evidence; but, all controverted questions of fact being now settled adversely to those defenses, the only grounds of reversal urged in this court are, that the trial court erred in refusing to direct the jury to return a verdict of not guilty, and in refusing to give certain instructions asked on behalf of defendants. The first of these grounds is based upon the proposition that the plaintiff failed to prove, or introduce testimony tending to prove, that it was the duty of defendants to furnish the deceased a scaffold upon which to do the work which he was employed to perform. The uncontradicted evidence offered by plaintiff shows, and respective counsel so agreed upon the trial, that in the construction of a stone-veneer building, such as this was, a recognized custom prevailed in Chicago that it is the duty of the persons in charge of the brick work to build the scaffold to be used by both the brick masons and the stone setters. The brick masons erect the scaffold, and as the building progresses the stone setters place the stone in position, and are followed by the brick masons, who back up the work with brick. It also appeared from the evidence that such custom was followed in the construction of the building in question, the scaffolds for each floor, as the building rose, being built by brick masons. While the deceased was setting stone on a scaffold some 40 feet above the ground, the scaffold gave way, and he fell, receiving injuries from which he died. The contention of counsel for the appellants is that, by the uncontradicted evidence,—in fact, the admission of the plaintiff of the existence of the custom as above stated,—there was no duty devolving upon the defendants to furnish the scaffold upon which the deceased worked, but that that duty rested upon the brick masons; and that if, by reason of the negligent construction of the same, deceased lost his life, the remedy of the plaintiff below was against them, and not against defendants. With this contention we cannot agree. We have examined the testimony contained in the record with care, and are unable to discover anything in the agreement of counsel at the trial, or in the evidence, tending to prove that the deceased's contract of employment was made with reference to the custom among builders, or that the deceased waived or relinquished any legal right which he had to expect of his employers a safe and secure place or scaffold upon which to work. Conceding to the fullest extent that the custom existed, and that it was known to exist by the deceased at the time he was employed and during the time he was engaged in the work, in the absence of all proof to that effect we are unable to see how it can be said that such knowledge in any way amounted to a waiver of his right, under the law, to hold his employers responsible for the safety of the scaffold. The fact that he knew that it was built by the brick masons in pursuance of a duty which they owed the stone setters under the existing custom in no way estopped him from saying to his employers: "As between you, as master, and myself, as employee, the law imposes upon you the duty of providing me with a sufficient scaffold; and, although another party may have constructed it in pursuance of a duty which it owed you, still it was your duty to me to see that it was securely and safely built." Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Maroney, 170 Ill. 520, 62 Am. St. Rep. 396, 48 N. E. 953, Citing Hess v. Rosenthal, 160 Ill. 621, 43 N. E. 743, and Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Avery, 109 Ill. 314. We are not unmindful of the fact that cases arise in which it is not the duty of the employer to furnish a safe place for his employee to work,—as where the duty to see that the place or scaffolding on which the labor is to be performed devolves upon the workman himself, and not upon the employer. If a party should be employed to paint a house, there being no agreement as to who should furnish the scaffolding, the duty would doubtless fall upon the painter himself. In Channon v. Sanford Co. 70 Conn. 573, 41 L. R. A. 200, 66 Am. St. Rep. 133. 40 Atl. 462, relied upon by counsel for appellant where a servant engaged in decorating a church was injured by the falling of a scaffold constructed by a third person, who was an independent contractor, under the peculiar facts of that case it was held that the duty of seeing that the scaffold was safe did not rest upon the employer: and it has been so held in other cases cited by counsel for appellants. But we are unable to see how it can be said here as an original proposition, that the defendants were not under the legal duty of furnishing the scaffolding upon which the deceased was to work. Suppose we leave out of consideration the proof or stipulation as to the prevailing custom in the city of Chicago, and consider the case as though the deceased had been employed (as he was) by the defendants to set stone upon the building by the day, there being no agreement as to who should furnish the scaffold; could it be doubted that, by reason of that employment, the legal duty devolved upon the master (that is, the defendants) to provide the scaffolding, and see that it was safe and secure? We think not. Then the question in the case must be, on the first proposition. Does the proof in this case show, so as to establish it as a matter of law, that they had been relieved of that duty? Unless it can be so held, then clearly the court properly refused to withdraw the case from the jury. On the contrary, as we have already said, to our minds there is nothing in the case fairly tending to show that the deceased in any way waived his right in that regard, or that defendants were relieved from the legal obligation resting upon them. We are satisfied no error was committed in refusing to give peremptory instruction to find for the defendants.

In view of the instructions given at the request of the defendants, and in view of what we have already said, the court properly refused to give those asked by the defendants of which complaint is now made. One of these instructions will suffice to point out what we regard as a fatal objection to each of them. The one which perhaps most nearly approaches the law is as follows: "The court instructs the jury that, if you find, from the evidence, that there was a general custom prevailing among mason and stone-setting contractors in the city of Chicago at the time of the injury to said Thomas Rawle, whereby scaffolding in the erection of buildings upon which mason and stone-setting contractors were employed was to be furnished by the brick-mason contractor, and not by the stone-setting contractor, which custom was well known to persons engaged in the said building trades, and was known to said Thomas Rawle, or by the exercise of reasonable and ordinary care on his part might have been known, then you are instructed that no duty devolved upon the defendants to furnish scaffolding for the said Rawle to work upon; and if you further find that the said Thomas Rawle worked upon scaffolding built and furnished by the mason contractor without complaint, and because of the falling of such scaffolding was injured, then you are instructed that the plaintiff cannot recover in this case, and your verdict should be for the defendants." The rule announced in this instruction is that the mere knowledge of Rawle as to the custom between brick masons and stone-setting contractors, making it the duty of the former to construct the scaffold, would be sufficient to relieve the defendants of the duty of providing Rawle a safe and secure place in which to work, whether he, by words or acts, consented or agreed that they should be relieved from that duty. What we have already said will sufficiently indicate our dissent from that view of the law.

Perceiving no error in the record, the judgment of the Appellate Court will be affirmed.

Boggs, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a petition filed originally in this court for the disbarment of the respondent, Leslie A. Gilmore. The respondent filed his answer, and the cause was referred to a master to take and report the proofs, and the proofs have been heard and reported, and the respective parties have filed their briefs. The testimony discloses that in the year 1889 the respondent was a resident of Kansas City, Jackson county, Missouri, and was a member of the bar of that state and engaged in the practice of his profession there. At the September term, 1890, of the criminal court of Jackson county, an indictment was returned against him charging him with the crime of embezzling certain moneys belonging to one Mrs. Eva Abbott, which came into his hands in his capacity as the attorney of said Mrs. Abbott. At the December term, 1890, of the said criminal court of Jackson county Missouri, he was placed on trial before the court and a jury, and was adjudged to be guilty of the offense charged in the indictment, and was convicted and sentenced to be imprisoned in the penitentiary of the state of Missouri for the period of five years. He prosecuted an appeal to the supreme court of the state of Missouri, and, under the statutes of that state, was permitted to go at liberty during the pendency of the appeal. He absented himself from the state of Missouri, and went to Colorado.

On the 28th day of March, 1892, the judgment of his conviction and sentence to the penitentiary were affirmed by the supreme court. He was then absent from the state of Missouri, and was in Colorado, and did not return to Missouri, but, in January, 1893, came to the city of Chicago. On the 4th day of June, 1894, he was arrested in the city of Chicago as a fugitive from justice, and was taken by the officers to the state of Missouri, and committed to the penitentiary of that state to serve the term of imprisonment to which he had been sentenced in the said criminal court of Jackson county. He remained a convict in the penitentiary of Missouri until August 21, 1896, a period of about twenty-six months, when he received a pardon from the then acting governor of the state. He returned to Chicago, and within about two months presented his application for admission to the bar of this state. The circuit court of Cook county, acting on the motion and testimony of a member of the bar of that county, entered an order to the effect that the respondent was a person of good moral character, and a copy of that order was presented with his application. He did not make known to the circuit court, the appellate court (before whom he was examined) or to this court that he had been sentenced to and served as a convict in the penitentiary of the state of Missouri. His name was ordered to be placed on the roll of the members of the bar of this state, and a license as an attorney at law of this state was issued to him on the 6th day of November, 1896.

The crime of which the respondent was convicted and imprisoned in the penitentiary of the state of Missouri was an infamous offense, which involved not only moral turpitude, but also the lack of professional integrity. The conviction of that crime had the effect to degrade him, and to establish that he was of bad moral character as a man and as a lawyer. The pardon granted him by the then acting governor of the state of Missouri did not efface the moral turpitude and want of professional honesty involved in the crime, nor obliterate the stain upon his moral character. People ex rel. Johnson v. George, 186 Ill. 122, 57 N. E. 804. He obtained the certificate from the circuit court of Cook county that he was possessed of a good moral character by concealing from the court the fact that he had been adjudged guilty by the court of final resort of a sister state of an offense involving his guilt of personal dishonesty in his dealings as an attorney with a client, and also by concealing from that court that he had but so recently served as a convict in the penitentiary of the state of Missouri until relieved from such punishment by a pardon. His concealment of these facts was a fraud on the circuit court. He practised a further fraud upon the appellate court and upon this court by presenting that certificate of good moral character so deceitfully and fraudulently obtained by him. Had this court been advised, when the respondent asked an order admitting him to the bar, that he had but only about two months before obtained his release from the penitentiary of the state of Missouri, where he had been imprisoned, because adjudged to be guilty of the crime of embezzlement of funds which had been intrusted to him by a client, he would not have been admitted as a member of the bar of the state. He obtained his certificate of admission by deceitfully and falsely inducing this court to believe that he enjoyed and possessed a good moral character, knowing at the same time that he was purposely concealing a fact which would demonstrate that his assertion was untrue. To permit him to longer hold that certificate of admission would be to allow him to enjoy the fruits of his own fraud and deceit.

The respondent, in his answer, asserts that he was innocent of any actual wrongdoing in the transaction with his client in Missouri, and that his conviction was not justified by the proofs, and was wrongful. The respondent and the relator have presented to us the testimony of the witnesses heard on the trial of the charge of embezzlement, as preserved in the record of that proceeding. Without conceding that any reason exists for declining to give full faith and credit to the adjudications of the courts of Missouri, we are unwilling to say that this testimony demonstrates that the respondent was innocent of the charge of which he was convicted. He was a member of the bar of Missouri, and was employed by Mrs. Abbott as her attorney to collect an indebtedness due to her. He collected $500 from her debtor on the 22d day of October, 1889. He saw her within three days thereafter, and saw and consulted with her and advised her frequently during the nine months which intervened before an accusation of the crime was lodged against him, and did not at any time inform her that he had collected any money for her, but, on the contrary, led her to believe that he had not received any money for her, until after she had caused a warrant to issue against him. He did not repay any of the money until after the affirmance by the supreme court of the judgment of conviction. While in the city of Chicago, a few months before he was seized as a fugitive from justice, he sent $240.75 to a friend in Kansas City, Missouri, to be paid to Mrs. Abbott on condition that she would sign a letter to the governor of 69 L. R. A.

the state which he had prepared and which he inclosed with the money. This letter contained some statements of alleged fact, and a recommendation of the writer that the respondent should be pardoned. Mrs. Abbott signed the letter and received the money, but the pardon was not granted. About eight months thereafter the respondent was extradited from Illinois, and placed in the penitentiary of Missouri.

It is true that in People ex rel. Deneen v. Coleman, 210 Ill. 79, 71 N. E. 693, we decline to accept the view urged upon us by the relator that the respondent ought to be disbarred on the charge, made in the petition and admitted in the answer, that the respondent had, previous to his application for admission to the bar of this state, been convicted in the courts of Indiana of a felonious offense involving moral turpitude, had served a portion of a term of imprisonment in the penitentiary of that state, had been pardoned, and had obtained license to practise the profession of law in this state, without having made known to the courts of this state that he had been so convicted of a felonious offense in the sister state. But in that case it appeared from the petition a period of thirteen years had elapsed between the time of the conviction and the time of the application for admission to the bar of this state, and the answer averred that for eight years of that time just preceding the application the respondent had been a resident of the state of Illinois; that he had during the eight years during which he had lived in Illinois before the license issued to him, and during the years since receiving the license, conducted himself as an honorable, upright, and law-abiding citizen, and had thereby established and enjoyed, and was entitled to enjoy, the reputation of a man of good moral character. In this state of the pleadings the relator moved that judgment of disbarment be entered on the averments of the petition and answer thereto. This motion we declined to grant, for the reason that it admitted the averments of the answer to be true, and, if true, it appeared from such averments that the respondent had repented of the wrong he had done, had reformed his evil ways, and had by years of good conduct and honorable practices restored himself to public confidence as an honorable and worthy man before he sought admission to the bar of this state. The case of this respondent and that of Coleman are alike in the fact that neither of them advised the court that he had been convicted of a crime which affected his moral character, and we now distinctly say that such an omission cannot, in any instance, be regarded otherwise than as the reprehensible concealment of a fact which it is the duty of an applicant for admission to the bar to disclose. In the Coleman Case, acting, as we did, upon the averments of the petition and the answer, it appeared to us that Coleman had, before applying to this court for license, by years of upright and honorable life, recovered his standing as an honorable and moral man; and it also further appeared from the answer in his case that, in the years that had elapsed after his admission to the bar in Illinois, and before the petition for his disbarment had been filed, his life as a lawyer and as a citizen had been such as to demonstrate that his reformation had been complete and permanent and that he had maintained a good moral character. In these latter respects the case of this respondent is entirely unlike that of Coleman. He did not, after being released from further punishment in the penitentiary, devote any of the years of his life to the upbuilding of a moral character and to the obliteration of the bad moral reputation which had attached to him by reason of his conviction of a crime which involved a want of personal and professional integrity. On the contrary, he came almost directly from the doors of the penitentiary in Missouri to the presence of the courts in Illinois, and deceitfully and fraudulently imposed himself upon our courts as a man of good moral character. And, furthermore, the record in this cause discloses that he has, since receiving his license to practise law from this court, persisted in his evil and wicked ways. It appears from the testimony produced in this record that in 1899,—some three years after his admission to the bar of this state,—an indictment was returned against him by the grand jury of Carroll county, in this state, charging him and others with having entered into a criminal conspiracy to obtain the money of two citizens of that county by false pretenses and by means and use of the confidence game. On a trial before a jury in the circuit court of Carroll county the respondent and three others, who were indicted as coconspirators with him, were adjudged to be guilty of the crime charged, and the respondent and two other of his coconspirators were sentenced to be imprisoned in the penitentiary of this state at Joliet. This conviction was reviewed on a writ of error issued out of the appellate court for the second district, and the judgment of conviction was reversed for two reasons, as appears in the opinion of the appellate court, reported in 87 Ill. App. 128, to which respondent, in his answer, especially refers for the information of the court. The two grounds of reversal were, (1) the refusal of the trial court to require the people to apprise the respondent, by a bill of particulars, more definitely and particularly of the nature of the accusation against him, and (2) that the state's attorney, in his address to the jury, improperly referred to the failure of the respondent to testify as a witness on the hearing of the cause. Respondent alleges, in his answer, that after the reversal of the judgment of conviction a nolle prosequi was entered in the cause by the state's attorney.

We have, at the suggestion of the respondent, read the opinion in that case, and have also read the testimony taken by the respective parties on the reference made under this petition. The nature of the charges of which the respondent was convicted in the trial court in Carroll county was that the two prosecuting witnesses, who lived in Carroll county, and three other persons who resided in Chicago, had engaged in a scheme for tapping telegraph wires running to a pool room in Chicago and intercepting and delaying reports of the racing of horses, in order that they might win money by betting on the winning horses, and that the three Chicago conspirators conceived a plan of extorting money from their Carroll county confederates in wire tapping by inducing them to believe that two of the Chicago confederates had been arrested on a charge of tapping telegraph wires, and that the instruments and appliances for tapping the wires had been seized by the officers, and that, unless a large sum of money should be provided by the Carroll county confederates, to be used in corrupting the officers to surrender the possession of these instruments and appliances for tapping the wires, all of the confederates would be in danger of exposure, arrest, and conviction. It was contended by the prosecution that the respondent, in his assumed capacity as an attorney, was an actor in the conspiracy to obtain the money of the Carroll county confederates in the wire-tapping scheme, and was to share in the moneys that might thus be extorted from the Carroll county men. One George C. Mastin, a witness on the trial before the jury in Carroll county, testified that he was an attorney at law in Chicago, and was consulted by a friend of the Carroll county men; that the Carroll county men had drawn a draft for $2,100 in response to a telephone message from the respondent that that amount would be required; that he (the witness) induced the holder of the draft to deliver it to him, and then called upon the respondent to ascertain the facts as to the alleged necessity of the payment of that sum of money by his clients; that the respondent told him that the story that two of the Chicago conspirators had been "placed in the central station was a fake;"

that one of the Carroll county men was badly scared, and would "give up many thousands of dollars rather than be punished;" that the guilt of the parties was so evident that they could not be defended; that, if Mastin would advise his clients to give up the $2,100, he (Mastin) should have one third of it, and the balance would be divided between himself (respondent) and another, whom he did not name; that the payment of $2,100 would be much less punishment than they would suffer if they were arrested and sent to the penitentiary; that, if they paid the $2,100, they would be relieved from all danger of prosecution and arrest. Mastin substantially repeated these statements in his testimony taken in this proceeding, and the respondent testified that the conversation as testified to by Mastin did not occur. The respondent admitted that he went to Carroll county, and had an interview with the conspirators in the wire-tapping scheme who lived there. His counsel, in his brief in this case, says that the respondent in that interview explained to the Carroll county men that "wire tapping and conspiracy to tap wires were crimes; and told them the penalties attached by statute to each; and recited what Roach and Vaughn [two of the Chicago conspirators] had already told him about a detective for the Western Union having taken the machinery, and suggested that, if the parties in possession of the machinery and those prosecuting would cease their activity and give up the machinery on payment of their losses, the strongest evidence of guilt would be out of the possession of the prosecution;" that, "while Gilmore has no recollection of the sum of $2,000 being mentioned, the writer of this inclines to the opinion that Gilmore did express the opinion that the sum mentioned by Chisholm would be sufficient." Respondent testified on the hearing that after he returned to Chicago he telephoned the Carroll county men that $2,100 would be required to "get the machinery," etc.

If the testimony of Mastin be true, the respondent was guilty as a party to the conspiracy to extort money from the Carroll county confederates, and of prostituting his standing and position as a member of the bar to the furtherance of that criminal purpose. If the view urged by the respondent be true, it would appear he sought to obtain the money for the purpose of corrupting the public officers to surrender the evidence of the guilt of his clients, though it seems to be the better conclusion to be drawn from the evidence that the machinery and appliances for tapping the wires were never, in fact, in the hands of the police authorities. If the view of the respondent be accepted, there seems no escape from the conclusion that since his admission to the bar he has been guilty of professional misconduct evincing such lack of personal integrity and professional honor as to establish that he is unworthy to be longer allowed to hold a place in the ranks of an honorable profession.

The prayer of this petition will be granted, and judgment will be entered herein ordering that the name of the respondent be stricken from the roll of attorneys in this state, and also that the respondent pay the costs of this proceeding.

Rule made absolute.

(24 C. C. A. 280, 47 U. S. App. 339, 78 Fed. 693.)

1. A receiver of a Federal court in charge of a railroad company, who, by act Cong. March 3, 1887, chap. 373, corrected by act August 13, 1888, chap. 866, is required to manage and operate the property according to the requirements of the valid laws of the state in which it is situated, in the same manner as the owner or possessor thereof would be bound to do if in possession, is subject to any rule prescribed by the state imposing on railroad corporations a liability for the negligence of employees having superior authority over other employees.

2. An action against a receiver of a railroad corporation is within the provisions of Ohio act April 2, 1890, making railroad companies liable in certain cases for the negligence of fellow servants or employees who have power or authority to direct or control the one injured.

3. Railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce are subject to a state statute making railroad companies liable for injuries to employees on account of the negligence of others having control or direction of them, so long as Congress does not deal with that subject.

NOTE.—As to liability of receiver for injuries caused by operation of railroad, see note to Turner v. Cross, 15 L. R. A. 262.

4. A constitutional provision requiring all laws of a general nature to have a uniform operation throughout the state is not violated by Ohio act April 2, 1890, relating to the liability of railroad companies for injuries to employees, since it applies to all railroad corporations operating railroads within the state, and to all of a common class of railroad employees.
5. Negligence of a superior servant of a railroad company, causing injury to an employee under his control, renders the employer liable under Ohio act April 2, 1890, although the negligence was in respect of the performance of work of the kind done by the injured person, and not in the performance of any duty imposed by law on the master personally.
6. A verdict for damages will not be disturbed on writ of error on the ground that they were excessive, when the trial court did not disturb it.
7. Declarations of a train conductor tending to show that his negligence caused an injury to an employee whose hand was caught between cars is admissible as part of the res gestæ when made as he met the injured man with his hand still bleeding, immediately after he had come from between the cars, and had walked only six or seven car lengths toward the engine.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Ohio to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by negligence for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Harlan, Circuit Justice, and Taft and Lurton, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. Brown & Geddes, for plaintiff in error:

The negligence complained of was the negligence of a fellow servant.

The mere exercise of authority by one servant over another does not create the relation of vice principal.

The Ohio statute as to fellow servants is confined to corporations owning or operating a railroad in Ohio. It does not apply to any employer carrying on any other kind of business; nor to an individual owning or operating a railroad. It applies only to a railroad or railway corporation. It is limited to classes of employers and employees which do not include either the plaintiff or the defendant in this case. It does not apply to a court of chancery having possession of a railroad property, and operating the same through a receiver.

When the property of a railroad company is in the hands of a receiver, who has full possession and entire charge of its affairs, the corporation itself is not liable for damage or injury caused by the acts of negligence of such a receiver, or of any of his agents or employees.

The Federal statute does not enlarge the state statute. If the latter does not by its terms apply to a receiver, the Federal statute will not so apply it.

Where state statutes impose a liability upon a railway company as owner, which does not exist as against a receiver of the railway, the Federal courts will not place the receiver upon the same plane of liability as the owner.

Campbell*, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 714, 25 S. W. 267.

Harlan, Circuit Justice, delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by Edward Van Dusen against R. B. F. Peirce, as the receiver of the Toledo, St. Louis, & Kansas City Railroad Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Ohio.

The order appointing Peirce as receiver was made by the court below in the suit of Continental Trust Co. v. Toledo, St. L. & K. C. R. Co. 72 Fed. 92. It directed the receiver to operate the railroad, and do all things necessary to carry on the business of the company. He was so engaged on the 26th day of February, 1895, when Edward Van Dusen, the plaintiff, a yard brakeman, in the employ of the receiver, was so seriously and permanently injured while in the discharge of his duties—being himself without fault—that he lost entirely the use of his right hand. These injuries, it is alleged, were caused solely through the carelessness and negligence of one Hugh Bartley, a conductor employed by the receiver, and under whose control and direction the plaintiff was placed at the time of his being injured.

The defendant denied the allegations imputing negligence to him, and denied that the plaintiff was without fault.

A verdict was returned in favor of the plaintiff for $5,500 in damages. A motion for a new trial having been made and overruled, judgment was entered upon the verdict.

The principal question before us is whether the statute of Ohio passed April 2, 1890 (87 Ohio Laws p. 149), entitled "An Act for the Protection and Relief of Railroad Employees; Forbidding Certain Rules, Regulations, Contracts, and Agreements, and Declaring Them Unlawful; Declaring It Unlawful to Use Cars or Locomotives Which Are Defective, or Defective Machinery or Attachments thereto Belonging; and Declaring Such Corporation Liable, in Certain Cases, for Injuries Received by Its Servants and Employees on Account of the Carelessness or Negligence of a Fellow Servant or Employee,"—is applicable to cases against the receiver of a railroad corporation, especially one acting under the orders of a Federal court.

The 1st section of the act provides that "it shall be unlawful for any railroad or railway corporation or company owning and operating, or operating, or that may hereafter own or operate, a railroad in whole or in part in this state, to adopt or promulgate any rule or regulation for the government of its servants or employees, or make or enter into any contract or agreement with any person engaged in, or about to engage in, its service, in which, or by the terms of which, such employee in any manner, directly or indirectly, promises or agrees to hold such corporation or company harmless, on account of any injury he may receive by reason of any accident to, breakage, defect, or insufficiency in, the cars or machinery and attachments thereto belonging, upon any cars so owned and operated, or being run and operated by such corporation or company, being defective, and any such rule, regulation, contract, or agreement shall be of no effect. It shall be unlawful for any corporation to compel or require, directly or indirectly, an employee to join any company association whatsoever, or to withhold any part of an employee's wages or his salary for the payment of dues or assessments in any society or organization whatsoever, or demand or require either as a condition precedent to securing employment or being employed; and said railroad or railway company shall not discharge any employee because he refuses or neglects to become a member of any society or organization. And if any employee is discharged he may, at any time within ten days after receiving a notice of his discharge, demand the reason of said discharge; and said railway or railroad company shall thereupon furnish said reason to said discharged employee in writing. And no railroad company, insurance society or association, or other person, shall demand, accept, require, or enter into any contract, agreement, or stipulation with any person about to enter or in the employ of any railroad company whereby such person stipulates or agrees to surrender or waive any right to damages against any railroad company thereafter arising for personal injury or death, or whereby he agrees to surrender or waive in case he asserts the same any other right whatsoever; and all such stipulation and agreements shall be void, and every corporation, association, or person violating, or aiding or abetting in the violation of, this 69 L. R. A.

section shall for each offense forfeit and pay to the person wronged or deprived of his rights hereunder the sum of not less than fifty dollars ($50) nor more than five hundred dollars ($500), to be recovered in a civil action."

By the 2d section it is made "unlawful for any such corporation to knowingly or negligently use or operate any car or locomotive that is defective, or any car or locomotive upon which the machinery or attachments thereto belonging are in any manner defective. If the employee of any such corporation shall receive any injury by reason of any defect in any car or locomotive, or in the machinery or attachments thereto belonging, owned, and operated, or being run and operated, by such corporation, such corporation shall be deemed to have had knowledge of such defect before and at the time such injury is so sustained; and when the fact of such defect shall be made to appear at the trial of any action in the courts of this state, brought by such employee, or his legal representatives, against any railroad corporation for damages, on account of such injuries so received, the same shall be prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of such corporation."

The 3d section, which is the one whose scope and meaning is involved in this action, provides that "in all actions against the railroad company for personal injury to, or death resulting from personal injury of, any person, while in the employ of such company, arising from the negligence of such company or any of its officers or employees, it shall be held, in addition to the liability now existing by law, that every person in the employ of such company actually having power or authority to direct or control any other employee of such company, is not the fellow servant, but superior, of such other employee; also that every person in the employ of such company having charge or control of employees in any separate branch or department shall be held to be the superior, and not fellow servant, of employees in any other branch or department who have no power to direct or control in the branch or department in which they are employed."

At the trial below it was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that the conductor and switchmen or yard brakemen, even when engaged together, at the same time and place, in operating the same train of cars, were not to be deemed fellow servants within the rule exempting an employer from liability to one servant for an injury caused by the negligence of a fellow servant. The circuit court, held by Judge Hammond, without deciding this question as one of general law, held that the case was governed by the 3d section of the above act of April 2, 1890, and, consequently, that Bartley, the conductor, having power to direct and control the work in which Van Dusen was engaged, was the superior, not the fellow servant, of Van Dusen, and was, therefore, the representative of the receiver.

The contention of the receiver is that that act by its terms applies only to corporations owning or operating railroads in whole or in part in Ohio by their own officers; and that it cannot properly be construed as applying to receivers operating railroads under the orders of a court of chancery. There are adjudged cases arising under statutes similar to the Ohio statute which seem to sustain this contention of the receiver. Henderson v. Walker, 55 Ga. 481; Campbell v. Cook, 86 Tex. 630, 634, 40 Am. St. Rep. 878, 26 S. W. 486.

If the reasoning of the Georgia and Texas courts be applied to the Ohio statute, it cannot be held to embrace employees acting under the receiver of a railroad corporation. But, in our judgment, the statute is applicable to actions against receivers of railroad corporations. To hold otherwise would be to subordinate the reason of the law altogether to its letter. While the intention of the legislature must be ascertained from the words used to express it, the manifest reason and the obvious purpose of the law should not be sacrificed to a literal interpretation of such words. If the Ohio statute is construed as applicable only to actions for personal injuries brought directly against railroad corporations, the result would be that in an action brought in one of the courts of Ohio the employees of a railroad corporation would be accorded rights that would be denied in another action of like kind, perhaps in the same court, to employees of the receiver of a railroad corporation under exactly similar circumstances. Could such a result have been contemplated by the legislature of Ohio? We think not. The avowed object of the statute was the protection and relief of railroad employees. To that end, it declared that in the actions mentioned in it every person employed by the railroad company, and invested with power or authority to direct or control other employees, should be deemed the superior, not the fellow servant, of those under his direction and control. The legal effect, as well as the object, of this declaration was, in the cases specified, to make the negligence of the superior the negligence of the company. No violence is done to the ordinary meaning of the words of the statute if it be held that the legislature had in mind actions against receivers of railroad corporations, as well as actions directly against such corporations. The appointment of a receiver of a railroad does not change the title to the property, or work a dissolution of the corporation. Although the creature of the court, and acting under its orders, the receiver, for most purposes, stands in the place of the corporation, exercising its general powers, asserting its rights, controlling its property, carrying out the objects for which it was created, discharging the public duties resting upon it, and representing the interests as well of those who own the railroad as of those who have claims against the corporation or its property. The corporation remains in existence notwithstanding a provisional receivership established by an order of court; and for the purpose of effectuating the will of the state, as manifested by the act of 1890, an action against the receiver arising out of his management of the property may be regarded as one against the corporation "in the hands of," or "in the possession of," the receiver. McNulta v. Lochridge, 141 U. S. 327, 331, 35 L. ed. 796, 799, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 11.

In Central Trust Co. v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. (1886) 26 Fed. 12, it was held that the statute of Missouri giving double damages against "every railroad corporation" which did not erect and maintain fences, openings, gates, farm crossings, and cattle guards on the line of its road (the validity of which act was sustained in Missouri P. R. Co. v. Humes, 115 U. S. 512, 29 L. ed. 463, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 110,) was applicable to a railroad in the hands of a receiver. To the same effect was Hornsby v. Eddy, 5 C. C. A. 560, 572, 12 U. S. App. 404, 56 Fed. 461, where the question was as to the applicability to Federal receivers of a railroad of a statute of Kansas providing that "every railroad company" organized or doing business in that state "shall be liable for all damages done to any employee of such company, in consequence of any negligence of its agents, or by any mismanagement of its engineers or other employees, to any person sustaining such damage." In that case, the circuit court of appeals for the eighth circuit well said: "It is clear that, with respect to persons employed by a railway company as railway operatives, the statute last above quoted changes the rule of the common law that the master is not liable to a servant for an injury sustained in consequence of the negligence of a fellow servant. Does the fact that a receiver is appointed to temporarily operate a railroad forthwith alter the status of all of its employees, and re-establish as to them the rule of the common law, so long as the receiver remains in charge? Viewing the question in the light of those considerations of public policy which probably gave birth to the statute, we cannot conceive of any reason why the appointment of a receiver should have such effect. It is a fact of which we may well take judicial notice that great railway systems, which employ thousands of men, are frequently operated for a term of years through the agency of a receiver. Such receivers do not, as a general rule, change the working force of the road, or the rules and regulations by which trains are run, or by which the other business of the road is transacted. The men whom they employ are engaged in the same quasi-public service as other railway employees, and daily encounter the same risks and hazards. Furthermore the receiver of a railroad operates it for the immediate benefit of the company by which it is owned, in that he discharges all of the public duties of the corporation, and appropriates the income of its road to the preservation of its property and franchises, and to the payment of its debts."

So much as to the scope and true meaning of the Ohio statute, without reference to the courts in which it may be enforced. If the statute means what we hold it to mean, must not full effect be given to it in actions for personal injuries brought against a receiver in a court of the United States? This question must be answered in the affirmative. Such legislation is not liable to the objection that it encroaches upon Federal authority, or upon the jurisdiction or power of the United States court. The statute does nothing more than to prescribe a rule of action to be observed by all within the state. The authority to enact it is derived from the general power of the state to regulate the exercise of the relative rights and duties, and to provide for the safety, of all persons within its territorial jurisdiction. It is the duty of the Federal court sitting in this state to enforce all enactments having such objects in view, unless they encroach upon the powers and authority of the United States. That duty arises out of the statute declaring that "the laws of the several states, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply." Rev. Stat. § 721, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 581; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Camp, 13 C. C. A. 233, 31 U. S. App. 213, 65 Fed. 952. Indeed, if Congress had not so declared, this court, upon principles of comity, and in support of the public policy of the state, might well recognize and enforce, in actions brought against receivers of railroads, any rule established by the state for like actions brought against railroad companies.

The Ohio statute is not applicable alone to railroad corporations of Ohio engaged in the domestic commerce of this state, It is equally applicable to railroad corporations doing business in Ohio and engaged in commerce among the states although the statute, in its operation, may affect in some degree a subject over which Congress can exert full power. The states may do many things affecting commerce with foreign nations and among the several states until Congress covers the subject by national legislation. This principle is illustrated in many cases; as in Cooley v. Port Wardens, 12 How. 299, 320, 13 L. ed. 996, 1005, where the pilot laws of Pennsylvania were sustained, and were held to have been enacted by virtue of the power residing in the state to legislate, Congress not having abrogated them or established regulations inconsistent with them; as in Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 99, 104, 23 L. ed. 819, 820, where the court held that a statute of Indiana, giving a right of action to the personal representatives of a deceased when his death was caused by the wrongful act or omission of another, was applicable to the case of death resulting from collisions between vessels engaged in interstate commerce; and in which case it was said, generally, "that the legislation of a state, not directed against commerce or any of its regulations, but relating to the rights, duties, and liabilities of citizens, and only indirectly and remotely affecting the operations of commerce, is of obligatory force upon citizens within its territorial jurisdiction, whether on land or water, or engaged in commerce, foreign or interstate, or in any other pursuit;" as in Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. S. Co. v. Board of Health, 118 U. S. 455, 463, 30 L. ed. 237, 241, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1114, where a quarantine statute of Louisiana, directly affecting commerce among the states and with foreign nations, was held not to be void as a regulation of commerce, but was valid under the power of the state to protect the public health, and was to be respected until the system of quarantine established by it was abrogated or displaced by Congress; as in Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 508, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 804, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 564, where a statute of Alabama was upheld that required all locomotive engineers in that state, whether they served on trains engaged in domestic commerce, or only on trains engaged in interstate commerce, to be examined and licensed by a state board before acting as engineers within that state; and as in Nashville, O. & St. L. R. Co. v. Alabama, 128 U. S. 96, 100, 32 L. ed. 352, 354, 2 Inters. Com. Rep.

238, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 28, in which the court held to be constitutional a state enactment requiring all locomotive engineers to be examined by a state board for color blindness, and in which case it was said that "wherever there is any business in which, either from the products created or the instrumentalities used, there is danger to life or property, it is not only within the power of the states, but it is among their plain duties, to make provision against accidents likely to follow in such business, so that the dangers attending it may be guarded against so far as is practicable;" and which local enactments were to be deemed valid until Congress took action on the subject. In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. James, 162 U. S. 650, 662, 40 L. ed. 1105, 1109, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 934, the Supreme Court of the United States held a statute of Georgia requiring every telegraph company with a line of wires wholly or partly within that state to receive despatches, and, on payment of the usual charges, to transmit and deliver them with due diligence, under a named penalty, to be a valid exercise of the police power of the state in relation to interstate messages. The court said: "While it is vitally important that commerce between the states should be unembarrassed by vexatious state regulations regarding it, yet, on the other hand, there are many occasions where the police power of the state can be properly exercised to insure a faithful and prompt performance of duty within the limits of the state upon the part of those who are engaged in interstate commerce. We think the statute in question is one of that class, and, in the absence of any legislation by Congress, the statute is a valid exercise of the power of the state over the subject."

In Hennington v. Georgia, 163 U. S. 299, 317, 41 L. ed. 166, 173, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1086, in which a statute of Georgia forbidding the running of freight trains in that state on the Sabbath day was assailed as unconstitutional when applied to interstate commerce, the Supreme Court of the United States, upon a review of the adjudged cases, held it to be clear that "the legislative enactments of the states, passed under their admitted police powers, and having a real relation to the domestic peace, order, health, and safety of their people; but which, by their necessary operation, affect to some extent, or for a limited time, the conduct of commerce among the states,—are yet not invalid by force alone of the grant of power to Congress to regulate such commerce; and, if not obnoxious to some other constitutional provision, or destructive of some right secured by the fundamental law, are to be respected in the courts of the Union until they are superseded and displaced by some act of Congress passed in execution of the power granted to it by the Constitution."

Undoubtedly, the whole subject of the liability of interstate railroad companies for the negligence of those in their service may be covered by national legislation enacted by Congress under its power to regulate commerce among the states. But, as Congress has not dealt with that subject, it was competent for Ohio to declare that an employee of any railroad corporation doing business here, including those engaged in commerce among the states, shall be deemed, in respect to his acts within this state, the superior, not the fellow servant, of other employees placed under his control. If the effect of the Ohio statute be, as undoubtedly it is, to impose upon such corporations, in particular circumstances, a liability for injuries received by some of its employees which would not otherwise rest upon them according to the principles of general law, that fact does not release the Federal court from its obligation to enforce the enactments of the state. Of the validity of such state legislation we entertain no doubt. In Missouri P. R. Co. v. Mackey, 127 U. S. 205, 208, 210, 32 L. ed. 107-109, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1161, the Supreme Court had occasion to consider several objections to a law of Kansas making railroad companies liable for injuries suffered by employees through the negligence of their fellow servants. Replying to the objection that such legislation denies the equal protection of the laws to railroad companies, in that it did not apply alike to all corporations, the court said: "But the hazardous character of the business of operating a railway would seem to call for special legislation with respect to railroad corporations, having for its object the protection of their employees as well as the safety of the public. The business of other corporations is not subject to similiar dangers to their employees, and no objections, therefore, can be made to the legislation on the ground of its making an unjust discrimination."

There is another view of this matter, equally conclusive. By act Cong. March 3, 1887, chap. 373 (24 Stat. at L. 554), as amended by act August 13, 1888, chap. 866 (25 Stat. at L. 433, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 582), it is provided:

"Sec. 2. That whenever in any cause pending in any court of the United States there shall be a receiver or manager in possession of any property, such receiver or manager shall manage and operate such property according to the requirements of the valid laws of the state in which such property shall be situated in the same manner the owner or possessor thereof would be bound to do if in possession thereof. Any receiver or manager who shall wilfully violate the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $3,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

"Sec. 3. That every receiver or manager of any property appointed by any court of the United States may be sued in respect of any act or transaction of his in carrying on the business connected with such property, without the previous leave of the court in which such receiver or manager was appointed; but such suit shall be subject to the general equity jurisdiction of the court in which such receiver or manager was appointed, so far as the same shall be necessary to the ends of justice."

It would seem to be clear that, under this act of Congress, if a railroad in the possession of a Federal receiver is to be managed and operated according to the requirements of the laws of the state in which the property is situated, "in the same manner that the owner or possessor thereof would be bound to do if in possession thereof," such management and operation must be subject to any rule prescribed by the state imposing upon railroad corporations liability for the negligence of employees having superior authority over other employees.

This we understand to be the effect of the decision in Eddy v. Lafayette, 163 U. S. 456, 464, 41 L. ed. 225, 228, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1082, in which the question arose whether the local statutes regulating the service of process against a railway corporation were applicable to actions against the receivers of such corporations. The trial court and the circuit court of appeals were of opinion that the 3d section of the judiciary act of March 3, 1887, chap. 373, § 2 (24 Stat. at. L. 552, 554, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 582), authorizing suits to be brought against receivers of railroads without special leave of the court by which they were appointed, was intended to place receivers "upon the same plane with railroad companies," both as respects their liability to be sued for acts done while operating a railroad, and as respects the mode of service of process. [4 U. S. App: 247, 251.] This court said: "We concur in that view, and in the conclusion reached, that the service in the present case, on an agent of the receivers, was sufficient to bring them into court in a suit arising within the Indian territory."

But it is contended that the Ohio statute is repugnant to the provision of the Constitution of Ohio declaring that "all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation throughout the state." Art. 2. § 26. The argument made in support of 69 L. R. A.

this view by the learned counsel for the receiver may be thus summarized: That the act imposes a liability for damages for the negligence of fellow servants only as against a railroad company operating a railroad within Ohio; that it confers a right of action only upon employees of such railroad companies; that no other employer is subject to the liability, and no other employee is given the right; that the act selects from the general class of employers railroad companies operating railroads, and imposes upon them a special burden; that the act is special class legislation, not uniform throughout the state, and applies to no person or company engaged in any other occupation employing servants, although the occupation be equally hazardous. Consequently, the act is special in its operation and effect, is confined to particular corporations engaged in a specific business, does not cover the whole subject of the relations of master and servant, and is not, therefore, of a general nature, and of uniform operation throughout the state, within the meaning of the Constitution of Ohio.

In support of these views, counsel have referred to Shaver v. Pennsylvania Co. 71 Fed. 931, which was an action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from the negligence of a railroad corporation and its agents. The defense was that the plaintiff, by becoming a member of an organization known as the "Voluntary Relief Department of the Pennsylvania Lines West of Pittsburgh," and accepting the benefits of said association, had agreed that the railroad company should be discharged from any and all liability to him on account of such injuries. The plaintiff demurred to the answer upon the ground that the agreement referred to was invalid under the above statute of Ohio of 1890, which, as we have seen, provides in its 1st section that "no railroad company, insurance society, or association, or other person, shall demand, accept, require, or enter into any contract, agreement, stipulation, with any other person about to enter, or in the employ of any railroad company, whereby such person stipulates or agrees to surrender or waive any right to damages against any railroad company, thereafter arising for personal injury or death, or whereby he agrees to surrender or waive, in case he asserts the same, any other right whatsoever; and all such stipulations or agreements shall be void." etc.

Judge Ricks held that the contract relied on by the railroad company was valid, and that the statute of Ohio declaring it to be void was unconstitutional. "The Ohio statute," he said, "in denying to the employees of a railroad corporation the right to make their own contracts concerning their own labor, is depriving them of 'liberty,' and of the right to exercise the privileges of manhood, 'without due process of law.' Being directed solely to employees of railroads, it is class legislation of the most vicious character. Laws must be not only uniform in their application throughout the territory over which the legislative jurisdiction extends, but they must apply to all classes of citizens alike. There cannot be one law for railroad employees, another law for employees in factories, and another law for employees on a farm or the highways. Class legislation is dangerous. Statutes intended to favor one class often become oppressive, tyrannical, and proscriptive to other classes never intended to be affected thereby; so that the framers of our Constitution, learning from experience, wisely provided that the laws should be general in their nature and uniform throughout the state." The court, elsewhere in its opinion, when considering the scope of the constitutional provision that all laws of a general nature shall have uniform operation throughout the state, said: "The act under consideration, while it is general in its nature, applies only to railroad companies and their employees, and is not, therefore, general in its application, and does not operate uniformly on all classes of citizens. Under this statute, railroad companies are prohibited from making contracts which other corporations in the state are allowed to make. . . . The act under consideration is certainly one which impairs the rights of a large number of the citizens of Ohio to exercise a privilege which is dear to all persons, namely, that of making contracts concerning their own labor and the fruits thereof, and, so far as it relates to such contracts already made, impairs their validity. The act seems to assume that a large class of the citizens of the state, namely, those employed by railroad corporations, are incapable of making contracts for their own labor."

It may be proper here to observe that in a case recently determined by the supreme court of Ohio a contract such as the one involved in Shaver's Case was held not to be interdicted by the above act of April 2, 1890 (87 Ohio Laws, 149), and not to be contrary to public policy. Pittsburg, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Cox, 55 Ohio St. 497, 35 L. R. A. 507, 45 N. E. 641.

It is quite clear from an examination of Judge Ricks's opinion that he intended to decide nothing more—indeed, the case, under his view of the statute, required nothing more to be decided—than that the part of the act of 1890 relating to contracts or agreements, whereby a right to damages against a railroad company, arising from personal injury or death, was surrendered or waived when the employee became a member of the relief association referred to, was unconstitutional, as depriving the employees of railroad corporations of their liberty without due process of law. He had no occasion, in the case before him, to consider the validity of the 3d section of that act. The 1st section might be held void, leaving the 3d section in full force. Even if the act of 1890 in the particulars involved in Shaver's Case, and for the reasons stated by Judge Ricks, were held to be unconstitutional,—upon which question it is unnecessary to express an opinion,—the statute, in respect of the matters mentioned in the 3d section, can be sustained as one of a general nature, and having uniform operation throughout the state.

This general question has been considered by the supreme court of Ohio. In McGill v. State, 34 Ohio St. 238, the court, referring to the constitutional provision requiring all laws of a general nature to have a uniform operation throughout the state, said: "A general law that land should not be sold upon execution for less than two thirds of its appraised value was excluded from operation in several counties by local enactment. There were different laws in different counties respecting the descent and distribution of intestate property. Some statutes defining legal offenses were excluded in their operation from a large part of the state; and different penalties for a violation of the same act were, in some instances, provided for different localities. These are examples of the legislation to prevent which in the future, and the mischief resulting from it, this provision of the Constitution was adopted. But no wider scope was claimed for it than to guard the future against the evils and inequalities resulting from legislation of the character complained of." See also Lehman v. McBride, 15 Ohio St. 573, 653; Ex parte Falk, 42 Ohio St. 638, 641; Costello v. Wyoming, 49 Ohio St. 202, 30 N. E. 613.

In State v. Nelson, 52 Ohio St. 88, 97, 26 L. R. A. 317, 39 N. E. 22, where the question was whether an act entitled "An Act Requiring Persons, Associations, and Corporations Owning or Operating Street Cars to Provide for the Well-being of the Employees"—the act, in its provisions, being made applicable only to electric street cars other than trail cars—was in conflict with the constitutional provision requiring all laws of a general nature to have a uniform operation throughout the state, the court said: "The act in question is clearly of a general nature, so that the only inquiry left is whether it is of uniform operation throughout the state. And here, again, it is equally clear that the law is in operation throughout every part of the state, uniformly as to all classes therein named. Is this sufficient? Soon after the adoption of the Constitution it was said by this court that the scope and purpose of this section was to prevent laws of a general nature from being in force in some counties and not in others; and these early cases have been followed ever since." Again: "Of late years an effort has frequently been made to claim for this section of the Constitution a wider scope than to guard against the evils resulting from legislation of the character mentioned by Thurman, J., in Cass v. Dillon, 2 Ohio St. 607, Scott, J., in Lehman v. McBride, Boynton, J., in McGill v. State, and Okey, J., in Ex parte Falk; but such efforts have uniformly failed. The only statutes which have been declared in conflict with this section of the Constitution are statutes making different classes of different parts of the territory of the state, such as cities, villages, etc. This section of the Constitution requires that laws of a general nature shall have not only an operation, but a uniform operation, throughout the state; that is, the whole state, and not only in one or more counties. The operation must be uniform upon the subject-matter of the statute. It cannot operate upon the named subject-matter in one part of the state differently from what it operates upon it in other parts of the state. That is, the law must operate uniformly on the named subject-matter in every part of the state, and when it does that it complies with this section of the Constitution. That this is the scope and purpose of this section appears from its language, the debates of the constitutional convention, and the uniform construction placed thereon by this court in the cases above cited, and others hereinafter referred to. . . . In Adler v. Whitbeck, 44 Ohio St. 539, 9 N. E. 672, an effort was made to have the statute there under consideration declared unconstitutional because its classification included saloons and excluded distilleries and breweries; but the effort failed. A similar effort was made in Senior v. Ratterman, 44 Ohio St. 661, 11 N. E. 321, because wholesale dealers and manufacturers were not included within the same class; and the effort again failed. A similar effort was made in State v. Portsmouth & O. Turnp. R. Co. 37 Ohio St. 481, as to the classification of turnpikes; and the effort again failed. . . . The scope and force of this section of our Constitution being as herein indicated, it is clear that the statute in question is not in conflict therewith. The statute is in operation in every part of the state, and operates uniformly upon the classes of persons therein designated in every part of the state. The act is clearly authorized as a police regulation to protect the health and promote the comfort of those engaged in operating electric cars."

The question under consideration is somewhat like that presented in Harwood v. Wentworth, 162 U. S. 547, 563, 40 L. ed. 1069, 1074, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 890. There the question was whether an act of the legislature of Arizona fixing the compensation of county officers, and for that purpose classifying the counties of the state according to the assessed valuation of property in each county, was a local or special act. If so, it was void, as repugnant to an act of Congress declaring that the legislatures of the territories shall not pass local or special laws in certain cases. The practical effect of the act was to establish higher salaries for the particular officers named in some counties than for the same class of officers in other counties. "But," the Supreme Court said, "that does not make it a local or special law. The act is general in its operation; it applies to all counties in the territory; it prescribes a rule for the stated compensation of certain public officers; no officer of the classes named is exempted from its operation; and there is such a relation between the salaries fixed for each class of counties, and the equalized assessed valuation of property in them, respectively, as to show that the act is not local and special in any just sense, but is general in its application to the whole territory, and designed to establish a system for compensating county officers that is not intrinsically unjust, nor capable of being applied for purposes merely local or special."

We do not deem it necessary to pursue this subject further. We think it clear that the Ohio statute is not obnoxious to the constitutional provision requiring all laws of a general nature to have a uniform operation throughout the state. As it applies to all railroad corporations operating railroads within the state, it is, within the meaning of the state Constitution, general in its nature; and, as it applies to all of a given class of railroad employees, it operates uniformly throughout the state.

It is next contended by the plaintiff in error that, if Van Dusen was injured by the negligence of Bartley, the conductor, he is not entitled to recover, for the reason that the latter was not negligent in the performance of any duty imposed by law on the master personally, but only in respect to the performance of work pertaining to him and other employees in the same work. The principal authorities cited in support of this view are Central R. Co. v. Keegan, 160

U. S. 259, 40 L. ed. 418, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 269, and Stockmeyer v. Reed, 55 Fed. 259.

If this contention were sustained, the statute of Ohio would be deprived of all practical value, and the manifest object of the legislature in passing it would be defeated. The Keegan and Stockmeyer Cases enforced the general rule that a foreman or superintendent of a body of employees doing a particular service was a fellow servant of those under him; and, consequently, the common employer was not liable to one of them for the negligence of the other. The very object of the statute before us was to prevent the application of that rule in Ohio as between a railroad company and its employees. Hence it declared that every person in the employ of a railroad company, "having power or authority to direct or control any other employee of such company, is not the fellow servant, but the superior, of such other employee." If, by force of the statute, Bartley was not a fellow servant, but the superior, of Van Dusen, he did not become, within the meaning of the statute, a fellow servant simply because he did some work of the kind done by Van Dusen. The object of the statute was to make one to whom is committed by a railway company the authority to direct and control employees in the same service the representative, in respect of that service, of the common employer, so that his acts, within the scope of his employment, are the acts of the company, and his negligence its negligence.

That the evidence was such as to require the submission of the question of negligence to the jury is, in our judgment, too manifest to require discussion. Indeed, so far from there being no proof to support the allegation of negligence, the preponderance of evidence on that issue was with the plaintiff.

It is said that the damages found were excessive, and that the judgment below should, for that reason, be reversed. That was a question for the consideration of the trial court on a motion for a new trial. Upon a writ of error this court can deal only with questions of law. If there was a case of disputed facts upon which the plaintiff was entitled to go to the jury,—as undoubtedly there was,—it was for the jury to assess the damages; and, if the trial court did not disturb the verdict upon the ground that the damages were excessive, that was the end of the question of damages. As that court laid down no rule for the assessment of damages that was erroneous in law, this court is without power to revise the judgment in respect of the amount of damages. It is restricted in its consideration of the case to questions of law. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. v. Fraloff, 100 U. S. 24, 31, 25 L. ed. 531, 534.

It is alleged that error was committed in permitting plaintiff, against the objection of the defendant, to prove what Bartley, the conductor, said just after the plaintiff was injured. The conductor and those under him were very near each other during the performance of the work committed to them. Van Dusen testified that his hand was caught and held fast while the car that mashed it backed up 5 or 10 feet. Getting his hand out as soon as the car backed, he came from between the cars, and walked towards the engine, holding his hand up. The engineer got off the engine, and, with Bartley, came towards Van Dusen. Being asked how long after the accident before Bartley met him, Van Dusen said: "It was not a minute,—that is, a minute after I got my hand out and walked towards the engine;" and that it may have been "six or seven car lengths" before he met Bartley. Being asked what Bartley said to him at that time, the question was objected to; but the court permitted him to answer, upon the ground that it came "within the rule of the res gestæ," and that "what was said by this plaintiff and what was said by the engineer or by the conductor in the very doing of this thing is a part of the thing itself." The plaintiff answered: "Well, I asked Mr. Bartley what in the world he was trying to do, coming back on me the second time without saying anything about making a second cut. He said: 'Ed, I am sorry. I was going to put this car on the elevator track. When I backed up, I did not see you. I did not know just where you was until I heard you holler.'"

We are of opinion that this evidence was properly admitted. Its exclusion was not required by the rule that "an act done by an agent cannot be varied, qualified, or explained, either by his declarations which amount to no more than a mere narrative of a past occurrence, or by an isolated conversation held, or an isolated act done, at a later period." Northwestern Union Packet Co. v. Clough, 20 Wall. 528, 540, 22 L. ed. 406, 408. The case is rather covered by the rule formulated by Greenleaf (1 Greenl. Ev. 14th ed. § 113), and sanctioned by the Supreme Court in Vicksburg & M. R. Co. v. O'Brien, 119 U. S. 99, 105, 30 L. ed. 299, 301, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 118, namely: "The party's own admission, whenever made, may be given in evidence against him; but the admission or declaration of his agent binds him only when it is made during the continuance of the agency in regard to a transaction then depending, et dum ferret opus. It is because it is a verbal act, and part of the res gestæ, that it is admissible at all, and therefore it is not necessary to call the agent to prove it; but wherever what he did is admissible in evidence, there it is competent to prove what he said about the act while he was doing it."

Judge Hammond, in an opinion overruling the motion for a new trial, properly described the situation when he said that the conductor "almost immediately, and while the cars were moving, or had just stopped, and while the plaintiff was bleeding from the injury at that moment received, described his own part in bringing about the motion that effected the injury." The rule insisted upon for the exclusion of such declarations would, he said, "exclude everything from the res gestæ which did not occur on the very instant of the grinding of the flesh and bones by the colliding car." In O'Brien's Case the question was as to the admissibility of certain declarations of a railroad engineer as to the rate of speed at which his train was moving at the time of the accident. The court said: "Although the speed of the train was, in some degree, subject to his control, still his authority, in that respect, did not carry with it authority to make declarations or admissions at a subsequent time as to the manner in which, on any particular trip, or at any designated point in his route, he had performed his duty. His declaration, after the accident had become a completed fact, and when he was not performing the duties of engineer, that the train, at the moment the plaintiff was injured, was being run at the rate of 18 miles an hour, was not explanatory of anything in which he was then engaged. It did not accompany the act from which the injuries in question arose. It was, in its essence, the mere narration of a past occurrence, not a part of the res gestæ,— simply an assertion or representation, in the course of conversation, as to a matter not then pending, and in respect to which his authority as engineer had been fully exerted."

We recognize the difficulty of laying down a rule upon this subject that would apply in every case. But we do not doubt that, both upon principle and authority, the declarations of Bartley, tending to show that the injury to Van Dusen was to be attributed to his (Bartley's) negligence, were admissible in evidence as part of the res gestæ.* These declarations cannot properly be characterized as hearsay, for they really accompanied the transaction out of which arose the injury. The principal matter was the doing of certain work under the supervision of one having authority to control those engaged in it. The statements of the conductor were made while the work was in progress, while the plaintiff was assisting him, and in presence of the fact necessary to be explained. They illustrated what had, up to the moment of such statements, been done by him in the prosecution of the work. What the conductor and Van Dusen set out together to do was not completed, and what the former said was almost simultaneous with the doing of the thing causing the injury. The infliction of the injury and his explanation of his conduct were so close together that they may be said to have occurred at the same time. His declarations, therefore, were not, in any proper sense, a mere narrative of past occurrences; but were part of the occasion out of which the plaintiff's cause of action arose. They served to disclose the nature and quality of the acts in question; and were made under circumstances precluding the possibility of premeditation, design, or deliberation on the part of the conductor. They were made on the spot where the injury occurred. To exclude them would be to make their admissibility in evidence depend wholly upon the matter of time, although the circumstances show such direct and immediate connection between the thing done and the declarations of the person having such thing in charge as to justify the court in characterizing the transaction as one continuous, uncompleted transaction, and such declarations to be part of it.

Having considered all the matters presented by the record which, in our judgment, require consideration, and perceiving no error of law in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

W. W. WATSON, Appt.,

v.

J. J. MERRILL, Trustee, etc., of P. A. Brown, Bankrupt.

(136 Fed. 359.)

1. Rents which the bankrupt had agreed to pay at times subsequent to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy do not constitute a provable claim under the bankruptcy law of 1898, because they are not a "fixed liability . . . absolutely owing at the time of the filing of the petition against him," and because they do not constitute an existing demand; but both the existence and the amount of the possible future demand are contingent upon future events, such as default of lessee, re-entry of lessor, and assumption by trustee, so that they neither form the basis of an unliquidated, nor of a liquidated, provable claim. Act July 1, 1898, chap. 541, § 63, cls. a, b.
2. Damages for the breach of a contract of the bankrupt to pay rents at times subsequent to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy do not constitute a provable claim, for the same reason that the claim for the rents is not provable.
3. The retaking of the premises by the lessor releases the lessee from payment of all subsequently accruing rents, unless the contract expressly provides otherwise.
4. The trustee in bankruptcy has the option to assume or renounce the leases and other executory contracts of the bankrupt, as he may deem for the best interest of the estate.
5. An adjudication of bankruptcy absolves the bankrupt from no agreement, terminates no contract, and discharges no liability.
6. An adjudication of bankruptcy in a case in which there was no rent due at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy does not constitute a breach at that time of the covenants of the bankrupt in his lease to pay rents accruing thereafter.

district court, sitting in bankruptcy, which reversed an order of the referee, that the appellant, Watson, should be allowed a claim of $1,437.50 for damages for the breach by P. A. Brown, by means of his adjudication as a bankrupt, of a lease which he had taken from the appellant. On May 1, 1902, Brown leased of Watson a store-room in a building about to be erected for a term of ten years from October 1, 1902, and agreed to pay a monthly rental of $60 in advance during the term. He paid this rent to March 1, 1903. On February 6, 1903, a petition in bankruptcy was filed against him, and receivers were appointed, who took possession of his personal property in the rented premises. On April 2, 1903, he was adjudged a bankrupt, and a trustee was appointed. On March 2, 1903, Watson and Brown made a written contract which recited that it had become impossible for Brown to comply with the terms of his lease, and that he was obligated to his lessor thereby in the sum of $6,900, and in which he acknowledged himself to be indebted to Watson in the sum of $2,300, and surrendered to him all his rights and privileges under the lease; while Watson, by the same contract, released Brown from any further obligation to pay rent for the leased premises. Afterwards Watson filed his proof of claim for $2,300 against the estate of Brown, which was founded on the lease and on the contract of March 2, 1903. He also filed a petition for the liquidation of this claim, in which he alleged that he had incurred extraordinary expense in the construction of the building in expectation of the rental, that the rental value of the premises was only $40 per month, and that he had sustained damages to the amount of $20 per month from March 1, 1902, until the end of the term of the lease, which amounted in the aggregate to $2,300. The referee found the rental value of the premises to be $47.50 per month, and allowed the claim of Watson for $1,437.50 for damages for a breach of the lease. Upon a petition for a review, the district court reversed this decision, and directed the referee to disallow the claim.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The contention of counsel for the appellant is that the claim of the lessor is not for rents which were payable after the petition for adjudication in bankruptcy was filed, but for damages for a breach of the contract in the lease to pay these rents; that the adjudication in bankruptcy dissolves all contractual relations of the bankrupt at the date of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy (Re Jefferson, 2 Am. Bankr. Rep. 206, 93 Fed. 948; Bray v. Cobb, 3 Am. Bankr. Rep. 788, 100 Fed. 270; Re Hays, F. & W. Co. 117 Fed. 879); that the dissolution of a contractual relation is a breach of the contract; and that, for the breach of the contract to pay the rents accruing subsequent to the filing of the petition, a claim for damages may be allowed in bankruptcy (Re Swift, 50 C. C. A. 234, 112 Fed. 315; Re Stern, 54 C. C. A. 60, 116 Fed. 604; Re Frederick L. Grant Shoe Co. 66 C. C. A. 78, 130 Fed. 881).

It is, however, the nature of the claim, and not the name which is applied to it, that conditions its provability in bankruptcy. Watson's claim was for $20 of the $60 per month which the lessee had agreed to pay him for rent of the leased premises for one hundred and fifteen months after the petition in bankruptcy was filed. In reality, his claim was for the entire $60 per month, but he had received by the surrender to him of the premises by Brown under their contract of March 2, 1903, and had credited to him, the rental value of the premises, $40 per month, so that the rent which he claimed remained unpaid was but $20 for each month.

At the close of the hearing the referee found that the rental value of the premises was $47.50 per month, and that the only rent remaining unpaid was $12.50 per month for the one hundred and fifteen months subsequent to February, 1903, and this amounted to $1,437.50, which he allowed to the appellant under the name of damages for the breach of the contract in the lease.

These facts demonstrate the proposition that, while counsel and the referee call this allowance damages for a breach of the lease, it is in fact nothing but that part of the monthly rent which was to accrue after the petition was filed, which the referee found that the lessee had not paid by his surrender of the leased premises to the lessor in March, 1903. But rent which the bankrupt has agreed to pay, and which is to accrue subsequent to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, does not constitute a provable claim under the bankruptcy law of 1898 (Act July 1, 1898, chap. 541, 30 Stat.

at L. 562, 563, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3447), because it is not "a fixed liability . . . absolutely owing at the time of the filing of the petition against him" (§ 63a), and because it is not an existing demand, but both the existence and the amount of the possible future demand are contingent upon unforeseen events, such as default of the lessee, re-entry by the lessor, and assumption by the trustee, so that it is neither an unliquidated nor a liquidated provable claim (§ 63b). Walla Walla v. Walla Walla Water Co. 172 U. S. 1, 19, 43 L. ed. 341, 349, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 77; Re Ellis, 2 N. B. N. Rep. 360, 98 Fed. 967, 969, 970; Re Mahler, 3 N. B. N. A. 335, 338, 114 Fed. 639, 642; Wilson v. Pennsylvania Trust Co. 52 C. C. A. 374, 114 Fed. 742.

In Deane v. Caldwell, 127 Mass. 242, 244, Chief Justice Gray (subsequently Mr. Justice Gray of the supreme court) announced the true rule upon this subject in these words: "Before the day at which rent is covenanted to be paid, it is in no sense a debt. It is neither debitum nor solvendum; for, if the lessee is evicted before that day, it never becomes payable. Bordman v. Osborn, 23 Pick. 295. It is not within the provision of a bankrupt act allowing 'uncertain or contingent demands' to be proved against the estate of a bankrupt, because it is not an existing demand, the cause of action on which depends upon a contingency; but the very existence of the demand depends upon a contingency."

The lease before us admirably illustrates the principle. It provides that the lessee shall pay $60 per month for the term of ten years "for the use and benefit accruing to him from the use and occupancy" of the premises; that, if he pays these sums as they fall due, and performs all his covenants, he may hold and enjoy the premises; but that, if any rents are due and unpaid, or if default is made in any of his covenants, or if he allows any undue waste of any of the improvements on the premises, the lessor may at once re-enter and repossess the premises. The contract contains no covenant that the lessee will pay any rents after his default and the re-entry by the lessor. The use and occupation of the premises during the term of the lease were the consideration for the payment of the monthly rents, and the payment of the rents was the consideration for the use of the premises. If the rent for any month was not paid, or if waste was permitted, the lessor had the option to repossess himself of the premises, and to withhold from thenceforth the consideration for future instalments of rent, or to permit the lessee to continue in possession of the property, and to enforce the collection of the rents by an action or by some other proceeding. He could not, however, do both. His resumption of the premises necessarily constituted, in the absence of an express agreement to the contrary, a termination of the lease, and a release of the lessee from the payment of all the instalments of rent he had promised to pay thereafter. Lamson Consol. Store Service Co. v. Bowland, 52 C. C. A. 335, 338, 114 Fed. 639, 642.

Moreover, if by contract or by virtue of legal proceedings the lessor became entitled to the possession of the premises, and also to the difference between the amount which he might secure from another tenant, or the rental value of the leasehold, and the rents reserved, that amount would always be uncertain and contingent upon future events. Re Hevenor, 144 N. Y. 271, 274, 39 N. E. 393.

When the petition in bankruptcy was filed, no rent was due and unpaid. There was therefore no debt owing by the lessee to Watson, and the latter had no legal demand or claim against him under the lease. The future existence of any such claim or demand, and its amount, if it ever came into existence, were contingent upon (1) the future default of the lessee; (2) the exercise by the lessor of his option to resume the possession of the leased premises if such a default should occur; and (3) upon the assumption of the lease by the trustee in bankruptcy. For the latter had the option to take the leasehold estate, and to assume the payment of the agreed rents. Ex parte Houghton, 1 Low. Dec. 554, Fed. Cas. No. 6,725; Ames v. Union P. R. Co. 60 Fed. 966, 970, 971; Re Ellis, 2 N. B. N. Rep. 360, 98 Fed. 967, 968. As the lessor had no legal claim or demand against the lessee for the agreed rents to be paid in the future, when the petition in bankruptcy was filed; and as the future existence and the amount of such a claim were both contingent upon unforeseen future events,—Watson had no provable claim for any part of these rents. Since his claim is in fact for nothing but $12.50 per month of the agreed rents payable after the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, the application to it of the title of a claim for damages for a breach of the lease neither changes its nature, nor makes it more provable than it would have been if its real character had been described by its name.

2. An adjudication in bankruptcy does not dissolve or terminate the contractual relations of the bankrupt, notwithstanding the decisions to the contrary in Re Jefferson, 2 Am. Bankr. Rep. 206, 93 Fed. 948; Bray v. Cobb, 3 Am. Bankr. Rep. 788, 100 Fed. 270; and Re Hays, F. & W. Co. 117 Fed. 879. Its effect is to transfer to the trustee all the property of the bankrupt except his executory contracts, and to vest in the trustee the option to assume or to renounce these. It is the assignment of the property of the bankrupt to the trustee by operation of law. It neither releases nor absolves the debtor from any of his contracts or obligations, but, like any other assignment of property by an obligor, leaves him bound by his agreements, and subject to the liabilities he has incurred. It is the discharge of the bankrupt alone, not his adjudication, that releases him from liability for provable debts in consideration of his surrender of his property, and its distribution among the creditors who hold them. Even the discharge fails to relieve him from claims against him that are not provable in bankruptcy; and, since his obligation to pay rents which are to accrue after the filing of the petition in bankruptcy may not be the basis of a provable claim, his liability for them is neither released nor affected by his adjudication in bankruptcy, or by his discharge from his provable debts. One agrees to pay monthly rents for the place of residence of his family or for his place of business, or to render personal services for monthly compensation for a term of years; he agrees to purchase or to convey property; and he then becomes insolvent and is adjudicated a bankrupt. His obligations and liabilities are neither terminated nor released by the adjudication. He still remains legally bound to pay the rents, to render the services, and to fulfil all his other obligations, notwithstanding the fact that his insolvency may render him unable immediately to do so. Nor are those who contracted with him absolved from their obligations. If he or his trustee pays the stipulated rents for his place of residence, or for his place of business, the lessors may not deny to the payor the use of the premises according to the terms of the lease. If he renders the personal services, he who contracted to pay for them may not deny his liability to discharge this obligation. His trustee does not become liable for his debts; but he does acquire the right to accept and assume, or to renounce, the executory agreements of the bankrupt, as he may deem most advantageous to the estate he is administering; and the parties to those contracts which he assumes are still liable to perform them. And so throughout the entire field of contractual obligations the adjudication in bankruptcy absolves from no agreement, terminates no contract, and discharges no liability. Re Curtis, 109 La. 171, 9 Am. Bankr. Rep. 286, 94 Am. St. Rep. 445, 33 So. 125; Re Ellis, 2 N. B. N. Rep. 360, 98 Fed. 967, 968; Witthaus v. Zimmerman, 91 App. Div. 202, 11 Am. Bankr. Rep. 314, 316, 86 N. Y. Supp. 315; White v. Griffing, 44 Conn. 437, 446, 447; Re Pennewell, 55 C. C. A. 571, 9 Am. Bankr. Rep. 490, 119 Fed. 139.

3. Not only this, but, if counsel for appellant could sustain his proposition that the adjudication of bankruptcy absolved the parties to the lease from their contract at the date of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, or terminated the lease on that day, still the lessor would have no legal claim against the estate, because the petition was filed on February 6, 1903, the rent was paid by Brown to March 1, 1903. there had been no breach of the contract when the petition was filed, and, if both parties were released from the agreement at that time, or if the lease was then terminated, neither party could have subsequently been in default under it or have committed a breach of it, because thereafter no contract would have existed to be defaulted, and no covenant to be broken.

4. Finally the adjudication in bankruptcy did not constitute a breach of the lease, and it raised no cause of action as of the date of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy. At that date the rent had been paid until March 1, 1903,—until twenty-two days after the date of the filing. There could therefore have been no breach until March 1, 1903, when the rent for March fell due; and consequently there was no claim or demand founded on a breach of the contract at the time the petition was filed, and, if one ever accrued, it arose many days after the filing of the petition, and too late to constitute a provable claim against the estate of the bankrupt. The rule of law that, where one has disabled himself from performing a contract, it immediately ripens, and an action for its breach arises, which is illustrated by Re Swift, 50 C. C. A. 264, 112 Fed. 315, wherein a stockbroker had made a contract to deliver stock to a customer, and he was held to have made it impossible for him to fulfil his agreement by his adjudication in bankruptcy, which took the stock from him, and vested it and all his property in his trustee, is not in conflict with this conclusion, because the leasehold estate of Brown—the only thing essential to the performance of his contract—never passed to his trustee, as the latter did not elect to assume it. Brown was not necessarily disabled by the adjudication from using or selling his leasehold, or from paying the rent. The mere probable financial inability of one to fulfil his contract, or to pay his debt not yet due, does not make them immediately due and actionable. The cases Re Stern, 54 C. C. A. 60, 116 Fed.

604, and Re Frederick L. Grant Shoe Co. 66 C. C. A. 78, 130 Fed. 881, cited by appellant's counsel, fail to rule the question here under consideration, because the breaches of contract in those cases occurred before the petitions in bankruptcy were filed.

The conclusion is that a claim for damages for a breach of a contract in a lease to pay instalments of rent for the use of the premises at times subsequent to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy is not provable under the bankruptcy law of 1898, and the order of the District Court is affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, FIRST CIRCUIT.

Town of NAHANT, Plff. in Err.,

v.

UNITED STATES of America, Impleaded, etc.

(136 Fed. 273.)

1. A state statute acquiescing in an attempt by the Federal government to acquire land within the state for the use of such government does not entitle the government to employ the local rule of damages as the measure of its liability for property taken.
2. The value of sewer and water pipes owned by a municipal corporation, and laid under streets which are taken by the Federal government under its power of eminent domain for an entirely different use, must be paid to the municipality.

Aldrich, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a proceeding instituted by the United States for condemnation of certain land at Nahant needed by the general government for fortifications and coast defenses, together with all roads, ways, and avenues included in the description of land, as well as all buildings and structures. The petition of the United States contains a prayer for notice to certain parties of interest expressly named, and a general prayer for notice to all parties interested in the lands described, and parts thereof, and rights therein, and for an appraisal and valuation by a jury of the land and ways and interests therein, and any buildings standing on said land, including all damages sustained by the owner or owners thereof.

Following the prayer of the petition, the district court ordered notice to the parties of interest named, and to any and all other persons, corporations, and associations who may be interested in the lands described in the petition, or any parts thereof or rights therein; and that they and each of them appear before the court, and show cause why the petition should not be granted as prayed for.
